Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun
.......................Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call)............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68
.......................Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known perhaps, as by his first symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the ninth symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a tenth symphony." Many have disputed this characterization of the Brahms symphony, and with reason, for the genius of the two masters was so different. But certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the French horn solo in the last movement. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs, This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be. The Ibert score is introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9th. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions; Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia. For this concert mail orders are now being received at the Foundation office and the public sale will open on Monday, November 2d. The Foundation is also filling orders for the entire orchestra series, including concerts by the Detroit, Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 25 1925

Boston Symphony Again Foremost

The halcyon days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Karl Muck, when that organization was rated as the premier orchestra of the world, are rapidly returning under the regime of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, according to word from Boston and New York.

Again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a popularity in the two cities mentioned that exceeds all facilities available. In Boston and New York this autumn, reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being purchased by music enthusiasts at a premium from the fortunate holders and all 1925-26 concerts of the orchestra, both in Boston and New York were sold out late last spring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, will visit Washington twice this season, first as an attraction of Mrs. WilsonA-Greene's Artists' Course and later in that manager's Philharmonic Course. Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course include Dusolina Giannini, mezzo soprano; Rachmaninoff, famous Russian pianist and composer; Mme. Galli-Curci, world's greatest coloratura, and Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 25 1925

MUSIC

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahms symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being intro- Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy tale, Op.
63 ....Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a
Faun." ....Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call) ....Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op
68 ....Brahms.

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of forty-seven years he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of good and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than duced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his mu... "Three Mediterranean Impressi... Rome to Palermo; Tunis, ... Valencia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor.

The Friday evening program will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony ("Pathetic"), Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"), and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will-o-the Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs, and Rakoczky March. The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1925

* * *

Because of the demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its suburbs and in New York, the organization has been forced to curtail visits to other New England and Eastern States cities. In addition to the five concerts in Providence, on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16, New England appearances of the orchestra outside of Greater Boston will probably be limited to such college towns as Wellesley, Northampton, Holyoke and New Haven. Patronage of the concerts in Providence warrants their continuation, according to the management, which announces that the number of seats re-engaged by subscription is already 25 per cent. greater than in previous seasons. The public sale of season tickets opens Monday, Nov. 2.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, 129
N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 25 1925

Finale ....

Mr. Hardy.

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahm symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music Hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora to "Folk Fairy Tale", Op.
63 .... Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
.... Debussy
Escales ("Ports of Call") .... Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68...
.... Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it, at the age of 47, he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Many have disputed this characterization of the greatest Brahms symphony, and with good reason for the genius of the two masters was so different. Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines the most uplifting in its surging and exultant Finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion.

The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming

---

marks a movement towards music in the churches.

"Music nowadays, like ... else has become dist... wrote Ernest Blo... famous compos... Cleveland's ... has becom... ness a... has...

...dson
Nonso...
...ving I...
The first show... electrically driven attractively desig...
peal to every wom...
sign, without sacr...
cality of the e...
machine has been

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 28 1925

The outstanding novelty on ... week's program of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," music written for a short opera and then recast for a ballet pantomime. Other numbers on the program will be the overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Schumann; "The Battle at Kerjenetz" from the opera "Kitej," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Persian Dances" from the opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

129

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 24 1925

WITH an Ibert number, which is being introduced to America this season and with the Brahms Symphony No. 1, as the event of the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the first in the series of orchestra concerts of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Following is the complete program in which Sergei Koussevitzky, the noted Russian conductor, will lead his men:

Overture to Euryanthe............Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63..Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun.......
........................Debussy
Escales (Port of Call)..............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68......
........................Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led ~~von~~ Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony." Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions—Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia.

With Serge ... great Russian conductor wielding ... baton, the 107 men of the Boston Symphony will play an attractive program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

OCT 24 1925

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first of the series of concerts for the season of 1925-26 at Sanders theatre by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given on Thursday evening of last week. Serge Koussevitsky conducted. The program included these numbers: Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Escales," ("Ports of Call"), Ibert; Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss; Symphony No. 1, Brahms.

There was a nearly capacity audience present which enthusiastically welcomed Mr. Koussevitsky on his appearance. In the orchestra, many old friends are missed, including Mr. Longy, Mr. Lenom, Mr. Schroeder and others. The new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, is said to be a nephew of the composer of the popular "Loin de Bal."

The program presented one novelty, the "Escales" of Jacques Ibert, a young French composer, who has written a number of works in various forms, unfamiliar to American audiences. The "Escales," first heard in Paris about two years ago, is a set of three pieces, each one of which is supposed to picture musically the impressions received at three "ports of call," where a vessel is supposed to call for the purpose of getting supplies. The ports of call were Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia.

On a first hearing, the best impressions were received by the second number. Tunis must have been a good place to visit, for the music suggests much of Oriental life with strong rhythms, an especially animated middle section, with much of the ultra modern French effects in the instrumentation. The Valencia scene is more or less Spanish in its general character, but Ibert's Spanish picture is commonplace beside that of Chabrier in his Rhapsody. The three numbers were brilliantly played and well received.

Mr. Koussevitsky gave one of the best interpretations of Strauss' rather gruesome work that one can well remember. The great and gradual climatic period at the transfiguration was brought out more logically than most conductors do it. The work, however, is not Strauss at his greatest, though there are many impressive pages.

Brahms is still in evidence and the first symphony received the greatest applause of the evening. Some think it is ageing somewhat, but it appears good for a few seasons yet. And as they say "and then some." The ever popular "Marriage of Figaro" overture made a most acceptable opening number.

The second concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, November 2.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
~~POST~~ Express

OCT 25 1925

Brahms's symphony No. 1, opus 68, in C minor, has been chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for performance by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, in Elmwood Music hall. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete programme for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe...........Weber
Kikimora (folk fairy tale), op. 63..
..............................Liadov
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun
........................Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call).............Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68
..............................Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known perhaps, as by his first symphony. When he composed it at the age of 47 he was much influenced by the ninth symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a tenth symphony." Many have disputed this characterization of the Brahms symphony, and with reason, for the genius of the two masters was so different. But certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the French horn solo in the last movement. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than any poetry of words could be. The Ibert score is introduced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9th. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music Three Mediterranean Impressions; Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia. For this concert mail orders are now being received at the Foundation office and the public sale will open on Monday, November 2d. The Foundation is also filling orders for the entire orchestra series, including concerts by the Detroit, Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 25 1925

MUSIC

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahms symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on any poetry of words could be.

The Ibert score is being intro-Wednesday evening, November 4, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Kikimora to Folk Fairy tale, Op.
63 ....Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a
Faun." ....Debussy
Escales (Ports of Call) ....Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op
68 ....Brahms.

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it at the age of forty-seven years he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines, the most uplifting in its surging and exultant finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of good and subtle suggestion. The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This setting in tones of the Mallarme poem in its way is more potent than duced to America by Mr. Koussevitzky, having had its first performance in this country at the opening of the Boston Symphony season on October 9. It has attracted considerable attention and interest as a notable achievement of the modern French school. Ibert calls his music "Three Mediterranean Impressions—Rome to Palermo; Tunis to Nefta; Valencia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 25 1925

Finale ....

Mr. Hardy.

Most dramatic and wondrous of the four Brahm symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, will be played by the 107 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 4th, at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music Hall, under the baton of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. This is the first concert of six by visiting orchestras arranged for Buffalo this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The complete program for the evening will be:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora to "Folk Fairy Tale", Op.
63 .... Liadov
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
.... Debussy
Escales ("Ports of Call") .... Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68...
.... Brahms

By no other score is Brahms so widely known and loved, it is said, as by his First Symphony. When he composed it, at the age of 47, he was much influenced by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, which led von Bulow to remark, "At last we have a Tenth Symphony."

Many have disputed this characterization of the greatest Brahms symphony, and with good reason for the genius of the two masters was so different. Certainly, of the four Brahms symphonies, the first is the most dramatic in its broader lines the most uplifting in its surging and exultant Finale, the most wondrous in the beauties of its infinite detail. Among its countless fine passages are the wood-wind and violin solos in the slow movement, and the famous French horn solo in the last movement.

The first to make Debussy's music known in Russia, Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of the Frenchman's music. Here is music of mood and subtle suggestion marks a movement towards music in the churches.

The faun, characterized by the flute, tries vainly to retain the dimming

---

"Music nowadays, like else has become distorte wrote Ernest Bloch, in famous composer an Cleveland's Institute has become an indus ness affair where has too often be existence of an Westminster
portance to tural develo
all the ta organizat
the pre were the s hon fe

th
Bo
9th atta achi Iber rane ermo.
For now
dation will ope
The Fo for the concert
and Cin Singing
sohn, C Schumann Lutkin an and witho Westminster comes to E Sunday afte at 3 o'clock
teresting conc
Under the d ley Williamson
ing its first Ea giving 50 conce
In Buffalo the under the auspic tarian committee
Charles H. Brent man; Bishop Will Bishop Adna W.
Rev. Don D. Tullis
chairman of the co
It aims to bring ba place in worship.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 24 1925

* * *

There are fourteen new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the present season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmund Allegra, first clarinet; Lean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. The personnel of the orchestra is larger this season than ever before, there being eighteen violins, sixteen second violins, thirteen violas and ten basses.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 25 1925

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last Summer in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French Government with the emblem of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the bassoon and double bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpenti for four harps with percussion, an Paul Le Flem, for double bass a poser, Other composers who were ry ma- did not contribute music ra which Schmitt, Aubert, Gretchani of per- erre, Boulanger, Samir America eorges, Laparra and Bo

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

T 25 192

* * *

THERE are 14 new players with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, including four new leaders: Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Edmond Allegra, first clarinet; Jean Lefranc, first viola, and Joannes Rochut, first trombone. Mr. Gillet is the son of Ernest Gillet, composer and conductor, and the nephew of Georges Gillet, oboist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Fernand Gillet has been for 23 years oboe soloist with the Concert Lamoureux and the orchestra at the Paris Opera. Edmond Allegra, born in Switzerland of Italian parents, attended the conservatories at Geneva and Lyons, where he took the first prize. He was for nine years solo clarinet with the Tonhalle orchestra at Zurich.

Jean Lefranc was graduated from the Paris conservatory with the first prize in 1907. He became the solo viola of the Opera Comique orchestra in that year, and since 1911 has been first viola in the Colonne orchestra of Gabriel Pierne.

Joannes Rochut first came to America as trombone soloist with the French army band in 1918. He was graduated with first prize at the Paris conservatory in 1905, and has since been prominent as the first trombonist in the orchestra of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureux.

The personnel of the orchestra this season is larger than ever before. There are now 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 13 violas and 10 basses.

* * *

CHICAGO'S Civic Opera company will open a season of 12 weeks November 3 Giorgio Polacco, mus midst of re- she s will

---

THIS CLIPPING F
BROOKLYN, N
EAGLE

OCT 25 1925

Serge Koussewitsky, who was introduced to Brooklyn last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was recently decorated by the French Government with the emblem of "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The entire group of modern French composers gathered at the time to honor Mr. K sky, and a special progra

man

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

OCT 25 1925

Boston Symphony Again Foremost

The halcyon days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Karl Muck, when that organization was rated as the premier orchestra of the world, are rapidly returning under the regime of Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant Russian conductor, according to word from Boston and New York.

Again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a popularity in the two cities mentioned that exceeds all facilities available. In Boston and New York this autumn, reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being purchased by music enthusiasts at a premium from the fortunate holders and all 1925-26 concerts of the orchestra, both in Boston and New York were sold out late last spring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, will visit Washington twice this season, first as an attraction of Mrs. WilsonA-Greene's Artists' Course and later in that manager's Philharmonic Course. Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' Course include Dusolina Giannini, mezzo soprano; Rachmaninoff, famous Russian pianist and composer; Mme. Galli-Curci, world's greatest coloratura, and Beniamino Gigli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

OCT 25 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A significant figure in the coming concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, will be Se Koussevitzky, its conductor.

The Friday evening program include Weber's Overture to anthe," Tchaikovsky's Sixth S ("Pathetic"), Ibert's "Escales of Call"), and three numbers Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—Mi uet of the Will-o-the Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs, and Rakoczy March. The program for Saturday afternoon will include Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and three selections from the music dramas of Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1925

* * *

—Because of the demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its suburbs and in New York, the organization has been forced to curtail visits to other New England and Eastern States cities. In addition to the five concerts in Providence, on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16, New England appearances of the orchestra outside of Greater Boston will probably be limited to such college towns as Wellesley, Northampton, Holyoke and New Haven. Patronage of the concerts in Providence warrants their continuation, according to the management, which announces that the number of seats re-engaged by subscription is already 25 per cent. greater than in previous seasons. The public sale of season tickets opens Monday, Nov. 2.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 28 1925

The outstanding novelty on week's program of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," music written for a short opera and then recast for a ballet pantomime. Other numbers on the program will be the overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Schumann; "The Battle at Kerjenetz" from the opera "Kitej," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Persian Dances" from the opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky.

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

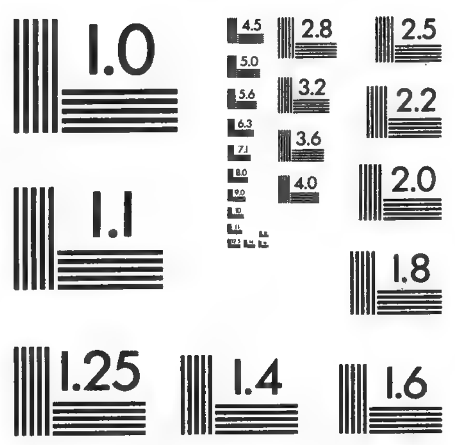
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Serge Koussevitzky

on Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

2 5 1925

Concert Pitch

By Samuel Chotzinoff

IN THIS week's New Republic there is a lament by Mr. Virgil Thomson. It is, presumably, an indictment against what he calls "the new musical mountebankery," by which he means our popular orchestra conductors. Mr. Thomson holds them up to derision, calls one of them, Mr. Stokowski, the equivalent, orchestrally speaking, of Babe Ruth and Jackie Coogan, and thinks that the people who admire them are no better than they should be. Mr. Thomson intimates, in effect, that the conductors we flock to hear are nothing more than prima donnas.

⁂

I've often wondered why it is that the term prima donna has become a word of reproach. Originally a title of honor, it is used nowadays to stigmatize, to point the finger of scorn, to condemn, to make ridiculous. In the provinces the word is still held in esteem and many a raucous soprano utilizes it in posters and advertisements, certain of its potency to draw the provincial yokelry. But to be called a prima donna something-or-other in New York is the equivalent of an insult.

⁂

The opera is, of course, responsible for it. Opera has for a long time held an extraordinary position in the general mind. It has something to do with music but much more to do with personalities. An opera house is a glamourous structure in which fascinating people of talent do just about what they please, to the great delight of the outside world. Opera people may be expected to do most anything. The more irresponsible they are the better we like them. Everything about them is news except, of course, the quality of their art.

And now come critics with the devastating charge that most of our orchestra conductors are by nature and instinct prima donnas and, what is even worse, the public is glad of it. According to them the rapid multiplication of orchestras in this country is no indication of a spread among us of musical culture. The reason for their multiplication is a hankering on the part of the public for more and more conductors who approximate in their persons and habits the meaning of the operatic term, whose present degradation I lamented above. What cares the public for music, say these critics. Do we really love the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, of Schumann and Tschaikowsky? Do we crave the satisfying polyphony of the Brandenburg concertos, the choral vorspiel of Bach? Are we seeking in the bizarre works of the modernists an expression of our own reaction to the present state of things in the world? No! We do not love the classics, they cry, pointing an accusing forefinger at us. We care nothing about the balm of polyphony and are not interested in the least in the expression of the modern spirit. What we are interested in is the personalities of several gentlemen who have good or interesting or provocatively grotesque figures who will utilize orchestral music to display their own musical idiosyncrasies. And the more idiosyncrasies they display the better we like it.

⁂

Let us see if this is true. Before the war there were three major orchestras giving concerts in New York. There was the Symphony Society, at that time called the New York Symphony, the Philharmonic Orchestra, and the visiting Boston Symphony. The New York Symphony was doing then what it is doing now and has done since its inception, that is, presenting the classics and the best contemporary music that came along, to a constant audience. Nobody has ever accused Mr. Damrosch of being a sensational leader, yet his following is a steady growth over a long period. The Philharmonic, after a disastrous experience with Gustav Mahler, flourished for about ten years under Josef Stransky. There was a great deal of silence during Mr. Stransky's incumbency about his lack of qualifications for his exalted position, but every musician in town knew that his qualifications were hardly adequate. Mr. Stransky's success is, however, easily explained. He had a genius for divining the musical tastes of a certain portion of the public that is frightened as a rule by the rumored austerities of symphony concerts. This public he attracted by offers of large doses of musical pap in the form of reiterated chunks of Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Liszt. It came back year after year for more, li rug addicts, and only ceased coming when it was thoroughly surfeited. That ended Mr. Stransky's career with the Philha A sure sign that his public is dead or turned toward better t was his failure to rally them when he assumed for a short tim leadership of the State Orchestra. We come now to the Bo Symphony, then led by Dr. Carl Muck.

⁂

I will agree that Dr. Muck was a sensational conductor. H was sensational because he possessed in a unique degree qualitie of extraordinary musicianship and the ability to communicate these to his men. He was an austere leader with none of the popular graces that would endear him to the general public. Not in any sense could that dread word prima donna be applied to him. Yet the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck held a place in the public esteem equal to that held by the Philadelphia Orchestra to-day under Leopold Stokowski.

⁂

Coming down to the present we find the Philadelphia Band supreme in the orchestral field. Our critics tell us this supremacy is due to the sensational personality of its leader, Stokowski, who exploits his fine orchestra as a sort of polished looking glass in which he prinks and makes plastic gestures to the satisfaction of smart people who should know better. But how do they account for the success last season of Furtwangler, who is gawky and uncouth, or for the lack of success of Mr. Golschmann, who was slender and charming? Frederick Stock, as sincere and unpretentious a conductor as ever lived, is the darling of Chicago and has been for the last twenty years. How will they account for him and the Chicago Orchestra?

⁂

They can point to the failure of Mr. Bruno Walter last year to make an impression on New York audiences. Mr. Walter, it is generally agreed, is a serious musician and should have had some measure of public success. He is, in all probability, a better musician than Stokowski. So, too, I imagine, is Mr. Dohnanyi, the conductor of the State Symphony. But that is not the point.

⁂

I think that if you will boil down the strictures of critics against the popularity of certain orchestral leaders it will come down to one thing—the fear that the contract of a forceful and dominating personality with great music is detrimental to the right presentation of the music. They fear that Mr. Stokowski is not willing or perhaps is not able to submerge his individuality to the composer's, and that the Philadelphia leader's primary intention, unconscious though it may be, is to present himself. Good music, they contend, is good per se, and gains nothing by passing through anybody's individuality. The thing for a conductor to do, since we can't dispense with one, is to study the individuality of the composer and present it to the audience as faithfully as he can. As a clincher they vow the best way to get the effect of a composition, unadulterated and as the composer had intended it, is to play it yourself on your piano, if you are able.

What they forget is that if you play a composition yourself it passes none the less through a personality. That the personality is your own, is even more damaging to the music unless you happen to possess the training and knowledge and imaginative faculty equal to those of public performers. One does not go to hear Mr. Stokowski or any one else play a Brahms symphony the way Brahms intended it to be played. No one knows the way Brahms intended it to be played, and it would not be final if one did know. For, after all, his would have been only one way of playing it, and there are as many ways as there are people to play it. I want to hear Brahms through a great many different personalities, but the personalities must be extraordinary and compelling. Whatever else he lacks, Mr. Stokowski has certain qualities in an unusual degree; a natural and inexorable rhythmic beat, a rare sense of musical form. Any music passing through Mr. Stokowski's hands will at least have rhythm and form if nothing else. And that is a great deal.

⁂

Anatole France thought that criticism was the adventure of a personality among works of art. I wonder if that is not also true of orchestra conductors and, indeed, of all interpreters whatsoever.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

[illegible]

Mme. Jeritza.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had to curtail the schedule of concerts in New England cities for the present season. Providence, however, remains one of the few cities to be visited and will have the usual series of five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The curtailment has been made necessary by the great demand for concerts in Boston where the three series of 53 concerts are sold out by the season to the last seat. The same condition exists in Cambridge and New York. There is every indication that in Providence, likewise, the series of five will be oversubscribed. The remarkable success of the orchestra and its conductor in Providence last season points to this conclusion which is confirmed by the advance season sale. At the present date the renewal of seats is 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he adopted so successfully in New York and Boston the beginning of last season. They will be chosen not only for their merits as singers or virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especially suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programs embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music.

Serge Koussevitzky opened his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9. He may well be called the most striking figure among the conductors of the day in a country where almost all of the "great" ones are now to be heard.

The public subscription sale will open Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS TODAY.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Toronto at Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 3rd, with this world-famous organization. An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing and vital in orchestral conducting. The advance seat sale will open at the Massey Hall box office today, Thursday, October 29th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 29 1925

the robbery.

BOSTON, Oct. 29. (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 30 1925

GERICKE, SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR, DIES

Boston, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1925

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been [illegible] born in Schwarnberg,

---

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO,
OHIO
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

GERICHE, FORMER BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD, DEAD

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES AT VIENNA

Was Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra and One of Its Builders

Boston, Oct. 29—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

OCT 30 192

FORMER SYMPHONY HEAD DIES

Wilhelm Gericke, Austrian, Was With Boston Orchestra In 80s.

Boston, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. ~~A cablegram~~ received from Vienna today said Mr. Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He was born in Austria in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke

None of the long line of distinguished men who have conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra has been more ~~closely identified~~ with that famous organization than Wilhelm Gericke, who has just died in Vienna at the age of 80. A thoroughly trained musician, with experience in conducting both opera and symphony concerts, he came to Boston 40 odd years ago, in the prime of life, to carry out the purpose of Maj Higginson to establish an orchestra equal to the best in Europe. When he arrived in 1884 the orchestra had been in existence three years and had done good work under Henschel, but it was still far short of the contemporary European standard. It needed more technical skill and a more exacting discipline, and Gericke set himself to supply both, bringing over many talented young musicians, Franz Kneisel among them, and applying himself as drillmaster to the attainment of that flawless perfection which long made "impeccable" almost a byword in Boston.

On this side Gericke was almost unrivaled, and while his conducting was often criticized, even in those classical days, as too cold, it is hardly possible to extol too highly his service to Boston and to America in giving at so critical a time a striking lesson in the value of painstaking effort at perfection. He made the orchestra the foremost in America and the equal of any in Europe, and in some respects it has probably never been better than it became under his hands. Technically it declined when his first term expired in 1889, although his successor, Arthur Nikisch, supplied in abundance the "temperament" which he had been accused of lacking, and the decline went further under Emil Paur, so that so fastidious and exacting a conductor as Gericke had many dropped stitches to pick up when he returned for his second term from 1898 to 1906. Like Boston's other conductors he was a storm center of criticism, but even his severest critics freely recognized his good qualities, and in the retrospect the orchestra's indebtedness to him is seen to be great.

In style he was a classicist, in execution a precisionist, in discipline a martinet. Distinguished players would sometimes get so nervous under his eye at rehearsal that they could hardly play when they came to a solo passage, and were in danger of breaking down under the nervous strain, but this stern discipline certainly yielded a marvelous perfection in detail. Gericke's passion for uniformity was amusingly illustrated in the experiment, which he induced Maj Higginson to finance, of providing all the string players with new instruments made by one Austrian maker in order to secure perfect homogeneity of tone. The experiment was not successful, because experience showed that homogeneity was less important than quality, and the players, to their great relief, were allowed to return to their favorite fiddles, most of them old and mellow.

Born in the Styrian town, Graz, Gericke was educated at the Vienna conservatory, and no doubt showed early the masterful traits which, together with his musical talent, marked him out as a conductor. He alternated between Vienna and Boston, returning in 1906 to the Austrian capital, where he lived in retirement until the close of his life.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

130

Serge Koussevitzky

— of the Boston Symphony

Pitch

Chotzinoff

IN THIS week's New Republic there is a lament by Mr. Virgil Thomson. It is, presumably, an indictment against what he calls "the new musical mountebankery," by which he means our popular orchestra conductors. Mr. Thomson holds them up to derision, calls one of them, Mr. Stokowski, the equivalent, orchestrally speaking, of Babe Ruth and Jackie Coogan, and thinks that the people who admire them are no better than they should be. Mr. Thomson intimates, in effect, that the conductors we flock to hear are nothing more than prima donnas.

* * *

I've often wondered why it is that the term prima donna has become a word of reproach. Originally a title of honor, it is used nowadays to stigmatize, to point the finger of scorn, to condemn, to make ridiculous. In the provinces the word is still held in esteem and many a raucous soprano utilizes it in posters and advertisements, certain of its potency to draw the provincial yokelry. But to be called a prima donna something-or-other in New York is the equivalent of an insult.

* * *

The opera is, of course, responsible for it. Opera has for a long time held an extraordinary position in the general mind. It has something to do with music but much more to do with personalities. An opera house is a glamourous structure in which fascinating people of talent do just about what they please, to the great delight of the outside world. Opera people may be expected to do most anything. The more irresponsible they are the better we like them. Everything about them is news except, of course, the quality of their art.

And now come critics with the devastating charge that most of our orchestra conductors are by nature and instinct prima donnas and, what is even worse, the public is glad of it. According to them the rapid multiplication of orchestras in this country is no indication of a spread among us of musical culture. The reason for their multiplication is a hankering on the part of the public for more and more conductors who approximate in their persons and habits the meaning of the operatic term, whose present degradation I lamented above. What cares the public for music, say these critics. Do we really love the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, of Schumann and Tschaikowsky? Do we crave the satisfying polyphony of the Brandenburg concertos, the choral vorspiel of Bach? Are we seeking in the bizarre works of the modernists an expression of our own reaction to the present state of things in the world? No! We do not love the classics, they cry, pointing an accusing forefinger at us. We care nothing about the balm of polyphony and are not interested in the least in the expression of the modern spirit. What we are interested in is the personalities of several gentlemen who have good or interesting or provocatively grotesque figures who will utilize orchestral music to display their own musical idiosyncrasies. And the more idiosyncrasies they display the better we like it.

* * *

Let us see if this is true. Before the war there were three major orchestras giving concerts in New York. There was the Symphony Society, at that time called the New York Symphony, the Philharmonic Orchestra, and the visiting Boston Symphony. The New York Symphony was doing then what it is doing now and has done since its inception, that is, presenting the classics and the best contemporary music that came along, to a constant audience. Nobody has ever accused Mr. Damrosch of being a sensational leader, yet his following is a steady growth over a long period. The Philharmonic, after a disastrous experience with Gustav Mahler, flourished for about ten years under Josef Stransky. There was a great deal of silence during Mr. Stransky's incumbency about his lack of qualifications for his exalted position, but every musician in town knew that his qualifications were hardly adequate. Mr. Stransky's success is, however, easily explained. He had a genius for divining the musical tastes of a certain portion of the public that is frightened as a rule by the rumored austerities of symphony concerts. This public he attracted by offers of large doses of musical pap in the form of reiterated chunks of Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Liszt. It came back year after year for more, like drug addicts, and only ceased coming when it was thoroughly surfeited. That ended Mr. Stransky's career with the Philharmonic. A sure sign that his public is dead or turned toward better was his failure to rally them when he assumed for a short time leadership of the State Orchestra. We come now to the Boston Symphony, then led by Dr. Carl Muck.

* * *

I will agree that Dr. Muck was a sensational conductor. He was sensational because he possessed in a unique degree qualities of extraordinary musicianship and the ability to communicate these to his men. He was an austere leader with none of the popular graces that would endear him to the general public. Not in any sense could that dread word prima donna be applied to him. Yet the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck held a place in the public esteem equal to that held by the Philadelphia Orchestra to-day under Leopold Stokowski.

* * *

Coming down to the present we find the Philadelphia Band supreme in the orchestral field. Our critics tell us this supremacy is due to the sensational personality of its leader, Stokowski, who exploits his fine orchestra as a sort of polished looking glass in which he prinks and makes plastic gestures to the satisfaction of smart people who should know better. But how do they account for the success last season of Furtwangler, who is gawky and uncouth, or for the lack of success of Mr. Golschmann, who was slender and charming? Frederick Stock, as sincere and unpretentious a conductor as ever lived, is the darling of Chicago and has been for the last twenty years. How will they account for him and the Chicago Orchestra?

* * *

They can point to the failure of Mr. Bruno Walter last year to make an impression on New York audiences. Mr. Walter, it is generally agreed, is a serious musician and should have had some measure of public success. He is, in all probability, a better musician than Stokowski. So, too, I imagine, is Mr. Dohnanyi, the conductor of the State Symphony. But that is not the point.

* * *

I think that if you will boil down the strictures of critics against the popularity of certain orchestral leaders it will come down to one thing—the fear that the contract of a forceful and dominating personality with great music is detrimental to the right presentation of the music. They fear that Mr. Stokowski is not willing or perhaps is not able to submerge his individuality to the composer's, and that the Philadelphia leader's primary intention, unconscious though it may be, is to present himself. Good music, they contend, is good per se, and gains nothing by passing through anybody's individuality. The thing for a conductor to do, since we can't dispense with one, is to study the individuality of the composer and present it to the audience as faithfully as he can. As a clincher they vow the best way to get the effect of a composition, unadulterated and as the composer had intended it, is to play it yourself on your piano, if you are able.

What they forget is that if you play a composition yourself it passes none the less through a personality. That the personality is your own, is even more damaging to the music unless you happen to possess the training and knowledge and imaginative faculty equal to those of public performers. One does not go to hear Mr. Stokowski or any one else play a Brahms symphony the way Brahms intended it to be played. No one knows the way Brahms intended it to be played, and it would not be final if one did know. For, after all, his would have been only one way of playing it, and there are as many ways as there are people to play it. I want to hear Brahms through a great many different personalities, but the personalities must be extraordinary and compelling. Whatever else he lacks, Mr. Stokowski has certain qualities in an unusual degree; a natural and inexorable rhythmic beat, a rare sense of musical form. Any music passing through Mr. Stokowski's hands will at least have rhythm and form if nothing else. And that is a great deal.

* * *

Anatole France thought that criticism was the adventure of a personality among works of art. I wonder if that is not also true of orchestra conductors and, indeed, of all interpreters whatsoever.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

[illegible]

Mme. Jeritza.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had to curtail the schedule of concerts in New England cities for the present season. Providence, however, remains one of the few cities to be visited and will have the usual series of five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The curtailment has been made necessary by the great demand for concerts in Boston where the three series of 53 concerts are sold out by the season to the last seat. The same condition exists in Cambridge and New York. There is every indication that in Providence, likewise, the series of five will be oversubscribed. The remarkable success of the orchestra and its conductor in Providence last season points to this conclusion which is confirmed by the advance season sale. At the present date the renewal of seats is 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he adopted so successfully in New York and Boston the beginning of last season. They will be chosen not only for their merits as singers or virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especially suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programs embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music.

Serge Koussevitzky opened his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9. He may well be called the most striking figure among the conductors of the day in a country where almost all of the "great" ones are now to be heard.

The public subscription sale will open Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS TODAY.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Toronto at Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 3rd, with this world-famous organization. An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing and vital in orchestral conducting. The advance seat sale will open at the Massey Hall box office today, Thursday, October 29th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON, Oct. 29. (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 30 1

GERICKE, SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR, DIES

Boston, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1925

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. born in Schwarnberg,

---

PROVIDENC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TOLEDO,
OHIO
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

GERICHE, FORMER BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD, DEAD

BOSTON. Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES AT VIENNA

Was Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra and One of Its Builders

Boston, Oct. 29—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

OCT 30 192

FORMER SYMPHONY HEAD DIES

Wilhelm Gericke, Austrian, Was With Boston Orchestra In 80s.

Boston, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received from Vienna today said Mr. Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He was born in Austria in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke

None of the long line of distinguished men who have conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra has been more closely identified with that famous organization than Wilhelm Gericke, who has just died in Vienna at the age of 80. A thoroughly trained musician, with experience in conducting both opera and symphony concerts, he came to Boston 40 odd years ago, in the prime of life, to carry out the purpose of Maj Higginson to establish an orchestra equal to the best in Europe. When he arrived in 1884 the orchestra had been in existence three years and had done good work under Henschel, but it was still far short of the contemporary European standard. It needed more technical skill and a more exacting discipline, and Gericke set himself to supply both, bringing over many talented young musicians, Franz Kneisel among them, and applying himself as drillmaster to the attainment of that flawless perfection which long made "impeccable" almost a byword in Boston.

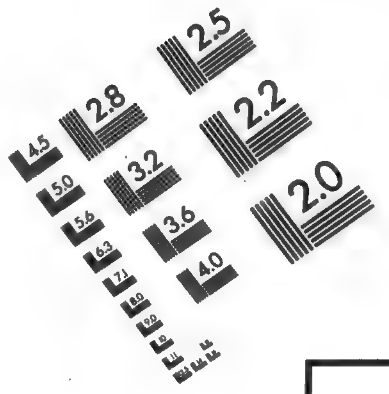
On this side Gericke was almost unrivaled, and while his conducting was often criticized, even in those classical days, as too cold, it is hardly possible to extol too highly his service to Boston and to America in giving at so critical a time a striking lesson in the value of painstaking effort at perfection. He made the orchestra the foremost in America and the equal of any in Europe, and in some respects it has probably never been better than it became under his hands. Technically it declined when his first term expired in 1889, although his successor, Arthur Nikisch, supplied in abundance the "temperament" which he had been accused of lacking, and the decline went further under Emil Paur, so that so fastidious and exacting a conductor as Gericke had many dropped stitches to pick up when he returned for his second term from 1898 to 1906. Like Boston's other conductors he was a storm center of criticism, but even his severest critics freely recognized his good qualities, and in the retrospect the orchestra's indebtedness to him is seen to be great.

In style he was a classicist, in execution a precisionist, in discipline a martinet. Distinguished players would sometimes get so nervous under his eye at rehearsal that they could hardly play when they came to a solo passage, and were in danger of breaking down under the nervous strain, but this stern discipline certainly yielded a marvelous perfection in detail. Gericke's passion for uniformity was amusingly illustrated in the experiment, which he induced Maj Higginson to finance, of providing all the string players with new instruments made by one Austrian maker in order to secure perfect homogeneity of tone. The experiment was not successful, because experience showed that homogeneity was less important than quality, and the players, to their great relief, were allowed to return to their favorite fiddles, most of them old and mellow.

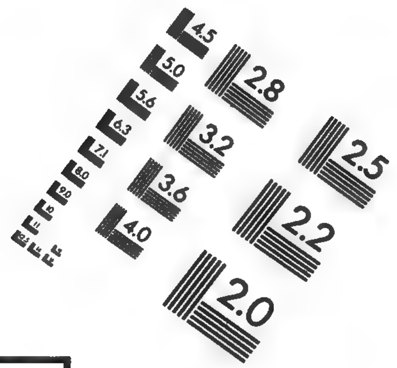
Born in the Styrian town, Graz, Gericke was educated at the Vienna conservatory, and no doubt showed early the masterful traits which, together with his musical talent, marked him out as a conductor. He alternated between Vienna and Boston, returning in 1906 to the Austrian capital, where he lived in retirement until the close of his life.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

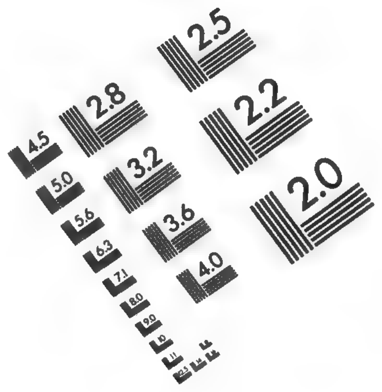
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



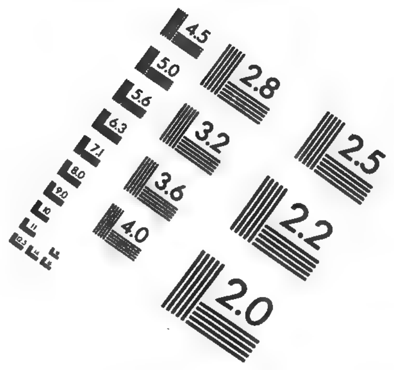
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

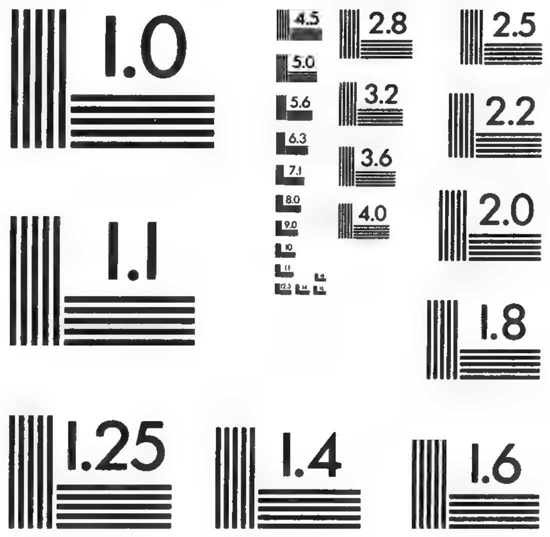


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
7.1
3.6
8.0
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

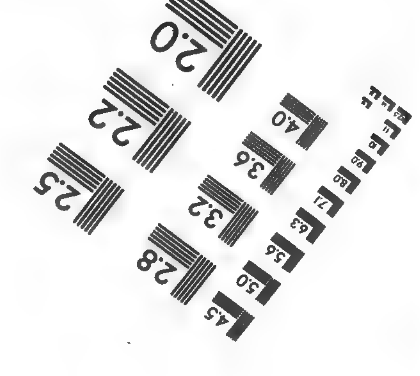
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

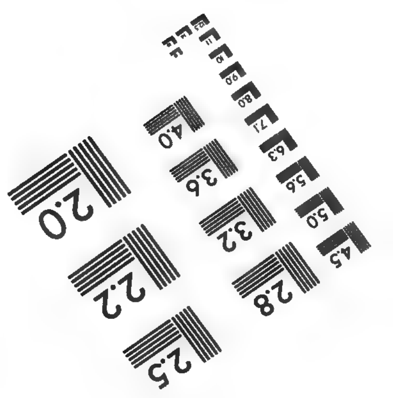
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



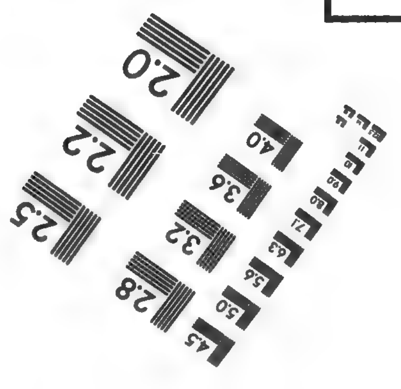
2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



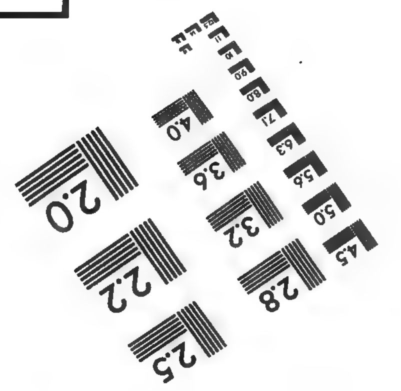
2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5
4.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Serge Koussevitzky

n Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

OCT 25 1925

Concert Pitch

By Samuel Chotzinoff

IN THIS week's New Republic there is a lament by Mr. Virgil Thomson. It is, presumably, an indictment against what he calls "the new musical mountebankery," by which he means our popular orchestra conductors. Mr. Thomson holds them up to derision, calls one of them, Mr. Stokowski, the equivalent, orchestrally speaking, of Babe Ruth and Jackie Coogan, and thinks that the people who admire them are no better than they should be. Mr. Thomson intimates, in effect, that the conductors we flock to hear are nothing more than prima donnas.

⁂

I've often wondered why it is that the term prima donna has become a word of reproach. Originally a title of honor, it is used nowadays to stigmatize, to point the finger of scorn, to condemn, to make ridiculous. In the provinces the word is still held in esteem and many a raucous soprano utilizes it in posters and advertisements, certain of its potency to draw the provincial yokelry. But to be called a prima donna something-or-other in New York is the equivalent of an insult.

⁂

The opera is, of course, responsible for it. Opera has for a long time held an extraordinary position in the general mind. It has something to do with music but much more to do with personalities. An opera house is a glamourous structure in which fascinating people of talent do just about what they please, to the great delight of the outside world. Opera people may be expected to do most anything. The more irresponsible they are the better we like them. Everything about them is news except, of course, the quality of their art.

And now come critics with the devastating charge that most of our orchestra conductors are by nature and instinct prima donnas and, what is even worse, the public is glad of it. According to them the rapid multiplication of orchestras in this country is no indication of a spread among us of musical culture. The reason for their multiplication is a hankering on the part of the public for more and more conductors who approximate in their persons and habits the meaning of the operatic term, whose present degradation I lamented above. What cares the public for music, say these critics. Do we really love the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, of Schumann and Tschaikowsky? Do we crave the satisfying polyphony of the Brandenburg concertos, the choral vorspiel of Bach? Are we seeking in the bizarre works of the modernists an expression of our own reaction to the present state of things in the world? No! We do not love the classics, they cry, pointing an accusing forefinger at us. We care nothing about the balm of polyphony and are not interested in the least in the expression of the modern spirit. What we are interested in is the personalities of several gentlemen who have good or interesting or provocatively grotesque figures who will utilize orchestral music to display their own musical idiosyncrasies. And the more idiosyncrasies they display the better we like it.

⁂

Let us see if this is true. Before the war there were three major orchestras giving concerts in New York. There was the Symphony Society, at that time called the New York Symphony, the Philharmonic Orchestra, and the visiting Boston Symphony. The New York Symphony was doing then what it is doing now and has done since its inception, that is, presenting the classics and the best contemporary music that came along, to a constant audience. Nobody has ever accused Mr. Damrosch of being a sensational leader, yet his following is a steady growth over a long period. The Philharmonic, after a disastrous experience with Gustav Mahler, flourished for about ten years under Josef Stransky. There was a great deal of silence during Mr. Stransky's incumbency about his lack of qualifications for his exalted position, but every musician in town knew that his qualifications were hardly adequate. Mr. Stransky's success is, however, easily explained. He had a genius for divining the musical tastes of a certain portion of the public that is frightened as a rule by the rumored austerities of symphony concerts. This public he attracted by offers of large doses of musical pap in the form of reiterated chunks of Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Liszt. It came back year after year for more, rug addicts, and [illegible] coming when it was thoroughly [illegible] feited. That ended Mr. Stransky's career with the Philhar sure sign that his public is dead or turned toward better t as his failure to rally them when he assumed for a short tim leadership of the State Orchestra. We come now to the Bo Symphony, then led by Dr. Carl Muck.

⁂

I will agree that Dr. Muck was a sensational conductor. H was sensational because he possessed in a unique degree qualitie of extraordinary musicianship and the ability to communicate these to his men. He was an austere leader with none of the popular graces that would endear him to the general public. Not in any sense could that dread word prima donna be applied to him. Yet the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck held a place in the public esteem equal to that held by the Philadelphia Orchestra to-day under Leopold Stokowski.

⁂

Coming down to the present we find the Philadelphia Band supreme in the orchestral field. Our critics tell us this supremacy is due to the sensational personality of its leader, Stokowski, who exploits his fine orchestra as a sort of polished looking glass in which he prinks and makes plastic gestures to the satisfaction of smart people who should know better. But how do they account for the success last season of Furtwangler, who is gawky and uncouth, or for the lack of success of Mr. Golschmann, who was slender and charming? Frederick Stock, as sincere and unpretentious a conductor as ever lived, is the darling of Chicago and has been for the last twenty years. How will they account for him and the Chicago Orchestra?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

[illegible]

Mme. Jeritza.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had to curtail the schedule of concerts in New England cities for the present season. Providence, however, remains one of the few cities to be visited and will have the usual series of five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The curtailment has been made necessary by the great demand for concerts in Boston where the three series of 53 concerts are sold out by the season to the last seat. The same condition exists in Cambridge and New York. There is every indication that in Providence, likewise, the series of five will be oversubscribed. The remarkable success of the orchestra and its conductor in Providence last season points to this conclusion which is confirmed by the advance season sale. At the present date the renewal of seats is 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he adopted so successfully in New York and Boston the beginning of last season. They will be chosen not only for their merits as singers or virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especially suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programs embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music.

Serge Koussevitzky opened his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9. He may well be called the most striking figure among the conductors of the day in a country where almost all of the "great" ones are now to be heard.

The public subscription sale will open Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS TODAY.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Toronto at Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 3rd, with this world-famous organization. An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing and vital in orchestral conducting. The advance seat sale will open at the Massey Hall box office today, Thursday, October 29th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON, Oct. 29. (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 30 19

GERICKE, SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR, DIES

Boston, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1925

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. ~~A cablegram~~ received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been second [illegible] in Schwarnberg, basses.

PROVIDENC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO,
OHIO
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

GERICHE, FORMER BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD, DEAD

BOSTON. Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES AT VIENNA

Was Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra and One of Its Builders

Boston, Oct. 29—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

OCT 30 192

FORMER SYMPHONY HEAD DIES

Wilhelm Gericke, Austrian, Was With Boston Orchestra In 80s.

Boston, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. ~~A cablegram~~ received from Vienna today said Mr. Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He was born in Austria in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke

None of the long line of distinguished men who have conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra has been more ~~closely identified~~ with that famous organization than Wilhelm Gericke, who has just died in Vienna at the age of 80. A thoroughly trained musician, with experience in conducting both opera and symphony concerts, he came to Boston 40 odd years ago, in the prime of life, to carry out the purpose of Maj Higginson to establish an orchestra equal to the best in Europe. When he arrived in 1884 the orchestra had been in existence three years and had done good work under Henschel, but it was still far short of the contemporary European standard. It needed more technical skill and a more exacting discipline, and Gericke set himself to supply both, bringing over many talented young musicians, Franz Kneisel among them, and applying himself as drillmaster to the attainment of that flawless perfection which long made "impeccable" almost a byword in Boston.

On this side Gericke was almost unrivaled, and while his conducting was often criticized, even in those classical days, as too cold, it is hardly possible to extol too highly his service to Boston and to America in giving at so critical a time a striking lesson in the value of painstaking effort at perfection. He made the orchestra the foremost in America and the equal of any in Europe, and in some respects it has probably never been better than it became under his hands. Technically it declined when his first term expired in 1889, although his successor, Arthur Nikisch, supplied in abundance the "temperament" which he had been accused of lacking, and the decline went further under Emil Paur, so that so fastidious and exacting a conductor as Gericke had many dropped stitches to pick up when he returned for his second term from 1898 to 1906. Like Boston's other conductors he was a storm center of criticism, but even his severest critics freely recognized his good qualities, and in the retrospect the orchestra's indebtedness to him is seen to be great.

In style he was a classicist, in execution a precisionist, in discipline a martinet. Distinguished players would sometimes get so nervous under his eye at rehearsal that they could hardly play when they came to a solo passage, and were in danger of breaking down under the nervous strain, but this stern discipline certainly yielded a marvelous perfection in detail. Gericke's passion for uniformity was amusingly illustrated in the experiment, which he induced Maj Higginson to finance, of providing all the string players with new instruments made by one Austrian maker in order to secure perfect homogeneity of tone. The experiment was not successful, because experience showed that homogeneity was less important than quality, and the players, to their great relief, were allowed to return to their favorite fiddles, most of them old and mellow.

Born in the Styrian town, Graz, Gericke was educated at the Vienna conservatory, and no doubt showed early the masterful traits which, ogether with his musical talent, narked him out as a conductor. He lternated between Vienna and Boson, returning in 1906 to the Ausl, where he lived in retil the close of his life.

130

Serge Koussevitzky

[illegible] of the Boston Symphony

Concert Pitch

By Samuel Chotzinoff

IN THIS week's New Republic there is a lament by Mr. Virgil Thomson. It is, presumably, an indictment against what he calls "the new musical mountebankery," by which he means our popular orchestra conductors. Mr. Thomson holds them up to derision, calls one of them, Mr. Stokowski, the equivalent, orchestrally speaking, of Babe Ruth and Jackie Coogan, and thinks that the people who admire them are no better than they should be. Mr. Thomson intimates, in effect, that the conductors we flock to hear are nothing more than prima donnas.

⁂

I've often wondered why it is that the term prima donna has become a word of reproach. Originally a title of honor, it is used nowadays to stigmatize, to point the finger of scorn, to condemn, to make ridiculous. In the provinces the word is still held in esteem and many a raucous soprano utilizes it in posters and advertisements, certain of its potency to draw the provincial yokelry. But to be called a prima donna something-or-other in New York is the equivalent of an insult.

⁂

The opera is, of course, responsible for it. Opera has for a long time held an extraordinary position in the general mind. It has something to do with music but much more to do with personalities. An opera house is a glamourous structure in which fascinating people of talent do just about what they please, to the great delight of the outside world. Opera people may be expected to do most anything. The more irresponsible they are the better we like them. Everything about them is news except, of course, the quality of their art.

And now come critics with the devastating charge that most of our orchestra conductors are by nature and instinct prima donnas and, what is even worse, the public is glad of it. According to them the rapid multiplication of orchestras in this country is no indication of a spread among us of musical culture. The reason for their multiplication is a hankering on the part of the public for more and more conductors who approximate in their persons and habits the meaning of the operatic term, whose present degradation I lamented above. What cares the public for music, say these critics. Do we really love the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, of Schumann and Tschaikowsky? Do we crave the satisfying polyphony of the Brandenburg concertos, the choral vorspiel of Bach? Are we seeking in the bizarre works of the modernists an expression of our own reaction to the present state of things in the world? No! We do not love the classics, they cry, pointing an accusing forefinger at us. We care nothing about the balm of polyphony and are not interested in the least in the expression of the modern spirit. What we are interested in is the personalities of several gentlemen who have good or interesting or provocatively grotesque figures who will utilize orchestral music to display their own musical idiosyncrasies. And the more idiosyncrasies they display the better we like it.

⁂

Let us see if this is true. Before the war there were three major orchestras giving concerts in New York. There was the Symphony Society, at that time called the New York Symphony, the Philharmonic Orchestra, and the visiting Boston Symphony. The New York Symphony was doing then what it is doing now and has done since its inception, that is, presenting the classics and the best contemporary music that came along, to a constant audience. Nobody has ever accused Mr. Damrosch of being a sensational leader, yet his following is a steady growth over a long period. The Philharmonic, after a disastrous experience with Gustav Mahler, flourished for about ten years under Josef Stransky. There was a great deal of silence during Mr. Stransky's incumbency about his lack of qualifications for his exalted position, but every musician in town knew that his qualifications were hardly adequate. Mr. Stransky's success is, however, easily explained. He had a genius for divining the musical tastes of a certain portion of the public that is frightened as a rule by the rumored austerities of symphony concerts. This public he attracted by offers of large doses of musical pap in the form of reiterated chunks of Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Liszt. It came back year after year for more, [illegible] drug addicts, and [illegible] coming when it was thoroughly [illegible] ic. [illegible]feited. That ended Mr. Stransky's career with the Philhar[illegible] sure sign that his public is dead or turned toward better t[illegible] as his failure to rally them when he assumed for a short tim[illegible] leadership of the State Orchestra. We come now to the Bo[illegible] Symphony, then led by Dr. Carl Muck.

⁂

I will agree that Dr. Muck was a sensational conductor. H[illegible] was sensational because he possessed in a unique degree qualitie[illegible] of extraordinary musicianship and the ability to communicate these to his men. He was an austere leader with none of the popular graces that would endear him to the general public. Not in any sense could that dread word prima donna be applied to him. Yet the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck held a place in the public esteem equal to that held by the Philadelphia Orchestra to-day under Leopold Stokowski.

⁂

Coming down to the present we find the Philadelphia Band supreme in the orchestral field. Our critics tell us this supremacy is due to the sensational personality of its leader, Stokowski, who exploits his fine orchestra as a sort of polished looking glass in which he prinks and makes plastic gestures to the satisfaction of smart people who should know better. But how do they account for the success last season of Furtwangler, who is gawky and uncouth, or for the lack of success of Mr. Golschmann, who was slender and charming? Frederick Stock, as sincere and unpretentious a conductor as ever lived, is the darling of Chicago and has been for the last twenty years. How will they account for him and the Chicago Orchestra?

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1925

Mme. Jeritza.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had to curtail the schedule of concerts in New England cities for the present season. Providence, however, remains one of the few cities to be visited and will have the usual series of five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The curtailment has been made necessary by the great demand for concerts in Boston where the three series of 53 concerts are sold out by the season to the last seat. The same condition exists in Cambridge and New York. There is every indication that in Providence, likewise, the series of five will be oversubscribed. The remarkable success of the orchestra and its conductor in Providence last season points to this conclusion which is confirmed by the advance season sale. At the present date the renewal of seats is 25 per cent. greater than last year.

Koussevitzky will select the soloists for the Providence concerts this season according to the policy which he adopted so successfully in New York and Boston the beginning of last season. They will be chosen not only for their merits as singers or virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especially suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programs embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music.

Serge Koussevitzky opened his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9. He may well be called the most striking figure among the conductors of the day in a country where almost all of the "great" ones are now to be heard.

The public subscription sale will open Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS TODAY.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Toronto at Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 3rd, with this world-famous organization. An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing and vital in orchestral conducting. The advance seat sale will open at the Massey Hall box office today, Thursday, October 29th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON, Oct. 29. (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 30 19[illegible]

GERICKE, SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR, DIES

Boston, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1925

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. ~~A cablegram~~ received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been [illegible] in Schwarnberg, second [illegible]

basses.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TOLEDO,
OHIO
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

GERICHE, FORMER BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD, DEAD

BOSTON. Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES AT VIENNA

Was Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra and One of Its Builders

Boston, Oct. 29—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

OCT 30 192[illegible]

FORMER SYMPHONY HEAD DIES

Wilhelm Gericke, Austrian, Was With Boston Orchestra In 80s.

Boston, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. ~~A cablegram~~ received from Vienna today said Mr. Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He was born in Austria in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke

None of the long line of distinguished men who have conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra has been more ~~closely identified~~ with that famous organization than Wilhelm Gericke, who has just died in Vienna at the age of 80. A thoroughly trained musician, with experience in conducting both opera and symphony concerts, he came to Boston 40 odd years ago, in the prime of life, to carry out the purpose of Maj Higginson to establish an orchestra equal to the best in Europe. When he arrived in 1884 the orchestra had been in existence three years and had done good work under Henschel, but it was still far short of the contemporary European standard. It needed more technical skill and a more exacting discipline, and Gericke set himself to supply both, bringing over many talented young musicians, Franz Kneisel among them, and applying himself as drillmaster to the attainment of that flawless perfection which long made "impeccable" almost a byword in Boston.

On this side Gericke was almost unrivaled, and while his conducting was often criticized, even in those classical days, as too cold, it is hardly possible to extol too highly his service to Boston and to America in giving at so critical a time a striking lesson in the value of painstaking effort at perfection. He made the orchestra the foremost in America and the equal of any in Europe, and in some respects it has probably never been better than it became under his hands. Technically it declined when his first term expired in 1889, although his successor, Arthur Nikisch, supplied in abundance the "temperament" which he had been accused of lacking, and the decline went further under Emil Paur, so that so fastidious and exacting a conductor as Gericke had many dropped stitches to pick up when he returned for his second term from 1898 to 1906. Like Boston's other conductors he was a storm center of criticism, but even his severest critics freely recognized his good qualities, and in the retrospect the orchestra's indebtedness to him is seen to be great.

In style he was a classicist, in execution a precisionist, in discipline a martinet. Distinguished players would sometimes get so nervous under his eye at rehearsal that they could hardly play when they came to a solo passage, and were in danger of breaking down under the nervous strain, but this stern discipline certainly yielded a marvelous perfection in detail. Gericke's passion for uniformity was amusingly illustrated in the experiment, which he induced Maj Higginson to finance, of providing all the string players with new instruments made by one Austrian maker in order to secure perfect homogeneity of tone. The experiment was not successful, because experience showed that homogeneity was less important than quality, and the players, to their great relief, were allowed to return to their favorite fiddles, most of them old and mellow.

Born in the Styrian town, Graz, Gericke was educated at the Vienna conservatory, and no doubt showed early the masterful traits which, [illegible]ogether with his musical talent, [illegible]narked him out as a conductor. He [illegible]lternated between Vienna and Bos[illegible]on, returning in 1906 to the Aus[illegible]l, where he lived in re[illegible]til the close of his life.

Concert Pitch

By Samuel Chotzinoff

IN THIS week's New Republic there is a lament by Mr. Virgil Thomson. It is, presumably, an indictment against what he calls "the new musical mountebankery," by which he means our popular orchestra conductors. Mr. Thomson holds them up to derision, calls one of them, Mr. Stokowski, the equivalent, orchestrally speaking, of Babe Ruth and Jackie Coogan, and thinks that the people who admire them are no better than they should be. Mr. Thomson intimates, in effect, that the conductors we flock to hear are nothing more than prima donnas.

* * *

I've often wondered why it is that the term prima donna has become a word of reproach. Originally a title of honor, it is used nowadays to [illegible], to point the finger of scorn, to condemn, to make ridiculous. In the provinces the word is still held in esteem and many a raucous soprano utilizes it in posters and advertisements, certain of its potency to draw the provincial yokelry. But to be called a prima donna something-or-other in New York is the equivalent of an insult.

* * *

The opera is, of course, responsible for it. Opera has for a long time held an extraordinary position in the general mind. It has something to do with music but much more to do with personalities. An opera house is a glamourous structure in which fascinating people of talent do just about what they please, to the great delight of the outside world. Opera people may be expected to do most anything. The more irresponsible they are the better we like them. Everything about them is news except, of course, the quality of their art.

And now come critics with the devastating charge that most of our orchestra conductors are by nature and instinct prima donnas and, what is even worse, the public is glad of it. According to them the rapid multiplication of orchestras in this country is no indication of a spread among us of musical culture. The reason for their multiplication is a hankering on the part of the public for more and more conductors who approximate in their persons and habits the meaning of the operatic term, whose present degradation I lamented above. What cares the public for music, say these critics. Do we really love the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, of Schumann and Tschaikowsky? Do we crave the satisfying polyphony of the Brandenburg concertos, the choral vorspiel of Bach? Are we seeking in the bizarre works of the modernists an expression of our own reaction to the present state of things in the world? No! We do not love the classics, they cry, pointing an accusing forefinger at us. We care nothing about the balm of polyphony and are not interested in the least in the expression of the modern spirit. What we are interested in is the personalities of several gentlemen who have good or interesting or provocatively grotesque figures who will utilize orchestral music to display their own musical idiosyncrasies. And the more idiosyncrasies they display the better we like it.

* * *

Let us see if this is true. Before the war there were three major orchestras giving concerts in New York. There was the Symphony Society, at that time called the New York Symphony, the Philharmonic Orchestra, and the visiting Boston Symphony. The New York Symphony was doing then what it is doing now and has done since its inception, that is, presenting the classics and the best contemporary music that came along, to a constant audience. Nobody has ever accused Mr. Damrosch of being a sensational leader, yet his following is a steady growth over a long period. The Philharmonic, after a disastrous experience with Gustav Mahler, flourished for about ten years under Josef Stransky. There was a great deal of silence during Mr. Stransky's incumbency about his lack of qualifications for his exalted position, but every musician in town knew that his qualifications were hardly adequate. Mr. Stransky's success is, however, easily explained. He had a genius for divining the musical tastes of a certain portion of the public that is frightened as a rule by the rumored austerities of symphony concerts. This public he attracted by offers of large doses of musical pap in the form of reiterated chunks of Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Liszt. It came back year after year for more, [illegible] ceased coming when it was thoroughly [illegible] drug addicts, and only ceased [illegible] music. [illegible]feited. That ended Mr. Stransky's career with the Philhar[illegible] sure sign that his public is dead or turned toward better [illegible] as his failure to rally them when he assumed for a short tim[illegible] leadership of the State Orchestra. We come now to the Bo[illegible] Symphony, then led by Dr. Carl Muck.

* * *

I will agree that Dr. Muck was a sensational conductor. H[illegible] was sensational because he possessed in a unique degree qualitie[illegible] of extraordinary musicianship and the ability to communicate these to his men. He was an austere leader with none of the popular graces that would endear him to the general public. Not in any sense could that dread word prima donna be applied to him. Yet the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck held a place in the public esteem equal to that held by the Philadelphia Orchestra to-day under Leopold Stokowski.

* * *

Coming down to the present we find the Philadelphia Band supreme in the orchestral field. Our critics tell us this supremacy is due to the sensational personality of its leader, Stokowski, who exploits his fine orchestra as a sort of polished looking glass in which he prinks and makes plastic gestures to the satisfaction of smart people who should know better. But how do they account for the success last season of Furtwangler, who is gawky and uncouth, or for the lack of success of Mr. Golschmann, who was slender and charming? Frederick Stock, as sincere and unpretentious a conductor as ever lived, is the darling of Chicago and has been for the last twenty years. How will they account for him and the Chicago Orchestra?

* * *

They can point to the failure of Mr. Bruno Walter last year to make an impression on New York audiences. Mr. Walter, it is generally agreed, is a serious musician and should have had some measure of public success. He is, in all probability, a better musician than Stokowski. So, too, I imagine, is Mr. Dohnanyi, the conductor of the State Symphony. But that is not the point.

* * *

I think that if you will boil down the strictures of critics against the popularity of certain orchestral leaders it will come down to one thing—the fear that the contract of a forceful and dominating personality with great music is detrimental to the right presentation of the music. They fear that Mr. Stokowski is not willing or perhaps is not able to submerge his individuality to the composer's, and that the Philadelphia leader's primary intention, unconscious though it may be, is to present himself. Good music, they contend, is good per se, and gains nothing by passing through anybody's individuality. The thing for a conductor to do, since we can't dispense with one, is to study the individuality of the composer and present it to the audience as faithfully as he can. As a clincher they vow the best way to get the effect of a composition, unadulterated and as the composer had intended it, is to play it yourself on your piano, if you are able.

What they forget is that if you play a composition yourself it passes none the less through a personality. That the personality is your own, is even more damaging to the music unless you happen to possess the training and knowledge and imaginative faculty equal to those of public performers. One does not go to hear Mr. Stokowski or any one else play a Brahms symphony the way Brahms intended it to be played. No one knows the way Brahms intended it to be played, and it would not be final if one did know. For, after all, his would have been only one way of playing it, and there are as many ways as there are people to play it. I want to hear Brahms through a great many different personalities, but the personalities must be extraordinary and compelling. Whatever else he lacks, Mr. Stokowski has certain qualities in an unusual degree; a natural and inexorable rhythmic beat, a rare sense of musical form. Any music passing through Mr. Stokowski's hands will at least have rhythm and form if nothing else. And that is a great deal.

* * *

Anatole France thought that criticism was the adventure of a personality among works of art. I wonder if that is not also true of orchestra conductors and, indeed, of all interpreters whatsoever.

---

merits as singers or virtuosi, but in the interest of special scores for which their genius is especially suited. This gives the conductor freedom to make his five programs embrace the vast and rich repertory of orchestral music.

Serge Koussevitzky opened his second season in America, in Boston, on Oct. 9. He may well be called the most striking figure among the conductors of the day in a country where almost all of the "great" ones are now to be heard.

The public subscription sale will open Monday, Nov. 2, at Steinert's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS TODAY.

Probably no conductor who has come to our shores for a number of years has attracted so much attention and interest as Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear in Toronto at Massey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 3rd, with this world-famous organization. An enviable reputation preceded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name has stood for all that is striking, engrossing and vital in orchestral conducting. The advance seat sale will open at the Massey Hall box office today, Thursday, October 29th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 29 1925

BOSTON, Oct. 29. (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 30 1925

GERICKE, SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR, DIES

Boston, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

OCT 30 1925

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been [illegible] born in Schwarnberg,

---

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

GERICHE, FORMER BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD, DEAD

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES AT VIENNA

Was Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra and One of Its Builders

Boston, Oct. 29—(AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

OCT 30 192

FORMER SYMPHONY HEAD DIES

Wilhelm Gericke, Austrian, Was With Boston Orchestra In 80s.

Boston, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received from Vienna today said Mr. Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He was born in Austria in 1845.

---

that flawless perfection which made "impeccable" almost a word in Boston.

On this side Gericke was al[illegible] unrivaled, and while his conduc[illegible] was often criticized, even in t[illegible] classical days, as too cold, it is h[illegible]ly possible to extol too highly service to Boston and to Americ[illegible] giving at so critical a time a st[illegible]ing lesson in the value of pains[illegible]ing effort at perfection. He m[illegible] the orchestra the foremost in Am[illegible]ica and the equal of any in Eur[illegible] and in some respects it has proba[illegible] never been better than it became [illegible]der his hands. Technically it [illegible]clined when his first term expi[illegible] in 1889, although his succes[illegible] Arthur Nikisch, supplied in ab[illegible]dance the "temperament" which [illegible] had been accused of lacking, a[illegible] the decline went further under E[illegible] Paur, so that so fastidious and [illegible]acting a conductor as Gericke h[illegible] many dropped stitches to pick [illegible] when he returned for his seco[illegible] term from 1898 to 1906. Like Bo[illegible]ton's other conductors he was [illegible] storm center of criticism, but ev[illegible] his severest critics freely recogniz[illegible] his good qualities, and in the re[illegible]rospect the orchestra's indebtedne[illegible] to him is seen to be great.

In style he was a classicist, in e[illegible]ecution a precisionist, in discipline [illegible] martinet. Distinguished playe[illegible] would sometimes get so nervous u[illegible]der his eye at rehearsal that the[illegible] could hardly play when they cam[illegible] to a solo passage, and were in dan[illegible]ger of breaking down under th[illegible] nervous strain, but this stern dis[illegible]cipline certainly yielded a marvelou[illegible] perfection in detail. Gericke's pas[illegible]sion for uniformity was amusingl[illegible] illustrated in the experiment, whic[illegible] he induced Maj Higginson t[illegible] finance, of providing all the strin[illegible] players with new instruments mad[illegible] by one Austrian maker in order t[illegible] secure perfect homogeneity of ton[illegible] The experiment was not successfu[illegible] because experience showed tha[illegible] homogeneity was less importan[illegible] than quality, and the players, t[illegible] their great relief, were allowed t[illegible] return to their favorite fiddles, mo[illegible] of them old and mellow.

Born in the Styrian town, Gra[illegible] Gericke was educated at the Vienn[illegible] conservatory, and no doubt showe[illegible] early the masterful traits whic[illegible] together with his musical talen[illegible] marked him out as a conductor. H[illegible] alternated between Vienna and Bo[illegible]on, returning in 1906 to the Au[illegible]rian capital, where he lived in r[illegible]irement until the close of his life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

CT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, Noted Orchestra Conductor, Dies

Director of Boston Symphony Thirteen Years Succumbs in Vienna at Eighty

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here to-day from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, Austria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

Boston Conductor 13 Years

Wilhelm Gericke, one of the most noted conductors of his day, was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the longest with that organization, from which he resigned in 1906 after a total service of thirteen years.

Mr. Gericke studied at the Vienna Conservatorium from 1862 to 1865, and then went to Linz as conductor. He accepted, in 1874, second conductorship of the Hofoper, in Vienna, where he was asscoiated with Hans Richter. In 1880, he succeeded Herbeck as conductor of the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (Society of the Friends of Music) holding this post until 1884, when he went to America to succeed George (now Sir George) Henschel as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had first heard him conducting a performance of "Aida" in Vienna, and on the next day began the conversations that ended with his engagement.

Resigned in Ill Health

During his first term, in 1887, the Boston Symphony made its first appearance in New York, in Steinway Hall, beginning its unbroken series of visits here. In 1889, after his fifth season, Gericke resigned on account of his health, "thoroughly overworked," as he phrased it, and returned to Vienna. There he again became conductor of the Friends of Music, remaining in that post until 1895. After three years of rest, including a stay in Dresden, he accepted Major Higginson's invitation to resume the leadership of the Boston Symphony, in 1898, succeeding Emil Paur, who became conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

He remained in charge for eight seasons until 1906, when his resignation drew expressions of profound regret. Gericke was generally credited with the development of the Boston Symphony during his first term, into an organization of high artistic standing. During his second term it maintained a notable reputation as one of the world's best orchestras.

Retired in 1906

He resigned in 1906, owing to failure to agree upon terms for the renewal of his contract, and returned to Vienna to live in retirement. In November, 1922, is was reported that he was facing poverty at the age of seventy-seven, owing to the loss of his savings through the war and the depreciation of Austrian currency. Later, however, it was learned that his circumstances, though straitened, were not desperate.

His compositions include an overture, a septet, a piano trio and quintet, a string quartet, two violin and two piano sonatas, the operetta "Schön Hännchen" and many songs.

Conductors Pay Tributes

Dr. Frank Damrosch, head of the Institute of Musical Art, said, when he heard of Mr. Gericke's death, "He was my very good personal friend and one for whom I had the highest regard as a musician and a man. He deserves a first rank in any history of America's musical development."

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, said America owes a deep debt of gratitude to Gericke. "Mr. Gericke was a musician of the finest type. As a man he was simple and lovable," Mr. Damrosch said.

Ernest Von Dohnanyi, the State Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor, said he had great respect for Gericke as a serious and scholarly musician. Gericke first brought him from Budapest to America, he explained.

Artur Bodanzky, the Metropolitan conductor, said that when he was a small boy in Vienna he had seen Gericke conduct for the Friends of Music. He regarded Gericke as a wonderful conductor and a charming gentleman.

Arthur Foote, the composer, who is Newton Centre, Mass., said: "Wil n Gericke's service to music as con tor of the Boston Orchestra can t be overestimated."

George W. Chadwick, the composer, d in Boston: "From ordinary ma ial he developed an orchestra which beauty of tone and clarity of per mance had no superior in America hat time."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR, DIES

Famous Viennese Led Boston Symphony Orchestra for Many Seasons.

Wilhelm Gericke, 80, famous conductor and at one time director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last Tuesday at his home, in Vienna. Death was due to old age after an illness of some length. He was born in Styria, Austria. He studied at his Vienna Conservatorium from 1862 until 1865. At that time he went to Linz as conductor. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vienna Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geshellschaft concerts and also directed the Singverein in that city. He soon gained reputation as a drillmaster of extraordinary persistence and ability and as a musician of the highest ideals. Invited by Major Higginson to come to America, he foresaw the opportunity that was given him in Boston to create by systematic and unremitting labor an orchestra that could equal the greatest organizations of the kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was from 1884 to 1889. He was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. During this time he returned to Vienna where he resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts until 1885, returning to Boston for his second term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. In 190 he retired to private life in America.

His compositions include an overture, a septet, a piano trio and quintet, a string quartet, two violin and two piano sonatas, the operetta "Schon Hannchen" and many songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OREGONIAN
PORTLAND, ORE.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES

Symphony Director, Formerly of Boston, Succumbs in Vienna.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, formerly director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead.

A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in/Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PIONEER PRESS
ST. PAUL, MINN.

OCT 30 1925

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR DIES.

Wilhelm Gericke Succumbs in Vienna After Long Illness.

(By Associated Press)

Boston, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came from Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday.

He had long been ill. He was born in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday at the age of 80, it was learned in Boston to-day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1925

EX-LEADER OF SYMPHONY DEAD

Boston, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for more than 13 years, died in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday, according to dispatches from that city. He had been sick for some time.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, on April 14, 1845, Gericke first showed traces of the talent that later developed into musical genius when he was 15 years old. As a result he was sent to the Vienna Conservatory, where he made rapid progress and on graduating was accorded the position as one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the imperial opera.

In 1884, while he was still under 40, he came to America to take charge of the Boston orchestra, which had been founded three years previously. Henry Lee Higginson had heard him conduct in Austria a few months before and had been so favorably impressed that he engaged him almost on the spot.

For about a year Gericke made the best of the musical material that he had found in the orchestra and then he sent to Vienna for a number of younger and more skillful men. He was a strict disciplinarian, but possessed a charming personality which attracted and held the players.

In 1889 it was announced that his health had been undermined by the New England climate and following a tour as far West as St. Louis and a farewell testimonial concert here he resigned. In 1898 he again accepted an invitation to lead the organization and remained conductor of the orchestra until 1906. It was during his terms that the Boston Symphony first gave concerts in cities outside of New England and began to win its reputation as one of the finest musical organizations in the world.

When word came in 1922 that Gericke was in financial difficulties, a special benefit concert was given by the orchestra and the gross proceeds were forwarded to the musician.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(A.P.)—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orcehstra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded had died on Tuesday. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1835.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Globe-Democrat

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies in Vienna.

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, MASS., October 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Syria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies in Vienna.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 30.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOLYOKE
MASS.
Transcript
ISSUE OF

30 1925

A Man Who Brought Music to America

The reason why America will pay special attention to the death of William Gericke in Vienna yesterday is that to him more than to any other one man, unless one excepts Mr. Higginson, who financed it, we owe the development of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Boston, with all its culture and its atmosphere, lacked a great orchestra. There was no city in New England other than in Boston, where an orchestra might be developed. George Henschel was the first director when the orchestra was started in 1881. He kept the few orchestral men together, but Mr. Gericke himself said of the organization when he first met it, "There are some musicians but it is hardly an orchestra." For five years Gericke had a fre hand and such an instrument for orchestra playing he did bring together. Boston's fame as the home of a great orchestra was established

After five years Mr. Gericke had to go home. Boston east winds were too much for him. But he was able to come back again in 1898 to an orchestra that was still growing, still enlarging its following and increasing its leadership. He gave it eight years of the most brilliant leadership and assured its permanence. It was during this period that Boston was able to build Symphony Hall and have a fine permanent home for music. For Gericke was not merely a great conductor and builder of a splendid orchestra. He had personal powers that brought the public along with him. His men loved him; Boston cherished him. He was a musician and he was a fine man, able to make music a creative force for the world he served.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had its ups and downs and there is the regime of Muck that is still remembered for unpleasant personal developments at the time of the World war. It is again a great body, splendidly lead. Its history up to now will give to the Gericke leadership the golden chapter when classicism in music stood at the top, but never forgot that music is a living force and grows with each generation. If he loved his Brahms, Beethoven and Mozart, he knew that newcomers were expressing their time and he must give them place. Musical, artistic and aristocratic Boston loved Gericke and took him to heart more completely than any conductor the Boston Symphony has ever had. He was 80 years old at his death, his later years saddened, as were the years of so many of his countrymen by the World war and the shattering of world ties that had been made personally by great artists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Symphony Ex-Leader Dies in Vienna

BOSTON, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday, at the age of 80 years, according to cable dispatches. He is recalled as the man who more than any other made the Symphony orchestra what it is today.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, in April, 1845, Gericke's musical education was received almost solely at the Vienna conservatory, where he made such progress that upon graduation he accepted the position of one of the three leaders at the Imperial Opera in Vienna.

He was brought to this country in 1884 by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson to become the second leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, then in its fourth year, holding the position until 1889, and returning here in 1898 to be leader again for eight years.

A year or more after he first took command of the orche
compl
Vien me
p
A

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 30 1925

Former Boston Symphony Leader Dead in Vienna

BOSTON, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Kericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than 13 years, die in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday cording to dispatches from th He had been sick for som

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FALL RIVER
MASS.
Globe 131
ISSUE OF
OCT 30 1925

EX-SYMPHONY LEADER DEAD

BOSTON, Oct. 30. (AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here yesterday from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

OCT 30 1925

NOTED MUSICIAN DIES.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gerricks, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gerricks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884 three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
Plaindealer

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO

OCT 31 1925

Wilhelm Gericke.

Vienna reports the death at 80 of Wilhelm Gericke, remembered by American friends of music as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906. Many Brooklynites will remember the concerts he gave with the Boston Orchestra at the old Academy of Music and at the Baptist Temple.

Major Henry L. Higginson founded and endowed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. George Henschel (now Sir George Henschel) was its first conductor. Upon his return to England three years later he was succeeded by Gericke, called from Vienna where he was one of the conductors at the Imperial Court Opera House.

Gericke's health broke down after his fifth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereupon he returned to Europe for a rest. Emil Paur, his successor at Boston, became conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1898 and Gericke, having recuperated, again became conductor of the Boston Orchestra until he resigned in 1906.

A thorough and indefatigable and conscientious conductor, Gericke never became one of the conducting virtuosos aptly called "Primadonna-Kepellmeister" in the lingo of musicians. He was more like his teacher, Herbeck, whom he succeeded for a while both in the Vienna Opera and in the Society of Music-Friends in Vienna.

Gericke did not shine much as a composer. He limited himself to the field of chamber music, producing a number of scholarly works. In his youth he composed an operetta and a number of songs.

The war hit Gericke hard. Owi to the depreciation of the cro lost all his savings. Howev of his American friends succor and kept the door during Geri irresistibly,

---

managers ex
of thanks to 131

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

T30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, Noted Orchestra Conductor, Dies

Director of Boston Symphony Thirteen Years Succumbs in Vienna at Eighty

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here to-day from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, Austria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

Boston Conductor 13 Years

Wilhelm Gericke, one of the most noted conductors of his day, was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the longest with that organization, from which he resigned in 1906 after a total service of thirteen years.

Mr. Gericke studied at the Vienna Conservatorium from 1862 to 1865, and then went to Linz as conductor. He accepted, in 1874, second conductorship of the Hofoper, in Vienna, where he was asscoiated with Hans Richter. In 1880, he succeeded Herbeck as conductor of the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (Society of the Friends of Music) holding this post until 1884, when he went to America to succeed George (now Sir George) Henschel as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had first heard him conducting a performance of "Aida" in Vienna, and on the next day began the conversations that ended with his engagement.

Resigned in Ill Health

During his first term, in 1887, the Boston Symphony made its first appearance in New York, in Steinway Hall, beginning its unbroken series of visits here. In 1889, after his fifth season, Gericke resigned on account of his health, "thoroughly overworked," as he phrased it, and returned to Vienna. There he again became conductor of the Friends of Music, remaining in that post until 1895. After three years of rest, including a stay in Dresden, he accepted Major Higginson's invitation to resume the leadership of the Boston Symphony, in 1898, succeeding Emil Paur, who became conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

He remained in charge for eight seasons until 1906, when his resignation drew expressions of profound regret. Gericke was generally credited with the development of the Boston Symphony during his first term, into an organization of high artistic standing. During his second term it maintained a notable reputation as one of the world's best orchestras.

Retired in 1906

He resigned in 1906, owing to failure to agree upon terms for the renewal of his contract, and returned to Vienna to live in retirement. In November, 1922, is was reported that he was facing poverty at the age of seventy-seven, owing to the loss of his savings through the war and the depreciation of Austrian currency. Later, however, it was learned that his circumstances, though straitened, were not desperate.

His compositions include an overture, a septet, a piano trio and quintet, a string quartet, two violin and two piano sonatas, the operetta "Schön Hännchen" and many songs.

Conductors Pay Tributes

Dr. Frank Damrosch, head of the Institute of Musical Art, said, when he heard of Mr. Gericke's death, "He was my very good personal friend and one for whom I had the highest regard as a musician and a man. He deserves a first rank in any history of America's musical development."

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, said America owes a deep debt of gratitude to Gericke. "Mr. Gericke was a musician of the finest type. As a man he was simple and lovable," Mr. Damrosch said.

Ernest Von Dohnanyi, the State Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor, said he had great respect for Gericke as a serious and scholarly musician. Gericke first brought him from Budapest to America, he explained.

Artur Bodanzky, the Metropolitan conductor, said that when he was a small boy in Vienna he had seen Gericke conduct for the Friends of Music. He regarded Gericke as a wonderful conductor and a charming gentleman.

Arthur Foote, the composer, who is Newton Centre, Mass., said: "Wil m Gericke's service to music as con tor of the Boston Orchestra can t be overestimated."

George W. Chadwick, the composer, d in Boston: "From ordinary ma ial he developed an orchestra which beauty of tone and clarity of per mance had no superior in America hat time."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR, DIES

Famous Viennese Led Boston Symphony Orchestra for Many Seasons.

Wilhelm Gericke, 80, famous conductor and at one time director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last Tuesday at his home, in Vienna. Death was due to old age after an illness of some length. He was born in Styria, Austria. He studied at his Vienna Conservatorium from 1862 until 1865. At that time he went to Linz as conductor. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vienna Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geshellschaft concerts and also directed the Singverein in that city. He soon gained reputation as a drillmaster of extraordinary persistence and ability and as a musician of the highest ideals. Invited by Major Higginson to come to America, he foresaw the opportunity that was given him in Boston to create by systematic and unremitting labor an orchestra that could equal the greatest organizations of the kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was from 1884 to 1889. He was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. During this time he returned to Vienna where he resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts until 1885, returning to Boston for his second term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. In 1906 he retired to private life in America.

His compositions include an overture, a septet, a piano trio and quintet, a string quartet, two violin and two piano sonatas, the operetta "Schon Hannchen" and many songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

CT 3 0 1925

EX-LEADER OF SYMPHONY DEAD

Boston, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for more than 13 years, died in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday, according to dispatches from that city. He had been sick for some time.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, on April 14, 1845, Gericke first showed traces of the talent that later developed into musical genius when he was 15 years old. As a result he was sent to the Vienna Conservatory where he made rapid progress and on graduating was accorded the position as one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the imperial opera.

In 1884, while he was still under 40, he came to America to take charge of the Boston orchestra, which had been founded three years previously. Henry Lee Higginson had heard him conduct in Austria a few months before and had been so favorably impressed that he engaged him almost on the spot.

For about a year Gericke made the best of the musical material that he had found in the orchestra and then he sent to Vienna for a number of younger and more skillful men. He was a strict disciplinarian, but possessed a charming personality which attracted and held the players.

In 1889 it was announced that his health had been undermined by the New England climate and following a tour as far West as St. Louis and a farewell testimonial concert here he resigned. In 1898 he again accepted an invitation to lead the organization and remained conductor of the orchestra until 1906. It was during his terms that the Boston Symphony first gave concerts in cities outside of New England and began to win its reputation as one of the most [illegible] organizations in the world.

When word came in 1922 that Gericke was in financial difficulties, a special benefit concert was given by the orchestra and the gross proceeds were forwarded to the musician.

HIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOLYOKE
MASS.
Transcript
ISSUE OF

1925

A Man Who Brought Music to America

The reason why America will pay special attention to the death of William Gericke in Vienna yesterday is that to him more than to any other one man, unless one excepts Mr. Higginson, who financed it, we owe the development of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Boston, with all its culture and its atmosphere, lacked a great orchestra. There was no city in New England other than in Boston, where an orchestra might be developed. George Henschel was the first director when the orchestra was started in 1881. He kept the few orchestral men together, but Mr. Gericke himself said of the organization when he first met it, "There are some musicians but it is hardly an orchestra." For five years Gericke had a fre hand and such an instrument for orchestra playing he did bring together. Boston's fame as the home of a great orchestra was established

After five years Mr. Gericke had to go home. Boston east winds were too much for him. But he was able to come back again in 1898 to an orchestra that was still growing, still enlarging its following and increasing its leadership. He gave it eight years of the most brilliant leadership and assured its permanence. It was during this period that Boston was able to build Symphony Hall and have a fine permanent home for music. For Gericke was not merely a great conductor and builder of a splendid orchestra. He had personal powers that brought the public along with him. His men loved him; Boston cherished him. He was a musician and he was a fine man, able to make music a creative force for the world he served.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had its ups and downs and there is the regime of Muck that is still remembered for unpleasant personal developments at the time of the World war. It is again a great body, splendidly lead. Its history up to now will give to the Gericke leadership the golden chapter when classicism in music stood at the top, but never forgot that music is a living force and grows with each generation. If he loved his Brahms, Beethoven and Mozart, he knew that newcomers were expressing their time and he must give them place. Musical, artistic and aristocratic Boston loved Gericke and took him to heart more completely than any conductor the Boston Symphony has ever had. He was 80 years old at his death, his later years saddened, as were the years of so many of his countrymen by the World war and the shattering of world ties that had been made personally by great artists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FALL RIVER
MASS.
Globe
ISSUE OF

OCT 30 1925

EX-SYMPHONY LEADER DEAD

BOSTON, Oct. 30. (AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here yesterday from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

OCT 30 1925

NOTED MUSICIAN DIES.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gerricks, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gerricks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884 three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
Plaindealer

THIS CLIPPING FROM OREGONIAN
PORTLAND, ORE.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES

Symphony Director, Formerly of Boston, Succumbs in Vienna.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, formerly director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead.

A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PIONEER PRESS
ST. PAUL, MINN.

OCT 30 1925

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR DIES.

Wilhelm Gericke Succumbs in Vienna After Long Illness.

(By Associated Press)

Boston, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came from Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday.

He had long been ill. He was born in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday at the age of 80, it was learned in Boston to-day.

managers ex
of thanks to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(A.P.)—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1881, three years after it was founded had died on Tuesday. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1835.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Globe-Democrat

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies in Vienna.

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, MASS., October 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Syria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies in Vienna.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 30.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

Memorial

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Symphony Ex-Leader Dies in Vienna

BOSTON, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday, at the age of 80 years, according to cable dispatches. He is recalled as the man who more than any other made the Symphony orchestra what it is today.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, in April, 1845, Gericke's musical education was received almost solely at the Vienna conservatory, where he made such progress that upon graduation he accepted the position of one of the three leaders at the Imperial Opera in Vienna.

He was brought to this country in 1884 by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson to become the second leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, then in its fourth year, holding the position until 1889, and returning here in 1898 to be leader again for eight years.

A year or more after he first took command of the orche
compl
Vien me
p
A

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 30 1925

Former Boston Symphony Leader Dead in Vienna

BOSTON, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Kericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than 13 years, died in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday, according to dispatches from th
He had been sick for som

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO

OCT 31 19

Wilhelm Gericke.

Vienna reports the death at 80 of Wilhelm Gericke, remembered by American friends of music as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906. Many Brooklynites will remember the concerts he gave with the Boston Orchestra at the old Academy of Music and at the Baptist Temple.

Major Henry L. Higginson founded and endowed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. George Henschel (now Sir George Henschel) was its first conductor. Upon his return to England three years later he was succeeded by Gericke, called from Vienna where he was one of the conductors at the Imperial Court Opera House.

Gericke's health broke down after his fifth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereupon he returned to Europe for a rest. Emil Paur, his successor at Boston, became conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1898 and Gericke, having recuperated, again became conductor of the Boston Orchestra until he resigned in 1906.

A thorough and indefatigable and conscientious conductor, Gericke never became one of the conducting virtuosos aptly called "Primadonna-Kepellmeister" in the lingo of his musicians. He was more like his teacher, Herbeck, whom he succeeded for a while both in the Vienna Opera and in the Society of Music-Friends in Vienna.

Gericke did not shine much as a composer. He limited himself to the field of chamber music, producing a number of scholarly works. In his youth he composed an operetta and a number of songs.

The war hit Gericke hard. Owi to the depreciation of the cro lost all his savings. Howev old of his American friends hand succor and kept the w cover door during Gerick irresistibly,

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

;T30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, Noted Orchestra Conductor, Dies

Director of Boston Symphony Thirteen Years Succumbs in Vienna at Eighty

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here to-day from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, Austria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

Boston Conductor 13 Years

Wilhelm Gericke, one of the most noted conductors of his day, was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the longest with that organization, from which he resigned in 1906 after a total service of thirteen years.

Mr. Gericke studied at the Vienna Conservatorium from 1862 to 1865, and then went to Linz as conductor. He accepted, in 1874, second conductorship of the Hofoper, in Vienna, where he was asscoiated with Hans Richter. In 1880, he succeeded Herbeck as conductor of the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (Society of the Friends of Music) holding this post until 1884, when he went to America to succeed George (now Sir George) Henschel as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, had first heard him conducting a performance of "Aida" in Vienna, and on the next day began the conversations that ended with his engagement.

Resigned in Ill Health

During his first term, in 1887, the Boston Symphony made its first appearance in New York, in Steinway Hall, beginning its unbroken series of visits here. In 1889, after his fifth season, Gericke resigned on account of his health, "thoroughly overworked," as he phrased it, and returned to Vienna. There he again became conductor of the Friends of Music, remaining in that post until 1895. After three years of rest, including a stay in Dresden, he accepted Major Higginson's invitation to resume the leadership of the Boston Symphony, in 1898, succeeding Emil Paur, who became conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

He remained in charge for eight seasons until 1906, when his resignation drew expressions of profound regret. Gericke was generally credited with the development of the Boston Symphony during his first term, into an organization of high artistic standing. During his second term it maintained a notable reputation as one of the world's best orchestras.

Retired in 1906

He resigned in 1906, owing to failure to agree upon terms for the renewal of his contract, and returned to Vienna to live in retirement. In November, 1922, is was reported that he was facing poverty at the age of seventy-seven, owing to the loss of his savings through the war and the depreciation of Austrian currency. Later, however, it was learned that his circumstances, though straitened, were not desperate.

His compositions include an overture, a septet, a piano trio and quintet, a string quartet, two violin and two piano sonatas, the operetta "Schön Hännchen" and many songs.

Conductors Pay Tributes

Dr. Frank Damrosch, head of the Institute of Musical Art, said, when he heard of Mr. Gericke's death, "He was my very good personal friend and one for whom I had the highest regard as a musician and a man. He deserves a first rank in any history of America's musical development."

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, said America owes a deep debt of gratitude to Gericke. "Mr. Gericke was a musician of the finest type. As a man he was simple and lovable," Mr. Damrosch said.

Ernest Von Dohnanyi, the State Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor, said he had great respect for Gericke as a serious and scholarly musician. Gericke first brought him from Budapest to America, he explained.

Artur Bodanzky, the Metropolitan conductor, said that when he was a small boy in Vienna he had seen Gericke conduct for the Friends of Music. He regarded Gericke as a wonderful conductor and a charming gentleman.

Arthur Foote, the composer, who is Newton Centre, Mass., said: "Wilm Gericke's service to music as conctor of the Boston Orchestra canot be overestimated."

George W. Chadwick, the composer, aid in Boston: "From ordinary marial he developed an orchestra which beauty of tone and clarity of perrmance had no superior in America that time."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR, DIES

Famous Viennese Led Boston Symphony Orchestra for Many Seasons.

Wilhelm Gericke, 80, famous conductor and at one time director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last Tuesday at his home, in Vienna. Death was due to old age after an illness of some length. He was born in Styria, Austria. He studied at his Vienna Conservatorium from 1862 until 1865. At that time he went to Linz as conductor. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vienna Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geshellschaft concerts and also directed the Singverein in that city. He soon gained reputation as a drillmaster of extraordinary persistence and ability and as a musician of the highest ideals. Invited by Major Higginson to come to America, he foresaw the opportunity that was given him in Boston to create by systematic and unremitting labor an orchestra that could equal the greatest organizations of the kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was from 1884 to 1889. He was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. During this time he returned to Vienna where he resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts until 1885, returning to Boston for his second term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. In 1906 he retired to private life in America.

His compositions include an overture, a septet, a piano trio and quintet, a string quartet, two violin and two piano sonatas, the operetta "Schon Hannchen" and many songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OREGONIAN
PORTLAND, ORE.

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES

Symphony Director, Formerly of Boston, Succumbs in Vienna.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(Associated Press.)—Wilhelm Gericke, formerly director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead.

A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PIONEER PRESS
ST. PAUL, MINN.

OCT 30 1925

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR DIES.

Wilhelm Gericke Succumbs in Vienna After Long Illness.

(By Associated Press)

Boston, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came from Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday.

He had long been ill. He was born in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday at the age of 80, it was learned in Boston to-day.

managers ex

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 30 1925

EX-LEADER OF SYMPHONY DEAD

Boston, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for more than 13 years, died in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday, according to dispatches from that city. He had been sick for some time.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, on April 14, 1845, Gericke first showed traces of the talent that later developed into musical genius when he was 15 years old. As a result he was sent to the Vienna Conservatory where he made rapid progress and on graduating was accorded the position as one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the imperial opera.

In 1884, while he was still under 40, he came to America to take charge of the Boston orchestra, which had been founded three years previously. Henry Lee Higginson had heard him conduct in Austria a few months before and had been so favorably impressed that he engaged him almost on the spot.

For about a year Gericke made the best of the musical material that he had found in the orchestra and then he sent to Vienna for a number of younger and more skillful men. He was a strict disciplinarian, but possessed a charming personality which attracted and held the players.

In 1889 it was announced that his health had been undermined by the New England climate and following a tour as far West as St. Louis and a farewell testimonial concert here he resigned. In 1898 he again accepted an invitation to lead the organization and remained conductor of the orchestra until 1906. It was during his terms that the Boston Symphony first gave concerts in cities outside of New England and began to win its reputation as one of the finest musical organizations in the world.

When word came in 1922 that Gericke was in financial difficulties, a special benefit concert was given by the orchestra and the gross proceeds were forwarded to the musician.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 30 192

Wilhelm Gericks Dies.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(A.P.)—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1881, three years after it was founded had died on Tuesday. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1835.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Globe-Democrat

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies in Vienna.

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, MASS., October 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Syria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericks Dies in Vienna.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 30.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOLYOKE
MASS.
Transcript
ISSUE OF

1925

A Man Who Brought Music to America

The reason why America will pay special attention to the death of William Gericke in Vienna yesterday is that to him more than to any other one man, unless one excepts Mr. Higginson, who financed it, we owe the development of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Boston, with all its culture and its atmosphere, lacked a great orchestra. There was no city in New England other than in Boston, where an orchestra might be developed. George Henschel was the first director when the orchestra was started in 1881. He kept the few orchestral men together, but Mr. Gericke himself said of the organization when he first met it, "There are some musicians but it is hardly an orchestra." For five years Gericke had a fre hand and such an instrument for orchestra playing he did bring together. Boston's fame as the home of a great orchestra was established

After five years Mr. Gericke had to go home. Boston east winds were too much for him. But he was able to come back again in 1898 to an orchestra that was still growing, still enlarging its following and increasing its leadership. He gave it eight years of the most brilliant leadership and assured its permanence. It was during this period that Boston was able to build Symphony Hall and have a fine permanent home for music. For Gericke was not merely a great conductor and builder of a splendid orchestra. He had personal powers that brought the public along with him. His men loved him; Boston cherished him. He was a musician and he was a fine man, able to make music a creative force for the world he served.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had its ups and downs and there is the regime of Muck that is still remembered for unpleasant personal developments at the time of the World war. It is again a great body, splendidly lead. Its history up to now will give to the Gericke leadership the golden chapter when classicism in music stood at the top, but never forgot that music is a living force and grows with each generation. If he loved his Brahms, Beethoven and Mozart, he knew that newcomers were expressing their time and he must give them place. Musical, artistic and aristocratic Boston loved Gericke and took him to heart more completely than any conductor the Boston Symphony has ever had. He was 80 years old at his death, his later years saddened, as were the years of so many of his countrymen by the World war and the shattering of world ties that had been made personally by great artists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

OCT 30 1925

Symphony Ex-Leader Dies in Vienna

BOSTON, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday, at the age of 80 years, according to cable dispatches. He is recalled as the man who more than any other made the Symphony orchestra what it is today.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, in April, 1845, Gericke's musical education was received almost solely at the Vienna conservatory, where he made such progress that upon graduation he accepted the position of one of the three leaders at the Imperial Opera in Vienna.

He was brought to this country in 1884 by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson to become the second leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, then in its fourth year, holding the position until 1889, and returning here in 1898 to be leader again for eight years.

A year or more after he first took command of the orchestra, Gericke completely reorganized it, sending to Vien many new and younger those whom he im mothy and Joseph

---

OCT 30 1925

Former Boston Symphony Leader Dead in Vienna

BOSTON, Oct. 30—Wilhelm Kericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than 13 years, died in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday, cording to dispatches from the He had been sick for som

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FALL RIVER
MASS.
Globe 131
ISSUE OF

OCT 30 1925

EX-SYMPHONY LEADER DEA

BOSTON, Oct. 20. (AP)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here yesterday from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889 when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

OCT 30 1925

NOTED MUSICIAN DIES.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilhelm Gerricks, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gerricks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884 three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
Plaindealer

OCT 30 1925

Former Symphony Leader Dies.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—(AP)—Wilheim Gericke, 80, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram from Vienna today said Gericke, who took charge of the orchestra in 1884, had died on Tuesday.

---

of Music and at the Baptist Temple.

Major Henry L. Higginson founded and endowed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. George Henschel (now Sir George Henschel) was its first conductor. Upon his return to England three years later he was succeeded by Gericke, called from Vienna where he was one of the conductors at the Imperial Court Opera House.

Gericke's health broke down after his fifth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereupon he returned to Europe for a rest. Emil Paur, his successor at Boston, became conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1898 and Gericke, having recuperated, again became conductor of the Boston Orchestra until he resigned in 1906.

A thorough and indefatigable and conscientious conductor, Gericke never became one of the conducting virtuosos aptly called "Primadonna-Kepellmeister" in the lingo of musicians. He was more like his teacher, Herbeck, whom he succeeded for a while both in the Vienna Opera and in the Society of Music-Friends in Vienna.

Gericke did not shine much as a composer. He limited himself to the field of chamber music, producing a number of scholarly works. In his youth he composed an operetta and a number of songs.

The war hit Gericke hard. Owi to the depreciation of the cro lost all his savings. Howev old of his American friends hand succor and kept the wover, door during Geri irresistibly,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger
OCT 31 1925

132

A MUSIC-MASTER

WILLIAM GERICKE was one of the foremost orchestral conductors of his time. The work he did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proves his creed, that first-rate results in art cannot be improvised nor extemporized. When he first came to Boston at Major Higginson's instance in 1884 he took hold of material in nowise phenomenal and made much of it by the hardest kind of labor. He was a rigid drill-master, but he was a great deal more than a martinet, for to his inflexible discipline he added poetic imagination and a passion for refinement of tone. Like Thomas, he was a pioneer in the symphonic education of the American public. His visits to Philadelphia, New York and other cities set a standard of accomplishment which led directly to the improvement of the programs and the performance of extant orchestras and the creation of local organizations after the admired Boston model.

Gericke revered the classic masters. No sounder musicianship has been brought to the concert platform than that which he imported and domesticated here. At the time of his arrival in America there were many leaders who catered to inferior tastes and tolerated indifferent executants; Gericke, answerable to his own artistic standards, dared to be in advance of his age, and in leading an able band of musicians brought his hearers also to a loftier plane of understanding and appreciation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

Wilhelm Gericke, Who Made the Boston Symphony.

The death of Wilhelm Gericke in his eighty-first year should remind all musical Americans of the debt they owe this extraordinary orchestral drill master and conductor. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1905. In his first period of service he gathered together elements over which George Henschel had presided with an enthusiasm that lacked experience and wrought them into a symphonic orchestra of the first class. It was still the orchestra of Gericke's creation to which he returned nine years later in succession to Emil Paur, who himself had succeeded Arthur Nikisch. During his second incumbency there was never any question of the Boston band's being unsurpassed in the whole world, if, indeed, it had an equal.

Nor was Gericke only a great drill master. He possessed a fine sense of program-making, and in an absolutely non-spectacular way he was an admirable interpreter. A musician of classical tradition, he doubtless believed that every subscriber to his Boston concerts should hear each symphony of Beethoven at least once in the course of two years, and he made his programs accordingly. But he was conscientious in the introduction of new music. Nobody who heard the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss as led by him is likely to forget it, and few subsequent conductors have given so eloquent an account of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Wilhelm Gericke were the orchestral standard setters for all America in those days. Many who went to their first symphonic concerts at that time—and they were by no means limited to residents of Boston and Cambridge—gained a conception of what concerts may be that nothing heard since, however fine, can dispel.

Wilhelm Gericke, a sincere artist and an unsparing workman, deserves to rank as one of the pre-eminent edu- tors in the artistic history of erica.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
OCT 31 1925

A Great Master of the Orchestra

Of the qualities of Wilhelm Gericke as conductor Philadelphians had many opportunities to judge in the days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a familiar visitor. His death in Vienna at the age of eighty will be regretted by all who realize how much he did for music in this country by developing the organization founded by Major Higginson to a degree of superlative excellence never before attained. The orchestra in his hands became the most distinguished body of instrumental artists in the country. Gericke, succeeding George Henschel after three more or less experimental years, was just the kind of disciplinarian needed, and his men responded to his direction with the enthusiasm which only a great musician can inspire.

Gericke remained in Boston five years and was succeeded by Nikisch and Paur. Then he was brought back again to fill the place which no one else seemed to fill quite as well. The eminent distinction of the orchestra in his day was the exquisite balance of its performances. He did for it what Mr. Stokowski has done for the Philadelphia Orchestra—made it an instrument instantly responsive to his hand. He was sometimes accused of being a mere drillmaster, and he certainly was never a "temperamental" conductor. But he achieved remarkably the ideal of classic beauty. In the words of Mr. Walter Damrosch, "he was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard."

All his successors in this difficult field owe much to him. He made the Boston orchestra a body which educated the public to the appreciation of the best in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST
OCT 31 1925

A MUSIC MASTER

WILLIAM GERICKE was one of the foremost orchestral conductors of his time. The work he did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proves his creed, that first-rate results in art cannot be improvised or extemporized. When he first came to Boston at Major Higginson's instance in 1884 he took hold of material in nowise phenomenal and made much of it by the hardest kind of labor. He was a rigid drillmaster, but he was a great deal more than a martinet, for to his inflexible discipline he added poetic imagination and a passion for refinement of tone. Like Thomas, he was a pioneer in the symphonic education of the American public. His visits to New York and other cities set a standard of accomplishment which led directly to the improvement of the programs and the performance of extant orchestras and the creation of local organizations after the admired Boston model.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
OCT [illegible] 1925

Former Director Dies

Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here from Vienna said that Gericke, who went to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, Austria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke Dead.

Boston, Oct. 29 (A.P.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 184

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 31 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and prominent contributor to its success, is dead. A cablegram received at Boston from Vienna said that

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
OCT 30 192

WILHELM GERICKE DIES; ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Wilhelm Gericke, noted orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and this country, is dead at his home in Vienna, according to information reaching here yesterday. He died on Tuesday and had been ill for some time. He was 80 years old and is survived by his wife and a daughter. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and later from 1896 to 1906, when he resigned. Under his direction the orchestra achieved a world-wide reputation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
OCT 30 1925

WILLIAM GERICKE.

That the octogenarian who has just died in his Vienna home, Wilhelm Gericke, "deserves first place in any history of America's musical development"—the opinion of Frank Damrosch—will hardly be questioned. Nor will the assertion of Walter Damrosch, that Gericke was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standards, be controverted. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had several rivals, many imitators who never became rivals, but its seniority is undeniable.

Gericke belonged to Vienna. He had succeeded Brahms as conductor of the Gesellschaftconcerte in 1880. He was conducting in "Aïda" in 1883, when Henry L. Higginson, the controlling man among the backers of the Boston Symphony, heard him in Vienna. At that time the Symphony was nearly three years old. Georges Henschel, a fine musician, had been its conductor. Higginson persuaded Gericke to come to America. The music master came and stayed five years—1884 to 1889. Then he gave way to Arthur Nikisch, but neither Nikisch nor Emil Paur, who came later, could approximate Gericke results. In 1898 Gericke came back and remained in Boston till 1906, when he retired and went home.

It is pleasant to know that, though some heartstrings were torn in the World War and financial losses were very heavy, Wilhelm Gericke, still loving America, recovered a fair degree of comfort, and as the end approached had with him his aged wife and his devoted daughter. So far

it is the

we owe so ndards. If

ly prove us

ople.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

1925

OCT 30 19

WILHELM GERICKE

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (A. P.)—Wilhelm Gericke, eighty, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here to-day from Vienna said that Gericke, who came here to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, was given much of the credit for upbuilding the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned, owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
OCT 30 1925

FORMER DIRECTOR DEAD

Cable Announces Passing of Symphony Orchestra Chief.

[By Associated Press.]

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
OCT 31 1925

Will Analyze Program.

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed next Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, as well as a work to be heard here for the first time, in Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"). Illustrations will be played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This talk is free to the public, and all interested persons are invited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph
OCT 31 1925

ORCHESTRA PROGRAM TO BE STUDIED THURSDAY

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed next Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, as well as a work to be

Ibe

THIS CLIPPING FROM ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
OCT 31 1925

New Symphony Series.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season, a new historical series has been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on the following Tuesday afternoons, at 3:15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2 and April 6. The average Symphony programme lasts about one hour and three-quarters, proving convenient for those living in outlying districts. Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programmes of this series in chronological order so that, containin masterpieces from each important period in the development of Symphony music, they represent the range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel and the early Italian masters to the music of to-day and to-morrow. This orchestra will not visit Brockton this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST
OCT 31 1925

Orchestra's Date Is Biggest Event of Coming Week

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year. Its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership indicate an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased. The entire personnel now numbers 108. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the orchestral manager, during a recent visit in Buffalo.

The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, 34 of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violin used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas, the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

The program for Wednesday evening will be as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
"Kikimora," a Folk Fairy Tale, Op. 63 .... Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt from the Opera Kitej ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
1. Calme; Assez anime; Calme.
2. Modere; tres rythme.
3. Anime; modere.
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms
1. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
4. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

In response to a special request, the program has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced. There will be an intermission before the symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is the first of six under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation. The next concert will be on December 1, by the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, followed by the Cincinnati and Cleveland orchestras. Subscription tickets are still selling for all these concerts, and tomorrow morning at Denton, Cottier and Daniels box office, the public sale for the Wednesday evening concert will open.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
OCT 31 192

Boston Symphony

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra on next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year and its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership indicate an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensemble now numbers 108.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

132

OCT 31 1925

A MUSIC-MASTER

WILLIAM GERICKE was one of the foremost orchestral conductors of his time. The work he did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proves his creed, that first-rate results in art cannot be improvised nor extemporized. When he first came to Boston at Major Higginson's instance in 1884 he took hold of material in nowise phenomenal and made much of it by the hardest kind of labor. He was a rigid drill-master, but he was a great deal more than a martinet, for to his inflexible discipline he added poetic imagination and a passion for refinement of tone. Like Thomas, he was a pioneer in the symphonic education of the American public. His visits to Philadelphia, New York and other cities set a standard of accomplishment which led directly to the improvement of the programs and the performance of extant orchestras and the creation of local organizations after the admired Boston model.

Gericke revered the classic masters. No sounder musicianship has been brought to the concert platform than that which he imported and domesticated here. At the time of his arrival in America there were many leaders who catered to inferior tastes and tolerated indifferent executants; Gericke, answerable to his own artistic standards, dared to be in advance of his age, and in leading an able band of musicians brought his hearers also to a loftier plane of understanding and appreciation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

Wilhelm Gericke, Who Made the Boston Symphony.

The death of Wilhelm Gericke in his eighty-first year should remind all musical Americans of the debt they owe this extraordinary orchestral drill master and conductor. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1905. In his first period of service he gathered together elements over which George Henschel had presided with an enthusiasm that lacked experience and wrought them into a symphonic orchestra of the first class. It was still the orchestra of Gericke's creation to which he returned nine years later in succession to Emil Paur, who himself had succeeded Arthur Nikisch. During his second incumbency there was never any question of the Boston band's being unsurpassed in the whole world, if, indeed, it had an equal.

Nor was Gericke only a great drill master. He possessed a fine sense of program-making, and in an absolutely non-spectacular way he was an admirable interpreter. A musician of classical tradition, he doubtless believed that every subscriber to his Boston concerts should hear each symphony of Beethoven at least once in the course of two years, and he made his programs accordingly. But he was conscientious in the introduction of new music. Nobody who heard the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss as led by him is likely to forget it, and few subsequent conductors have given so eloquent an account of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Wilhelm Gericke were the orchestral standard setters for all America in those days. Many who went to their first symphonic concerts at that time—and they were by no means limited to residents of Boston and Cambridge—gained a conception of what concerts may be that nothing heard since, however fine, can dispel.

Wilhelm Gericke, a sincere artist and an unsparing workman, deserves to rank as one of the pre-eminent edu- tors in the artistic history of erica.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

OCT 31 1925

A Great Master of the Orchestra

Of the qualities of Wilhelm Gericke as conductor Philadelphians had many opportunities to judge in the days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a familiar visitor. His death in Vienna at the age of eighty will be regretted by all who realize how much he did for music in this country by developing the organization founded by Major Higginson to a degree of superlative excellence never before attained. The orchestra in his hands became the most distinguished body of instrumental artists in the country. Gericke, succeeding George Henschel after three more or less experimental years, was just the kind of disciplinarian needed, and his men responded to his direction with the enthusiasm which only a great musician can inspire.

Gericke remained in Boston five years and was succeeded by Nikisch and Paur. Then he was brought back again to fill the place which no one else seemed to fill quite as well. The eminent distinction of the orchestra in his day was the exquisite balance of its performances. He did for it what Mr. Stokowski has done for the Philadelphia Orchestra—made it an instrument instantly responsive to his hand. He was sometimes accused of being a mere drillmaster, and he certainly was never a "temperamental" conductor. But he achieved remarkably the ideal of classic beauty. In the words of Mr. Walter Damrosch, "he was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard."

All his successors in this difficult field owe much to him. He made the Boston orchestra a body which educated the public to the appreciation of the best in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

OCT 31 1925

A MUSIC MASTER

WILLIAM GERICKE was one of the foremost orchestral conductors of his time. The work he did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proves his creed, that first-rate results in art cannot be improvised or extemporized. When he first came to Boston at Major Higginson's instance in 1884 he took hold of material in nowise phenomenal and made much of it by the hardest kind of labor. He was a rigid drillmaster, but he was a great deal more than a martinet, for to his inflexible discipline he added poetic imagination and a passion for refinement of tone. Like Thomas, he was a pioneer in the symphonic education of the American public. His visits to New York and other cities set a standard of accomplishment which led directly to the improvement of the programs and the performance of extant orchestras and the creation of local organizations after the admired Boston model.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

OCT 30 192

Former Director Dies

Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here from Vienna said that Gericke, who went to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, Austria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

OCT 30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke Dead.

Boston, Oct. 29 (A.P.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 31 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and prominent contributor to its success, is dead. A cablegram received at Boston from Vienna said that

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 30 192

WILHELM GERICKE DIES; ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Wilhelm Gericke, noted orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and this country, is dead at his home in Vienna, according to information reaching here yesterday. He died on Tuesday and had been ill for some time. He was 80 years old and is survived by his wife and a daughter. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and later from 1896 to 1906, when he resigned. Under his direction the orchestra achieved a world-wide reputation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 30 192

WILLIAM GERICKE.

That the octogenarian who has just died in his Vienna home, Wilhelm Gericke, "deserves first place in any history of America's musical development"—the opinion of Frank Damrosch—will hardly be questioned. Nor will the assertion of Walter Damrosch, that Gericke was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standards, be controverted. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had several rivals, many imitators who never became rivals, but its seniority is undeniable.

Gericke belonged to Vienna. He had succeeded Brahms as conductor of the Gesellschaftconcerte in 1880. He was conducting in "A'da" in 1883, when Henry L. Higginson, the controlling man among the backers of the Boston Symphony, heard him in Vienna. At that time the Symphony was nearly three years old. Georges Henschel, a fine musician, had been its conductor. Higginson persuaded Gericke to come to America. The music master came and stayed five years—1884 to 1889. Then he gave way to Arthur Nikisch, but neither Nikisch nor Emil Paur, who came later, could approximate Gericke results. In 1898 Gericke came back and remained in Boston till 1906, when he retired and went home.

It is pleasant to know that, though some heartstrings were torn in the World War and financial losses were very heavy, Wilhelm Gericke, still loving America, recovered a fair degree of comfort, and as the end approached had with him his aged wife and his devoted daughter. So far

it is the

we owe so ndards. If

ly prove us

ople.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

1925

OCT 30 19

WILHELM GERICKE

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (A. P.)—Wilhelm Gericke, eighty, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here to-day from Vienna said that Gericke, who came here to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died Tuesday. He had long been ill. To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, was given much of the credit for upbuilding the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned, owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH

OCT 30 1925

FORMER DIRECTOR DEAD

Cable Announces Passing of Symphony Orchestra Chief.

[By Associated Press.]

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 31 1925

Will Analyze Program.

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed next Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, as well as a work to be heard here for the first time, in Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"). Illustrations will be played on two pianos by Dedmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This talk is free to the public and all interested persons are invited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

OCT 31 1925

ORCHESTRA PROGRAM TO BE STUDIED THURSDAY

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed next Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, as well as a work to be

Ibe

THIS CLIPPING FROM ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.

OCT 31 1925

New Symphony Series.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season, a new historical series has been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on the following Tuesday afternoons, at 3:15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2 and April 6. The average Symphony programme lasts about one hour and three-quarters, proving convenient for those living in outlying districts. Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programmes of this series in chronological order so that, containin masterpieces from each important period in the development of Symphony music, they represent the range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel and the early Italian masters to the music of to-day and to-morrow. This orchestra will not visit Brockton this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

OCT 31 1925

Orchestra's Date Is Biggest Event of Coming Week

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year. Its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership indicate an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased. The entire personnel now numbers 108. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the orchestral manager, during a recent visit in Buffalo.

The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, 34 of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violin used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas, the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

The program for Wednesday evening will be as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
"Kikimora," a Folk Fairy Tale, Op. 63 .... Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetz from the Opera Kitej ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
1. Calme; Assez anime; Calme.
2. Modere; tres rythme.
3. Anime; modere.
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms
1. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
4. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

In response to a special request, the program has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced. There will be an intermission before the symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is the first of six under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation. The next concert will be on December 1, by the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, followed by the Cincinnati and Cleveland orchestras. Subscription tickets are still selling for all these concerts, and tomorrow morning at Denton, Cottier, and Daniels box office, the public sale for the Wednesday evening concert will open.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER

31

Boston Symphony

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra on next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year and its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership indicate an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensemble now numbers 108.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger
OCT 31 1925

132

A MUSIC-MASTER

WILLIAM GERICKE was one of the foremost orchestral conductors of his time. The work he did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proves his creed, that first-rate results in art cannot be improvised nor extemporized. When he first came to Boston at Major Higginson's instance in 1884 he took hold of material in nowise phenomenal and made much of it by the hardest kind of labor. He was a rigid drill-master, but he was a great deal more than a martinet, for to his inflexible discipline he added poetic imagination and a passion for refinement of tone. Like Thomas, he was a pioneer in the symphonic education of the American public. His visits to Philadelphia, New York and other cities set a standard of accomplishment which led directly to the improvement of the programs and the performance of extant orchestras and the creation of local organizations after the admired Boston model.

Gericke revered the classic masters. No sounder musicianship has been brought to the concert platform than that which he imported and domesticated here. At the time of his arrival in America there were many leaders who catered to inferior tastes and tolerated indifferent executants; Gericke, answerable to his own artistic standards, dared to be in advance of his age, and in leading an able band of musicians brought his hearers also to a loftier plane of understanding and appreciation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

Wilhelm Gericke, Who Made the Boston Symphony.

The death of Wilhelm Gericke in his eighty-first year should remind all musical Americans of the debt they owe this extraordinary orchestral drill master and conductor. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1905. In his first period of service he gathered together elements over which George Henschel had presided with an enthusiasm that lacked experience and wrought them into a symphonic orchestra of the first class. It was still the orchestra of Gericke's creation to which he returned nine years later in succession to Emil Paur, who himself had succeeded Arthur Nikisch. During his second incumbency there was never any question of the Boston band's being unsurpassed in the whole world, if, indeed, it had an equal.

Nor was Gericke only a great drill master. He possessed a fine sense of program-making, and in an absolutely non-spectacular way he was an admirable interpreter. A musician of classical tradition, he doubtless believed that every subscriber to his Boston concerts should hear each symphony of Beethoven at least once in the course of two years, and he made his programs accordingly. But he was conscientious in the introduction of new music. Nobody who heard the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss as led by him is likely to forget it, and few subsequent conductors have given so eloquent an account of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Wilhelm Gericke were the orchestral standard setters for all America in those days. Many who went to their first symphonic concerts at that time—and they were by no means limited to residents of Boston and Cambridge—gained a conception of what concerts may be that nothing heard since, however fine, can dispel.

Wilhelm Gericke, a sincere artist and an unsparing workman, deserves to rank as one of the pre-eminent educators in the artistic history of America.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
OCT 31 1925

A Great Master of the Orchestra

Of the qualities of Wilhelm Gericke as conductor Philadelphians had many opportunities to judge in the days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a familiar visitor. His death in Vienna at the age of eighty will be regretted by all who realize how much he did for music in this country by developing the organization founded by Major Higginson to a degree of superlative excellence never before attained. The orchestra in his hands became the most distinguished body of instrumental artists in the country. Gericke, succeeding George Henschel after three more or less experimental years, was just the kind of disciplinarian needed, and his men responded to his direction with the enthusiasm which only a great musician can inspire.

Gericke remained in Boston five years and was succeeded by Nikisch and Paur. Then he was brought back again to fill the place which no one else seemed to fill quite as well. The eminent distinction of the orchestra in his day was the exquisite balance of its performances. He did for it what Mr. Stokowski has done for the Philadelphia Orchestra—made it an instrument instantly responsive to his hand. He was sometimes accused of being a mere drillmaster, and he certainly was never a "temperamental" conductor. But he achieved remarkably the ideal of classic beauty. In the words of Mr. Walter Damrosch, "he was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard."

All his successors in this difficult field owe much to him. He made the Boston orchestra a body which educated the public to the appreciation of the best in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST
OCT 31 1925

A MUSIC MASTER

WILLIAM GERICKE was one of the foremost orchestral conductors of his time. The work he did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proves his creed, that first-rate results in art cannot be improvised or extemporized. When he first came to Boston at Major Higginson's instance in 1884 he took hold of material in nowise phenomenal and made much of it by the hardest kind of labor. He was a rigid drillmaster, but he was a great deal more than a martinet, for to his inflexible discipline he added poetic imagination and a passion for refinement of tone. Like Thomas, he was a pioneer in the symphonic education of the American public. His visits to New York and other cities set a standard of accomplishment which led directly to the improvement of the programs and the performance of extant orchestras and the creation of local organizations after the admired Boston model.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
OCT 30 19

Former Director Dies

Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here from Vienna said that Gericke, who went to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill.

To Gericke, who was born in Schwanberg, Styria, Austria, in 1845, was given much of the credit for the upbuilding of the organization. He served until 1889, when he resigned owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
30 1925

Wilhelm Gericke Dead.

Boston, Oct. 29 (A.P.)—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston symphony orchestra is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, died Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

Schwanberg, ... the credit for upbuilding ... tion. He served until 1889, when he resigned, owing to the state of his health. He returned in 1898 to lead the orchestra until 1906.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 31 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and prominent contributor to its success, is dead. A cablegram received at Boston from Vienna said that Gericke

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
OCT 30 192

WILHELM GERICKE DIES; ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Wilhelm Gericke, noted orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and this country, is dead at his home in Vienna, according to information reaching here yesterday. He died on Tuesday and had been ill for some time. He was 80 years old and is survived by his wife and a daughter. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and later from 1896 to 1906, when he resigned. Under his direction the orchestra achieved a world-wide reputation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
OCT 30 192

WILLIAM GERICKE.

That the octogenarian who has just died in his Vienna home, Wilhelm Gericke, "deserves first place in any history of America's musical development"—the opinion of Frank Damrosch—will hardly be questioned. Nor will the assertion of Walter Damrosch, that Gericke was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standards, be controverted. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had several rivals, many imitators who never became rivals, but its seniority is undeniable.

Gericke belonged to Vienna. He had succeeded Brahms as conductor of the Gesellschaftconcerte in 1880. He was conducting in "Aïda" in 1883, when Henry L. Higginson, the controlling man among the backers of the Boston Symphony, heard him in Vienna. At that time the Symphony was nearly three years old. Georges Henschel, a fine musician, had been its conductor. Higginson persuaded Gericke to come to America. The music master came and stayed five years—1884 to 1889. Then he gave way to Arthur Nikisch, but neither Nikisch nor Emil Paur, who came later, could approximate Gericke results. In 1898 Gericke came back and remained in Boston till 1906, when he retired and went home.

It is pleasant to know that, though some heartstrings were torn in the World War and financial losses were very heavy, Wilhelm Gericke, still loving America, recovered a fair degree of comfort, and as the end approached had with him his aged wife and his devoted daughter. So far as Vienna is concerned, it is the glory of America that we owe so much to her musical standards. If we owed less it would only prove us to be a more backward people.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
OCT 30 1925

FORMER DIRECTOR DEAD

Cable Announces Passing of Symphony Orchestra Chief.

[By Associated Press.]

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericks, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here from Vienna said that Gericks, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria, in 1845.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
OCT 31 1925

Will Analyze Program.

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed next Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, as well as a work to be heard here for the first time, in Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"). Illustrations will be played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This talk is free to the public, and all interested persons are invited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph
OCT 31 1925

ORCHESTRA PROGRAM TO BE STUDIED THURSDAY

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed next Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, as well as a work to be heard here for the first time in Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). Illustrations will be played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This talk will be free to the public.

Sc ... hist ... by th ... to be given ... noons. This will incre... ber of concerts in greater Bost... 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on the following Tuesday afternoons, at 3:15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2 and April 6. The average Symphony programme lasts about one hour and three-quarters, proving convenient for those living in outlying districts. Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programmes of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of Symphony music, they represent the range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel and the early Italian masters to the music of to-day and to-morrow. This orchestra will not visit Brockton this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST
OCT 31 1925

Orchestra's Date Is Biggest Event of Coming Week

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year. Its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership indicate an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased. The entire personnel now numbers 108. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the orchestral manager, during a recent visit in Buffalo.

The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, 34 of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violin used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas, the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

The program for Wednesday evening will be as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
"Kikimora," a Folk Fairy Tale, Op. 63 .... Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt from the Opera Kitej ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
1. Calme; Assez anime; Calme.
2. Modere; tres rythme.
3. Anime; modere.
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms
1. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
4. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

In response to a special request, the program has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced. There will be an intermission before the symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is the first of six under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation. The next concert will be on December 1, by the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, followed by the Cincinnati and Cleveland orchestras. Subscription tickets are still selling for all these concerts, and tomorrow morning at Denton, Cottier and Daniels box office, the public sale for the Wednesday evening concert will open.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
31

Boston Symphony

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra on next Wednesda evening, with its celebrated conduc tor, Serge Koussevitzky is the even of the week. The orchestra is larger this year and its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership indicate an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensemble now numbers 108.

133

OM
. Y.

1925

Date
Event Week

on Symphony evening, uctor, Serge of the week.
his year. Its st year under rship indicate rkable beauty.
orchestra has ntire personnel
r. Koussevitzky
the seating arhestra it was n, the orchestral ent visit in Buf-

still at the left violin section is conductor has them, massed re at the right violin used to side the violas.
d to the right.
yers, excepting y at the right section is now reby gaining in dnesday evening

..........Weber
ry Tale, Op. 63
.... Liadov
netzt from the Rimsky-Korsakov
.... Ibert
anime; Calme.
ythme.

C minor, Op. 68
.... Brahms
nuto; allegro.
uto.
tto e grazioso.
non troppo, ma

al request, the ged to include mber instead of previously an-an intermission

hony Orchestra six under the lo Musical foun-ncert will be on Detroit Symphony
abrilowitsch, fol-ti and Cleveland on tickets are se concerts, and Denton, Cottier
, the public sale evening concert

PING FROM
O, N. Y.
UIRER

1 1925

mphon

he Boston S next Wednesd ebrated condu zky is the eve hestra is larger ainments during
r. Mr. Koussendicate an enle beauty. The orchestra has the entire per-eat and distinw numbers 108.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 3 1 1925

THE coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year and its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership have made for an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensemble now numbers 108.

Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra, it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the manager, during a recent visit in Buffalo. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, 34 of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear.

The program for Wednesday evening will be as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora, a Folk Fairy-Tale, Op. 63. Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt (from the Opera Kitej) ...... Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
I Calme; Assez anime; Calme
II Modere, tres rythme
III Anime; modere
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68. Brahms
I Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II Andante sostenuto
III Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

In response to a special request, the program has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced. There will be an intermission before the symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert is the first of six to visit Buffalo this season under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation. The next concert will be December 1, by the Detroit Symphony orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor, and later concerts will be given by the Cincinnati and Cleveland orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 3 1 1925

FAMOUS ARTISTS IN SEDGWICK COURSE

Giovanni Martinelli and Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled.

The local musical season will be greatly enhanced by the appearance of Martinelli, the renowned tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, and the second local appearance of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of ~~Serge Koussevitsky~~ at the Capitol theater on two Sunday afternoons this season, under the auspices of the Sedgwick banner, the former coming on January 24 and the latter on February 7. The early demand for seats indicates that both events will enjoy a sold-out house and immediate application is advisable. The sale is now in progress at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. From patrons unable to attend the sale in person mail orders will be received. All orders and checks should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus and prices giving full particulars will be mailed upon request by letter or patrons may phone 2-6147.

The attractions of the Sedgwick Concerts for the season of 1925-1926 are undoubtedly two of the most popular in the entire realm of music. Giovanni Martinelli, a leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, is a welcomed artist on the local concert stage.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has always been the premier orchestral event of the year, but under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished Russian, it has received a new impetus and is to-day the ranking orchestra of America and some say of the world. Mr. Koussevitsky's reception here of the occasion of his debut is still the talk in local musical circles. Last season's concert was acclaimed the musical event of the decade and so the forthcoming concert is being regarded in the nature of being the supreme musical event of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 3 1 1925

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA POPULAR

From the Boston Transcript.

If some observers of the course of music in Boston were mildly amazed to note the flood of popular demand for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra evident from the very outset of the current season, the recent announcement brings super-surprise. The 48 concerts of Friday and Saturday, the five of Monday, the nine in Cambridge, the performances for the pension fund—all taken together—have so little sufficed to meet the public call for seats, that five more concerts, for Tuesday afternoon, have been added. The season thus will comprise 70 concerts of full symphonic quality. The number is not only unprecedented in Boston, but unequaled by any great orchestra in any city of the land. The Philadelphia season comprises 68 concerts of comparable character, the Chicago 64.

Much of the new sway which the Symphony is thus seen to be exerting over the people of Boston must be attributed, no doubt, to the individual influence of the magnetic and compelling Mr. Koussevitsky. But the movement cannot be denied ~~also a~~ share of broader significance, a gratifying value as witness of Boston's increased affection for one of the city's finest institutions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 3 1 1925

The tenth season of symphony orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association will open auspiciously next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, at Syria Mosque by a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under their distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitzky. Other orchestras to be heard during the season include the Cleveland, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor on November 20 and 21, and on January 22 and 23. For the November concert, a Brahms program will be given, and the Mendelssohn Choir of Pittsburgh, Ernest Lunt, conductor, will render "Brahm's Requiem." At the second Cleveland concert, Josef Lhevinne will appear as piano soloist. The Cincinnati Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner, will come on December 11 and 12, bringing Kathryn Meisle, as contralto soloist. The New York Philharmonic, under Willem Mengelberg, will give the fourth pair on January 8 and 9, and the closing pair on March 12 and 13, with Wilhelm Furtwaengler, conducting. The Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor, will give one evening concert, on Monday, February 22. Indications point to the most brilliant season in 10 years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 3 1 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, New York, Providence and elsewhere have never been in so great demand as in this season, and there is every indication that the season sale for the Infantry Hall series of five concerts to be given on the Tuesday evenings of November 17, December 15, January 19, February 16, and March 16 will be fully subscribed in a few days. In Boston there has been such a great demand, the four series having been fully subscribed last spring, that a new series has just been announced. This has been done to accommodate the waiting list for these concerts which has reached the unprecedented number of 967, and for the others who would otherwise be unable to hear the orchestra. These concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons at 3:15. This will bring the total number of concerts to be given in greater Boston this season to 76.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. And in America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Boston Symphony orchestra's new conductor is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the concerts are at a premium. Naturally much was expected of him. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, each city he has visited, the effect has been electric. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consensus of opinion been so high and [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

OCT 3 0 1925

FORMER SYMPHONY LEADER DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29—(A. P.).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 3 1 1925

MORE CONCERTS BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Management Announces a New Series for Tuesday Afternoons Once a Month.

Now in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Lowell this season.

SERGE KOUSSEVIT¼KY.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York when 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average Symphony programs lasts about one hour and three-quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of Symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 3 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANS 5 DAY CONCERTS

Under Distinguished Leadership of Serge Koussevitzky; From December to April; Unable to Visit Salem

Now, in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Salem this season.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average symphony program lasts about one hour and three quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestral repertory from the times of Bach, Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument.

Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the

Music of the Older Masters

and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this same orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga river, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, in this vast country and thus taking Symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in European Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which still, from that time to this, attract as much attention in Paris as any Symphony concerts. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra. He has conducted opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago with this reputation to herald him Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

THIS
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 3 0 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES ABROAD AT 80

As Boston Symphony Conductor He Placed Orchestra Among First in the World.

TWICE CAME TO AMERICA

Viennese Leader's Pioneer Work in Setting Standards Here Recalled by Musicians in Tributes.

Copyright, 1925, by The New York Times Company.
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, for many years a well-known orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, is dead at his home here at the age of 80 years.

His death, which occurred on Tuesday, followed a period of failing health from infirmities of age. He leaves a widow and daughter.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke will always be associated closely and indelibly with the musical development of America. It was he, more than any other one man, who carried out the ideal of Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra was organized in 1881 and was for three years conducted by Georges Henschel. It was soon obvious that Henschel, an excellent musician, was not the conductor to bring the Boston Symphony to the pitch of excellence th Major Higginson desired.

WILHELM GERICKE.

In the Fall of 1883-84 Mr. Higginson, in Vienna, heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aïda." The impression of this performance, strengthened by careful inquiries in authoritative quarters, convinced Major Higginson that in Gericke he had found the leader he wanted, and the following season the new conductor from Vienna undertook his duties in Boston.

Two Terms in Boston.

Gericke brought to his work exceptional earnestness and exceptional capacities. He was born at Graz, Styria April 18, 1845. He was a pupil of Des off at the Vienna Conservatory from 1862 to 1865, after which he becam capellmeister at Linz. In 1874 he b came second conductor at the Vien Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as co ductor of the Geschellschaft co and also directed the Singverein city. He soon gained reputatio drillmaster of extraordinary pe and ability and as a musicia highest ideals. Invited by Maj ginson to come to America, he f the opportunity that was given Boston to create by systematic remitting labor an orchestra th equal the greatest organizatio kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was to 1889. He was succeeded Nikisch and Emil Paur. D time he returned to Vienna, resumed the conductorship o sellschaft concerts until 1885, to Boston for his second term wi Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1 Resigning this position in 1906, he retired to private life in Vienna.

WIDOW CABLES OF DEATH.

Asks That Gericke's Friends Be Notified—Tributes by Leaders.

The widow of Wilhelm Gericke, wh with her husband often was a visitor New York, accompanying him here the trips of the orchestra during th two terms of residence in Amer cabled a notification of his death terday to Frank Damrosch, head of Institute of Musical Art.

Mrs. Gericke asked Dr. Damro inform their wide circle of old here, a group including not acquaintances, but also man who first came to players under Ge oover,

"He was irresistibly, friend," Dr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 3 1 1925

THE coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, with its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the event of the week. The orchestra is larger this year and its attainments during its first year under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership have made for an ensemble of remarkable beauty. The string section of the orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensemble now numbers 108.

Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra, it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the manager, during a recent visit in Buffalo. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, 34 of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear.

The program for Wednesday evening will be as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora, a Folk Fairy-Tale, Op. 63. Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt (from the Opera Kitej) ...... Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
I Calme; Assez anime; Calme
II Modere, tres rythme
III Anime: modere
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68. Brahms
I Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II Andante sostenuto
III Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

In response to a special request, the program has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced. There will be an intermission before the symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert is the first of six to visit Buffalo this season under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation. The next concert will be December 1, by the Detroit Symphony orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor, and later concerts will be given by the Cincinnati and Cleveland orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

OCT 3 1 1925

FAMOUS ARTISTS IN SEDGWICK COURSE

Giovanni Martinelli and Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled.

The local musical season will be greatly enhanced by the appearance of Martinelli, the renowned tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, and the second local appearance of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of ~~Serge Koussevitsky~~ at the Capitol theater on two Sunday afternoons this season, under the auspices of the Sedgwick banner, the former coming on January 24 and the latter on February 7. The early demand for seats indicates that both events will enjoy a sold-out house and immediate application is advisable. The sale is now in progress at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. From patrons unable to attend the sale in person mail orders will be received. All orders and checks should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus and prices giving full particulars will be mailed upon request by letter or patrons may phone 2-6147.

The attractions of the Sedgwick Concerts for the season of 1925-1926 are undoubtedly two of the most popular in the entire realm of music. Giovanni Martinelli, a leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, is a welcomed artist on the local concert stage.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has always been the premier orchestral event of the year, but under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian, it has received a new impetus and is to-day the ranking orchestra of America and some say of the world. Mr. Koussevitsky's reception here of the occasion of his debut is still the talk in local musical circles. Last season's concert was acclaimed the musical event of the decade and so the forthcoming concert is being regarded in the nature of being the supreme musical event of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 3 1 1925

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA POPULAR

From the Boston Transcript.

If some observers of the course of music in Boston were mildly amazed to note the flood of popular demand for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra evident from the very outset of the current season, the recent announcement brings super-surprise. The 48 concerts of Friday and Saturday, the five of Monday, the nine in Cambridge, the performances for the pension fund—all taken together—have so little sufficed to meet the public call for seats, that five more concerts, for Tuesday afternoon, have been added. The season thus will comprise 70 concerts of full symphonic quality. The number is not only unprecedented in Boston, but unequaled by any great orchestra in any city of the land. The Philadelphia season comprises 68 concerts of comparable character, the Chicago 64.

Much of the new sway which the Symphony is thus seen to be exerting over the people of Boston must be attributed, no doubt, to the individual influence of the magnetic and compelling Mr. Koussevitsky. But the movement cannot be denied ~~also a~~ share of broader significance, a gratifying value as witness of Boston's increased affection for one of the city's finest institutions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

OCT 3 1 1925

The tenth season of symphony orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association will open auspiciously next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, at Syria Mosque by a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under their distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitzky. Other orchestras to be heard during the season include the Cleveland, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor on November 20 and 21, and on January 22 and 23. For the November concert, a Brahms program will be given, and the Mendelssohn Choir of Pittsburgh, Ernest Lunt, conductor, will render "Brahm's Requiem." At the second Cleveland concert, Josef Lhevinne will appear as piano soloist. The Cincinnati Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner, will come on December 11 and 12, bringing Kathryn Meisle, as contralto soloist. The New York Philharmonic, under Willem Mengelberg, will give the fourth pair on January 8 and 9, and the closing pair on March 12 and 13, with Wilhelm Furtwaengler, conducting. The Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor, will give one evening concert, on Monday, February 22. Indications point to the most brilliant season in 10 years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

OCT 3 1 1925

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, New York, Providence and elsewhere have never been in so great demand as in this season, and there is every indication that the season sale for the Infantry Hall series of five concerts to be given on the Tuesday evenings of November 17, December 15, January 19, February 16, and March 16 will be fully subscribed in a few days. In Boston there has been such a great demand, the four series having been fully subscribed last spring, that a new series has just been announced. This has been done to accommodate the waiting list for these concerts which has reached the unprecedented number of 967, and for the others who would otherwise be unable to hear the orchestra. These concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons at 3:15. This will bring the total number of concerts to be given in greater Boston this season to 76.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. And in America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Boston Symphony orchestra's new conductor is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed and seats for the concerts are at a premium. Naturally much was expected of him. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, each city he has visited, the effect has been electric. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consensus of opinion been so high and [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

133

OCT 30 1925

FORMER SYMPHONY LEADER DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 29—(A. P.).—Wilhelm Gericke, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead. A cablegram received here today from Vienna said that Gericke, who came to Boston to take charge of the orchestra in 1884, three years after it was founded, had died on Tuesday. He had long been ill. He was born in Schwanberg, Styria.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 3 1 1925

MORE CONCERTS BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Management Announces a New Series for Tuesday Afternoons Once a Month.

Now in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Lowell this season.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York when 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average Symphony programs lasts about one hour and three-quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of Symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 3 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANS 5 DAY CONCERTS

Under Distinguished Leadership of Serge Koussevitzky; From December to April; Unable to Visit Salem

Now, in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Salem this season.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average symphony program lasts about one hour and three quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestral repertory from the times of Bach, Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument.

Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the

Music of the Older Masters

and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this same orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga river, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, in this vast country and thus taking Symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in European Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which still, from that time to this, attract as much attention in Paris as any Symphony concerts. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra. He has conducted opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 30 1925

WILHELM GERICKE DIES ABROAD AT 80

As Boston Symphony Conductor He Placed Orchestra Among First in the World.

TWICE CAME TO AMERICA

Viennese Leader's Pioneer Work in Setting Standards Here Recalled by Musicians in Tributes.

Copyright, 1925, by The New York Times Company.
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, for many years a well-known orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, is dead at his home here at the age of 80 years.

His death, which occurred on Tuesday, followed a period of failing health from infirmities of age. He leaves a widow and daughter.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke will always be associated closely and indelibly with the musical development of America. It was he, more than any other one man, who carried out the ideal of Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra was organized in 1881 and was for three years conducted by Georges Henschel. It was soon obvious that Henschel, an excellent musician, was not the conductor to bring the Boston Symphony to the pitch of excellence th[illegible] Major Higginson desired.

WILHELM GERICKE.

In the Fall of 1883-84 Mr. Higginson, in Vienna, heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aïda." The impression of this performance, strengthened by careful inquiries in authoritative quarters, convinced Major Higginson that in Gericke he had found the leader he wanted, and the following season the new conductor from Vienna undertook his duties in Boston.

Two Terms in Boston.

Gericke brought to his work exceptional earnestness and exceptional capacities. He was born at Graz, Styria, April 18, 1845. He was a pupil of Dessoff at the Vienna Conservatory from 1862 to 1865, after which he became capellmeister at Linz. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vien[illegible] Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geschellschaft co[illegible] and also directed the Singverein [illegible] city. He soon gained reputatio[illegible] drillmaster of extraordinary pe[illegible] and ability and as a musicia[illegible] highest ideals. Invited by Maj[illegible] ginson to come to America, he f[illegible] the opportunity that was given [illegible] Boston to create by systematic [illegible] remitting labor an orchestra th[illegible] equal the greatest organizatio[illegible] kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was [illegible] to 1889. He was succeeded [illegible] Nikisch and Emil Paur. D[illegible] time he returned to Vienna, [illegible] resumed the conductorship of [illegible] sellschaft concerts until 1885, re[illegible] to Boston for his second term wi[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra in 18[illegible] Resigning this position in 1906, he retired to private life in Vienna.

WIDOW CABLES OF DEATH.

Asks That Gericke's Friends Be Notified—Tributes by Leaders.

The widow of Wilhelm Gericke, wh[illegible] with her husband often was a visitor [illegible] New York, accompanying him here [illegible] the trips of the orchestra during th[illegible] two terms of residence in Amer[illegible] cabled a notification of his death [illegible] terday to Frank Damrosch, head of [illegible] Institute of Musical Art.

Mrs. Gericke asked Dr. Damro[illegible] inform their wide circle of old [illegible] here, a group including not [illegible] acquaintances, but also man[illegible] who first came to [illegible] players under Ger[illegible]eover,

"He was [illegible] irresistibly, friend," Dr. [illegible] one for who[illegible]

134

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

First in a Series of Five Concerts
by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Great Orchestra and A Great Leader

Friday Evening, November 27
at 8:15 o'clock

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

> From a Tribute to Koussevitzky by Albert Roussel, the Famous French Composer
>
> "In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said of the great Magyar leader—'he plays on the orchestra'."
> —Musique et Théatre, June, 1925.

January 8, February 5, March 12, April 9

Opera House Academy of Music

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

Prices for Five Concerts
Boxes	$12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $7.00
Orchestra	$10.00, $8.00
First Balcony	$10.00, $8.00, $7.00
Second Balcony	$7.00, $5.00

SYMPHONY HALL, Boston Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9 Mar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15

A NEW SERIES OF 5 TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Haverhill Gazette Oct 31

CONCERTS BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

All reserved seats for the four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston this season were sold out by advance subscription. The Tuesday series has been added to meet in part the unfilled demand for concerts by the great orchestra.

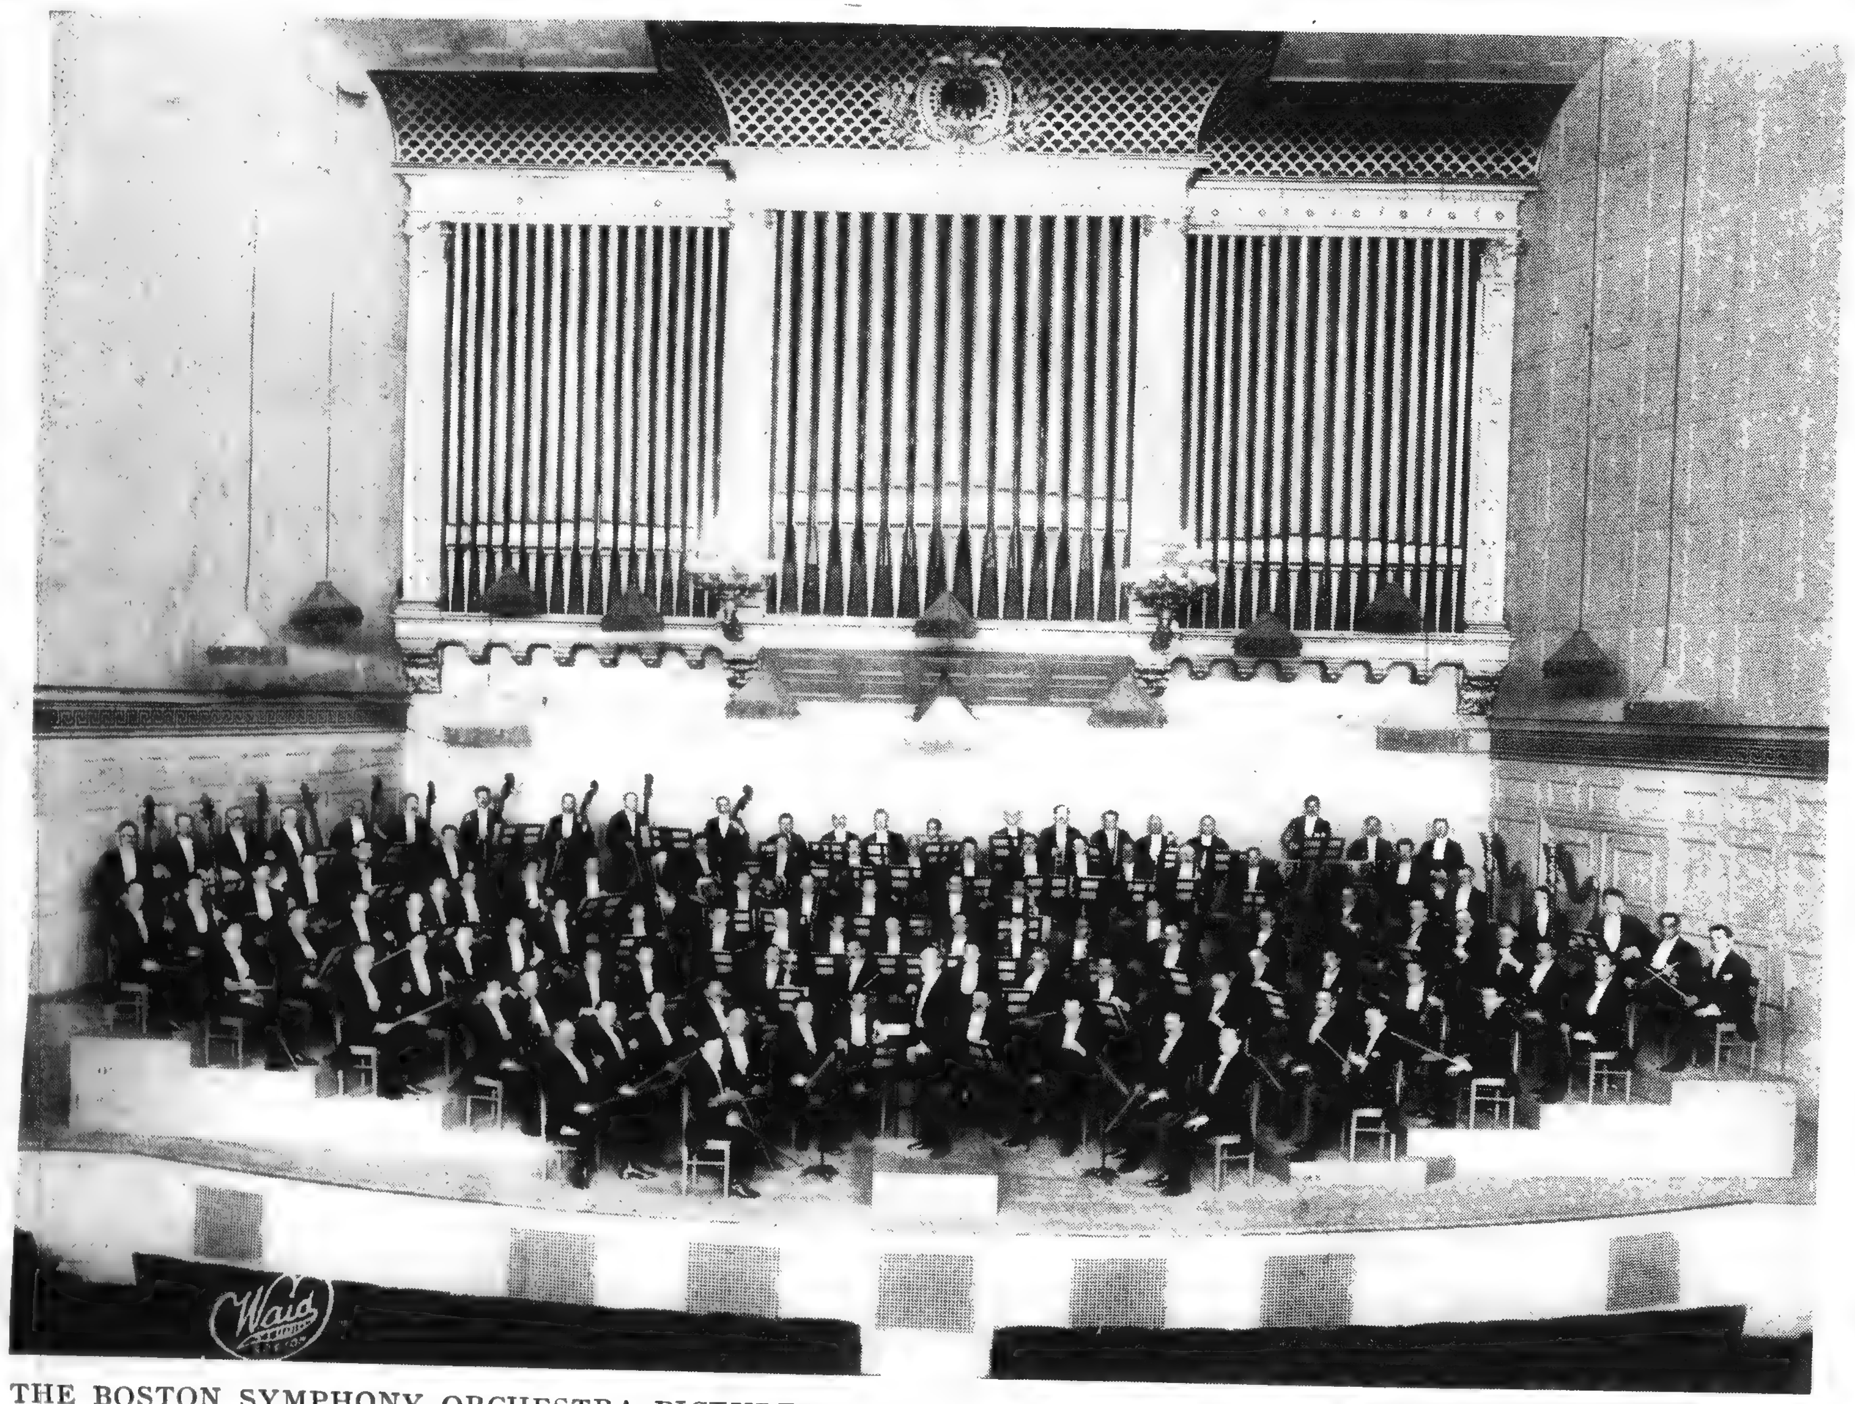
Mr. Koussevitzky plans to make the programs particularly enjoyable, while giving them the further interest of historical sequence. Containing representative masterpieces from each important period, they will embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not visit Haverhill this season.

Season Prices, 5 Concerts—$4, $5, $7.50 and $9, no tax
Sale Opens at Symphony Hall, Monday, Nov. 2, 9 A. M.

Mail Orders Promptly Filled—Checks Payable to Symphony Hall.

amp-31



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PICTURED FOR THE FIRST TIME UNDER SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The photograph was made on October 10, 1925, after the opening Saturday evening concert of the season, on the stage of Symphony Hall, Boston. With each string section increased, the personnel this season numbers 108, which is larger than ever before. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the Orchestra. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the Conductor has all the violins—34 of them—massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players (excepting the horns) were formerly at the rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky giving his Boston terrier "Droll" symphonic instruction

A few tickets, and only a few, still remain available for those who wish to hear this season the five Friday evening Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspiring direction of SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY. This great Orchestra, with the baton in the hand of KOUSSEVITZKY, continues to maintain its position as one of the world's foremost orchestras. The Conductor himself, in his second season, has risen to new heights after his summer concerts in Paris. Of his accomplishments in those concerts, ALBERT ROUSSEL, the French composer, wrote:

"With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance . . . and surely it can be said of him what has been said of the great Magyar leader (NIKISCH)—'he plays on the orchestra.'"

Perhaps in no form does art make so universal an appeal as in symphonic music, where, free from the intrusion of directly articulated thought, men and women are stripped of contention, lifted above the clattering wheels and the shrill necessities of every day. Certainly, for many, it fills a place to which nothing else is adequate. It might well be contended that the symphony attains the uttermost [illegible] art is capable, bringing beauty with the

---

HER NINTH SYMPHONY Oct 25

Since seats for all series of Boston Symphony concerts this season in Boston and Cambridge are fully subscribed, the first opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the great orchestra will come with the Pension Fund concert which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, November 22. Mr. Koussevitzky will then for the first time in America conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The full Boston Symphony orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists in the performance.

CHERKASSKY AT Oct 25 HER SYMPHONY TODAY

Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist of 14, will give a recital in Symphony hall this afternoon at 3:30. He has been heard and commended by Hofmann, Paderewski and Godowsky.

His program follows:

Prelude and Fugue, B flat minor	Bach
Symphonic Etudes	Schumann
Sonata B flat minor, op 35; Nocturne D flat major, op. 27, No. 2; Mazurka F sharp minor, op. 59, No. 3; Valse brillante, op. 34, No. 1	Chopin
Tango	Albeniz-Godowsky
Moment Musical	Schubert-Godowsky
Zouave's Drill	Mana-Zucca
Nafla Waltz	Dohnanyi

Manon Lohengrin

N.Y. TIMES Oct 25

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last Summer in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French Government with the emblem of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the bassoon and double bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpentier, for four harps with percussion, and M. Paul Le Flem, for double bass and flute.

Other composers who were present but did not contribute music were Ravel Schmitt, Aubert, Gretchaninoff, Taillefferre, Boulanger, Saminski, Ilbert, Georges, Laparra and Borchard.

TRAVELER OCT 24

Play Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony

A brilliant performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony was the feature of yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was the first time Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted the music in this country, and it was a great occasion for this symphony, worn as it is by time, by extravagant sentimentalizing and by repeated hearings.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a clear, well-ordered and sympathetic reading without wallowing in pathos. The march movement in particular was marvelously done, with its swinging rhythm and blare of trumpets, its triumphant march-song which Mr. Koussevitzy introduced so subtly, a perfect glory of sound. In spite of the tacit ruling against applause during the symphony, this movement was followed by a spontaneous burst of clapping, and Mr. Koussevitzky did not silence it. After the symphony he was recalled many times.

Liadov's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse," was performed for the first time in Boston. Its solemn grandeur accords with the dignity of the subject, and it is not lacking in dramatic impressiveness.

Debussy's First Rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra served to introduce the new clarinetist, Edmond Allegra, as soloist. Dukas's delightful "Sorcerer's Apprentice" closed the program.

Dohnanyi's Naila Waltz.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

Next week's regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 30 and 31, in Symphony Hall, will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; Stravinsky's Suite, "The Song of the Nightingale"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" from the opera "Kitej"; and Moussorgsky's Persian Dances from the Opera "Khovantchina."

These and all other series of Symphony concerts being fully subscribed for the season, the first opportunity for others to hear the orchestra will come with the announced Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22. This will be a notable occasion in that Serge Koussevitzky will be heard for the first time in this country in a performance of Beethoven's Choral masterpiece, the Ninth Symphony. The entire Symphony orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists in the performance of this masterpiece.

Wilhelm Gericke

TRANSCRIPT Oct 29

By M. A. DeWolfe Howe

The word that has just come from Vienna, announcing the death of Wilhelm Gericke on Tuesday of this week, is a word that will stir many memories of gratitude and pleasure in the older generation of music-loving Bostonians. It is not for the elders alone, however, that the name of Gericke is filled with significance. The man who received, and deserved, the appellation of "The Maker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," lives today for the youngest concert-goer in the organization which took its lasting form under its second conductor.

+ + +

When Gericke first came to Boston in 1884 he was not quite forty years old. At his death this week he was past eighty. The orchestra, in 1884, had passed through its first three seasons under Georg Henschel, a charming singer, but without the expertness and authority in orchestral conducting which Gericke brought with him from Vienna. "You have not an orchestra here," he said at once to Henry L. Higginson, who had placed and was long to hold the organization on its feet. "There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra." To make it an orchestra of the first rank became his immediate and controlling object, in which he had the complete backing of Mr. Higginson. He introduced standards of discipline and musicianship previously unknown, and encountered violent criticism for replacing some of the older and less satisfactory players with the best young musicians he could find in Europe. "We are thankful," exclaimed one critic of his course, "that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson."

The results of the new spirit and method established by Gericke were amazing and the orchestra, at home and throughout the country, became the institution it has remained. "There was no limit to his patience," said Mr. Higginson of the new conductor, "and no limit to the pains which he took."

After five years of the most fruitful service, he was succeeded by Nikisch, followed in turn by Paur. Then for a second term of eight years, 1898-1905, Gericke came back to Boston, and completed with high success a total term of conductorship in Boston covering nearly a third of the history of the orchestra.

+ + +

It is a matter of recent happy memory that when a special concert for the benefit of Mr. Gericke was undertaken a few years ago, M. Monteux, then conducting the orchestra, threw himself into its accomplishment with the warmest spirit of generosity. The substantial proceeds from the concert and the feeling which prompted it were a genuine help and solace to Mr. Gericke in his declining years. It is a happy and not unrelated memory that near the end of Gericke's second period in Boston, the first guest conductor at regular concerts of the orchestra appears in the person of the French composer, M. Vincent D'Indy. With all that Gericke did for the orchestra in the field of technical excellence, it should be remembered, in the final statement of the debt to him which can never be discharged in full, that the standard of catholicity and hospitality in art which he set has become a present permanent possession of the orchestra.

As a man and a friend there are many in Boston who will hold him to the end of their own lives in a special place and loving remembrance.

12

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

First in a Series of Five Concerts
by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Friday Evening, November 27
at 8:15 o'clock

A Great Orchestra and A Great Leader

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

From a Tribute to Koussevitzky by Albert Roussel, the Famous French Composer

"In fact, it is impossible to see him at the conductor's desk without being struck by the impression of calm authority, concentrated energy, which is an expression of an imperious and essentially original personality. With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance. He has recalled to some the memory of Nikisch, and surely it can be said of him what has been said of the great Magyar leader 'he plays on the orchestra'."
Musique et Théatre, June, 1925.

January 8, February 5, March 12, April 9

Opera House Academy of Music

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

Prices for Five Concerts
Boxes . . $12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $7.00
Orchestra $10.00, $8.00
First Balcony . . . $10.00, $8.00, $7.00
Second Balcony $7.00, $5.00

SYMPHONY HALL, Boston Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9 Mar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15

A NEW SERIES OF 5 TUESDAY AFTERNOON

CONCERTS BY THE

Haverhill Gazette Oct 31

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

All reserved seats for the four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston this season were sold out by advance subscription. The Tuesday series has been added to meet in part the unfilled demand for concerts by the great orchestra.

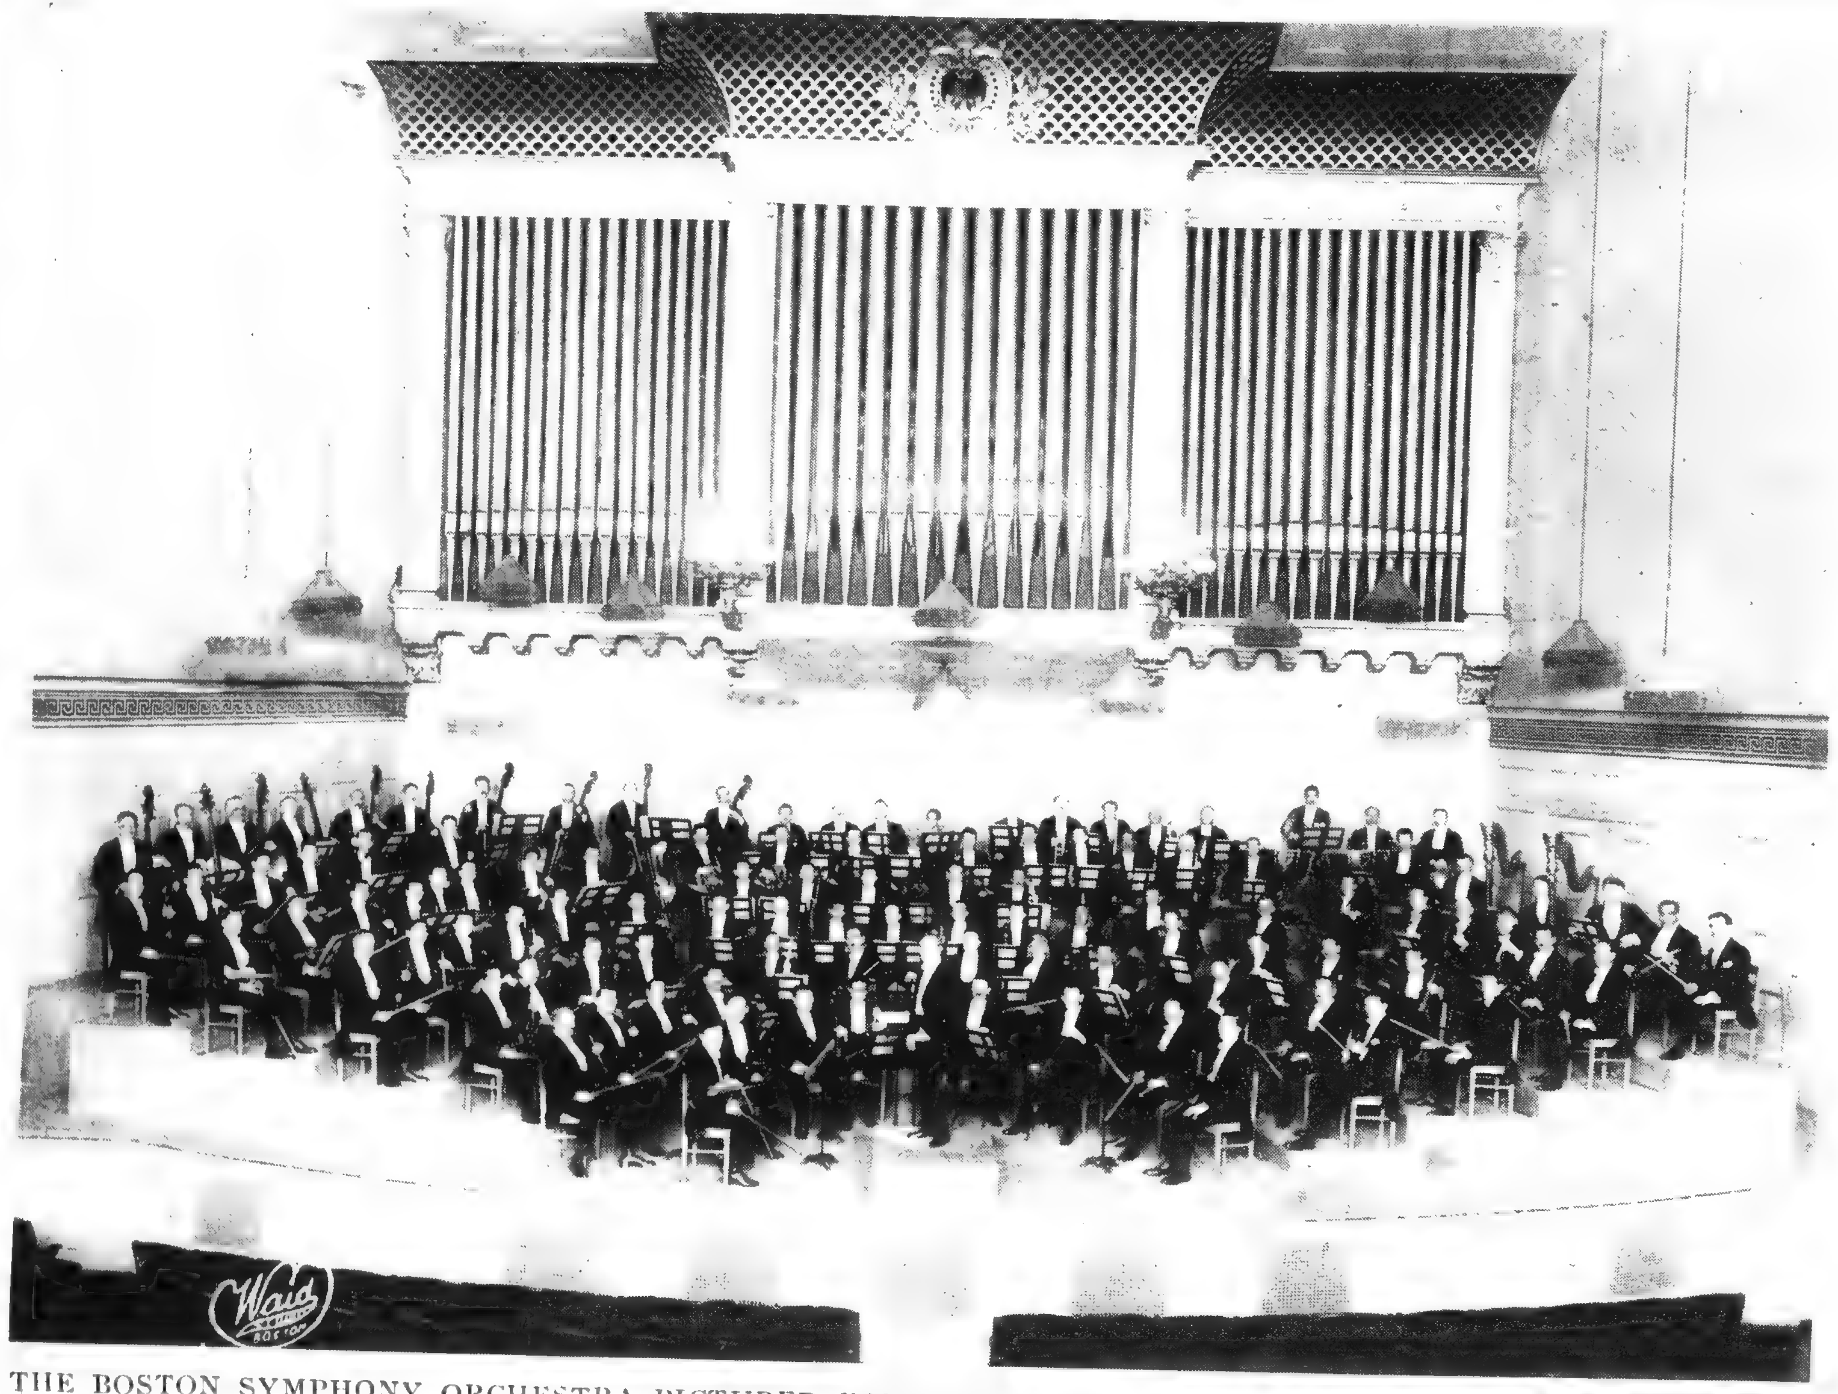
Mr. Koussevitzky plans to make the programs particularly enjoyable, while giving them the further interest of historical sequence. Containing representative masterpieces from each important period, they will embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not visit Haverhill this season.

Season Prices, 5 Concerts—$4, $5, $7.50 and $9, no tax
Sale Opens at Symphony Hall, Monday, Nov. 2, 9 A. M.

Mail Orders Promptly Filled—Checks Payable to Symphony Hall.

amp-31



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PICTURED FOR THE FIRST TIME UNDER SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The photograph was made on October 10, 1925, after the opening Saturday evening concert of the season, on the stage of Symphony Hall, Boston. With each string section increased, the personnel this season numbers 108, which is larger than ever before. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the Orchestra. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the Conductor has all the violins—34 of them—massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players (excepting the horns) were formerly at the rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance

---

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky giving his Boston terrier "Droll" symphonic instruction

A few tickets, and only a few, still remain available for those who wish to hear this season the five Friday evening Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspiring direction of SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY. This great Orchestra, with the baton in the hand of KOUSSEVITZKY, continues to maintain its position as one of the world's foremost orchestras. The Conductor himself, in his second season, has risen to new heights after his summer concerts in Paris. Of his accomplishments in those concerts, ALBERT ROUSSEL, the French composer, wrote:

"With his straight figure, his dominating eye, he summons with an irresistible gesture all that is in the orchestra—unloosed sonorities which nevertheless are shaped by his will into a perfect balance . . . and surely it can be said of him what has been said of the great Magyar leader (NIKISCH)—'he plays on the orchestra.'"

Perhaps in no form does art make so universal an appeal as in symphonic music, where, free from the intrusion of directly articulated thought, men and women are stripped of contention, lifted above the clattering wheels and the shrill necessities of every day. Certainly, for many, it fills a place to which nothing else is adequate. It might well be contended that the symphony attains the uttermost of which art is capable, bringing beauty with the

---

Her

NINTH SYMPHONY

Oct 25

Since seats for all series of Boston Symphony concerts this season in Boston and Cambridge are fully subscribed, the first opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the great orchestra will come with the Pension Fund concert which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, November 22. Mr. Koussevitzky will then for the first time in America conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The full Boston Symphony orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists in the performance.

CHERKASSKY AT SYMPHONY TODAY

Oct 25 Her

Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist of 14, will give a recital in Symphony hall this afternoon at 3:30. He has been heard and commended by Hofmann, Paderewski and Godowsky.

His program follows:

Prelude and Fugue, B flat minor	Bach
Symphonic Etudes	Schumann
Sonata B flat minor, op 35; Nocturne D flat major, op. 27, No. 2; Mazurka F sharp minor, op. 59, No. 3; Valse brillante, op. 34, No. 1	Chopin
Tango	Albeniz-Godowsky
Moment Musical	Schubert-Godowsky
Zouave's Drill	Mana-Zucca
Nafia Waltz	Dohnanyi

[illegible] "Lohengrin."

N.Y. Times Oct 25

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last Summer in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French Government with the emblem of the "Chevalier of the Legion of Honor." Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the bassoon and double bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpentier, for four harps with percussion, and M. Paul Le Flem, for double bass and flute.

Other composers who were present but did not contribute music were Ravel Schmitt, Aubert, Gretchaninoff, Tailleferre, Boulanger, Saminski, Ilbert, Georges, Laparra and Borchard.

Traveler Oct 24

Play Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony

A brilliant performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony was the feature of yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was the first time Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted the music in this country, and it was a great occasion for this symphony, worn as it is by time, by extravagant sentimentalizing and by repeated hearings.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a clear, well-ordered and sympathetic reading without wallowing in pathos. The march movement in particular was marvelously done, with its swinging rhythm and blare of trumpets, its triumphant march-song which Mr. Koussevitzy introduced so subtly, a perfect glory of sound. In spite of the tacit ruling against applause during the symphony, this movement was followed by a spontaneous burst of clapping, and Mr. Koussevitzky did not silence it. After the symphony he was recalled many times.

Liadov's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse," was performed for the first time in Boston. Its solemn grandeur accords with the dignity of the subject, and it is not lacking in dramatic impressiveness.

Debussy's First Rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra served to introduce the new clarinetist, Edmond Allegra, as soloist. Dukas's delightful "Sorcerer's Apprentice" closed the program.

Dohnanyi's Naila Waltz.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

Next week's regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 30 and 31, in Symphony Hall, will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; Stravinsky's Suite, "The Song of the Nightingale"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" from the opera "Kitej"; and Moussorgsky's Persian Dances from the Opera "Khovantchina."

These and all other series of Symphony concerts being fully subscribed for the season, the first opportunity for others to hear the orchestra will come with the announced Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22. This will be a notable occasion in that Serge Koussevitzky will be heard for the first time in this country in a performance of Beethoven's Choral masterpiece, the Ninth Symphony. The entire Symphony orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists in the performance of this masterpiece.

ELMAN

Wilhelm Gericke

Transcript—Oct 29

By M. A. DeWolfe Howe

The word that has just come from Vienna, announcing the death of Wilhelm Gericke on Tuesday of this week, is a word that will stir many memories of gratitude and pleasure in the older generation of music-loving Bostonians. It is not for the elders alone, however, that the name of Gericke is filled with significance. The man who received, and deserved, the appellation of "The Maker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," lives today for the youngest concert-goer in the organization which took its lasting form under its second conductor.

+ + +

When Gericke first came to Boston in 1884 he was not quite forty years old. At his death this week he was past eighty. The orchestra, in 1884, had passed through its first three seasons under Georg Henschel, a charming singer, but without the expertness and authority in orchestral conducting which Gericke brought with him from Vienna. "You have not an orchestra here," he said at once to Henry L. Higginson, who had placed and was long to hold the organization on its feet. "There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra." To make it an orchestra of the first rank became his immediate and controlling object, in which he had the complete backing of Mr. Higginson. He introduced standards of discipline and musicianship previously unknown, and encountered violent criticism for replacing some of the older and less satisfactory players with the best young musicians he could find in Europe. "We are thankful," exclaimed one critic of his course, "that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson."

The results of the new spirit and method established by Gericke were amazing and the orchestra, at home and throughout the country, became the institution it has remained. "There was no limit to his patience," said Mr. Higginson of the new conductor, "and no limit to the pains which he took."

After five years of the most fruitful service he was succeeded by Nikisch, followed in turn by Paur. Then for a second term of eight years, 1898-1905, Gericke came back to Boston, and completed with high success a total term of conductorship in Boston covering nearly a third of the history of the orchestra.

+ + +

It is a matter of recent happy memory that when a special concert for the benefit of Mr. Gericke was undertaken a few years ago, M. Monteux, then conducting the orchestra, threw himself into its accomplishment with the warmest spirit of generosity. The substantial proceeds from the concert and the feeling which prompted it were a genuine help and solace to Mr. Gericke in his declining years. It is a happy and not unrelated memory that near the end of Gericke's second period in Boston, the first guest conductor at regular concerts of the orchestra appears in the person of the French composer, M. Vincent D'Indy. With all that Gericke did for the orchestra in the field of technical excellence, it should be remembered, in the final statement of the debt to him which can never be discharged in full, that the standard of catholicity and hospitality in art which he set has become a present permanent possession of the orchestra.

As a man and a friend there are many in Boston who will hold him to the end of their own lives in a special place and loving remembrance.

WILHELM GERICKE, LONG LEADER OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, DEAD

Globe Oct 30

Great Conductor Brought Organization Into Prominence—

End Comes at 80 in Vienna

Wilhelm Gericke, twice leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a total of 11 seasons, died in Vienna Tuesday at the age of 80 years, according to cable dispatches received here yesterday. He is recalled as the man who more than any other made the Symphony Orchestra what it is today.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, in April, 1845, Gericke's musical education was received almost solely at the Vienna Conservatory, where he made such progress that upon graduation he accepted the position of one of the three leaders at the Imperiol Opera in Vienna.

He was brought to this country in 1884 by the late Maj Henry L. Higginson to become the second leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then in its fourth year, holding the position until 1889, and returning here in 1898 to be leader again for eight years.

New Men Brought Here

A year or more after he first took command of the orchestra, Gericke completely reorganized it, sending to Vienna for many new and younger men. Among those whom he imported were Timothy and Joseph Adamowski.

During his years here, the great conductor proved himself an eclectic, choosing music which was at that time considered the best. It has often been said of him that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effects originally intended by the composers for their works.

Gericke was considered a strong disciplinarian, but no more likeable personality ever headed the Symphony Orchestra. He made the orchestra, bringing it to a perfection of roundness in sound, rather than an organization of individualists. It was under his direction that the orchestra first gave concerts in New York and other cities outside of New England.

Will Honor His Memory

Towards the end of his stay here, Gericke, always noted for his love of classical music, showed more and more sympathy for modern composers, and played their works with a wonderful enthusiasm and devotion. It was during his second term that Symphony Hall was opened, in 1900, and that the pension fund was established.

WILHELM GERICKE.

Oct 30 THE BOSTON HERALD,

EX-LEADER OF SYMPHONY DEAD

Wilhelm Gericke Served as Conductor of Orchestra 13 Years

SUCCUMBS IN VIENNA AFTER LONG ILLNESS

Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for more than 13 years, died in Vienna, Austria, last Tuesday, according to dispatches from that city. He had been sick for some time.

Born in Schwanberg, Styria, on April 14, 1845, Gericke first showed traces of the talent that later developed into musical genius when he was 15 years old. As a result he was sent to the Vienna Conservatory, where he made rapid progress and on graduating was accorded the position as one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the imperial opera.

CAME HERE IN 1884

In 1884, while he was still under 40, he came to America to take charge of the Boston orchestra, which had been founded three years previously. Henry Lee Higginson had heard him conduct in Austria a few months before and had been so favorably impressed that he engaged him almost on the spot.

For about a year Gericke made the best of the musical material that he had found in the orchestra and then he sent to Vienna for a number of younger and more skillful men. He was a strict disciplinarian, but possessed a charming personality which attracted and held the players.

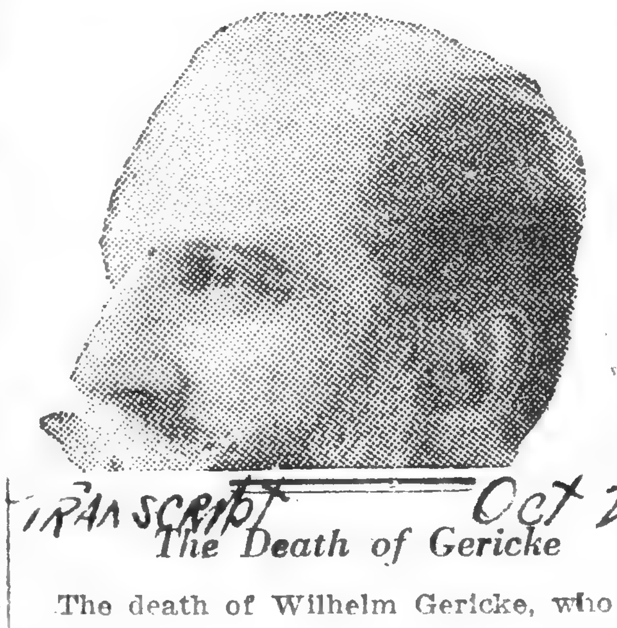
In 1889 it was announced that his health had been undermined by the New England climate and following a tour as far West as St. Louis and a farewell testimonial concert here he resigned. In 1898 he again accepted an invitation to lead the organization and remained conductor of the orchestra until 1906. It was during his terms that the Boston Symphony first gave concerts in cities outside of New England and began to win its reputation as one of the finest musical organizations in the world.

When word came in 1922 that Gericke was in financial difficulties, a special benefit concert was given by the orchestra and the gross proceeds were forwarded to the musician.

Although Gericke received practically all of his training in Vienna he was not a nationalist and selected the music he considered most worthy regardless of its origin. He avoided musical innovations to a large extent, however, and based most of his programs on the acknowledged classics.

In memory of its former leader the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" at the concerts this afternoon and tomorrow evening.

Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Dead



Transcript Oct 29

The Death of Gericke

The death of Wilhelm Gericke, who w twice, and for a total period longer th any other man, the director of the Bost Symphony Orchestra, is reported to t Transcript from Vienna. He had round out a long life, for he was born in 184 To him the debt of American music heavy, by reason of the stamp of precisio of technical perfectness, of lucidity, whi he put upon the work of our country greatest orchestra. Personally he will remembered as an artist and a gentlema of the highest quality. For thirteen yea —that is, in his first connection from 18 to 1889, and in his second from 1898 1906—he lived in Boston, and was the so as well as the master of the Symphon Orchestra. All that other and very different men have also been, but it is not too muc to say that the tradition of his calm bato will always brood above the orchestra performance.

Wilhelm Gericke was called, at least his first incarnation at the old Music Hal distinctly a classicist. The critics deeme him cold. Certainly he was never sensational. Between his two periods of service here the orchestra had in Arthur Nikisch a conductor who was nothing if not warm His work was altogether a contrast to Gericke's. Each man had his partisans. When Gericke came back in triumph in 1898 the change was felt to be a return of the more conservative tradition, and so it was indeed, but in the interval Mr. Gericke had apparently gained greatly in breadth and catholicity, and no conductor had given the American people as many novelties as he presented in the long succeeding period of his directorship.

A native of Graz, in Styria, Gericke was essentially Viennese in culture, as he was very largely by residence throughout the greater part of his life. His principal teacher was Dessoff, whose name was chiefly associated with Leipzig and Frankfort, but who was a conductor in Vienna during the period of Gericke's musical education. Much water, some of it very turbid, has flowed under the musical bridge since Mr. Gericke went back to Vienna for the second time, nineteen years ago. And whether or not the public accepts with gladness the new evangel, those who remember the concerts under his direction have in their minds a treasure of noble

---

TOMORROW IN BOSTON TRILLS STRAVINSKY'S FAMOUS NIGHTINGALE

Transcript Oct 29

TO SYMPHONY HALL COMES THE TONE-POEM

First an Opera, Then a Ballet in Curious and Chequered Course—The Composer's Program as Mr. Lawrence Gilman Reports It—Divisions and Implications of the Music—The Wondrous End

STRAVINSKY'S Nightingale—to sing in Boston for the first times at Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday—is a strangely hybrid bird of Chinese ancestry, Scandinavian birth, and Russian adoption. It has also had a career almost as checkered as its family tree. The Far Eastern songster of Andersen's fairy-tale suggested to Stravinsky and his librettist Mitousov a miniature three-act music drama forty minutes long. Stravinsky began the composition of the work in his "Fire-Bird" days: the first act of "Le Rossignol" was completed in 1909. The music of that portion of the opera is written in the style of Stravinsky's middle period, the period of "The Fire-Bird." Familiar voices may be heard in it: Debussy and Ravel are often within hailing distance; the decorously fantastical ghost of the young composer's master, Rimsky-Korsakov, hovers over certain passages; Musorgsky assists; even Wagner appears on the scene. There is no portent here of the later and insurgent Stravinsky, the heretical innovator of "Le Sacre du Printemps," who was afterward to complete his "Rossignol" in so unforeseen a way. The first act of "The Nightingale" is an enchanting page—it would be hard to name a lovelier thing in the music of the last fifteen years than the opening duet of the Fisherman and the bird. But this page belongs to a closed book in Stravinsky's history—a book that he was soon to close with a decisive and (to many, no doubt) a disconcerting bang, never to open it again.

Stravinsky turned from the first act of his opera to the composition of "The Fire-Bird" (1909-10)—music that belonged, in point of style, to the same transitional period. The far more daring and original "Petrushka" followed in 1910-11; and two years later, Stravinsky scandalized and rejoiced the Parisians with his revolutionary "Rite of Spring." Scarcely had the Europe of those pre-war days stopped assailing or acclaiming, according to their sympathies, the audacious young Muscovite and his unprecedented spring-song, than he presented them with his completed opera, "Le Rossignol." This "conte lyrique en trois actes, de I. Stravinsky et S. Mitousov, d'après Andersen," was finished in 1914 and produced at the Paris Opéra in May of that year. The five years that intervened between the composition of the first act and the completion of the rest of the work had metamorphosed a gifted and well-bred young gentleman of music, charmingly whimsical and a little eccentric, but speaking a language familiar in all æsthetic drawing-rooms, into what timorous souls have viewed as a creature of mad whims and disconcerting aspect, disturbing the peace of the salon by his perversely violent and incomprehensible speech, and seemingly bent upon tearing the baby grand limb from limb and twining the wires as extemporized vineleaves in his maniacal locks. Less agitated and more inquiring observers, however, perceived the master of a new tonal language—a revolutionist, no doubt, but a creator of new forms and colors, charged with mysterious potencies, and possessing a kind of beauty that was often astringent and perturbing, but incontestably original. They saw "Le Rossignol," specifically, a work full to the brim of humor, poetry, fantasy, imagination, and ironic wit. In other words, an unheralded and individual genius had been born into a world that was soon to be engrossed by an even more perturbing occurrence than the bouleverement of an art.

During the war, Stravinsky converted his opera into a ballet. In adapting the work to this new form, he omitted most of the material in the anomalous first act (the Fisherman's song is preserved, though with a different accompaniment); but the greater part of the second and third acts, comprising the Chinese March, the songs of the real and of the mechanical nightingale, and the mock funeral march, were retained. Stravinsky added some new matter, made certain transpositions, provided connective passages, and revised his instrumentation. The voice parts, both solo and choral, have in many instances been transferred to the instruments. The resultant gain in unity of style is, of course, very great. The ballet, entitled "Le Chant du Rossignol," with scenery by Matisse ("surprisingly sober and classical for a painter of his proclivities"), and choreography by Massine, was produced in Paris Feb. 2, 1920, by the Diaghylev Ballet. The music which serves as foundation for the ballet was published in 1921 under the title, "Chant du Rossignol, poème symphonique pour orchèstre."

The published score of the symphonic poem is without a program. The accomplished Henri Prunières assures us, indeed, that "it is music pure and simple." With due respect to Monsieur Prunières, this is scarcely the case; much of the work is, in fact, unintelligible as absolute music. Happily, we do not need to listen to it in ignorance of its expressive and delineative purposes; for although the printed score hints at only a few of the events and episodes which form the dramatic, pictorial, and poetic background of the music (the Chinese March and the singing of the two nightingales), it is possible to supply this essential program in full from a knowledge of the ballet and of the opera. Furthermore, in corroboration of this, we are privileged to make use in this place of information supplied by the composer.

Continued on Following Page

TOMORROW IN BOSTON TRILLS STRAVINSKY'S FAMOUS NIGHTINGALE

Continued from Preceding Page

For performances of the symphonic poem in the concert-room, Stravinsky has authorized the use of the following program, which is not, however, printed in the score. Although this program falls into three main divisions, there are no breaks in the music itself, which is continuous from beginning to end:

I. The Palace of the Chinese Emperor.—Extraordinary preparations had been made for the reception of the Nightingale, whose world-wide reputation as an incomparable singer had won for it a command performance at court. The palace had been elaborately decorated. The walls and floors, which were of porcelain, shone in the rays of a hundred thousand golden lamps. The corridors were adorned with the loveliest bell-flowers, which tinkled merrily in the currents of air stirred by the running about of the excited courtiers through the halls and rooms. . . . The Nightingale was placed on a golden perch in the great hall. A Chinese March announced the ceremonious entrance of the Emperor.

II. The Two Nightingales.—The Nightingale sang so beautifully that tears came to the eyes of the Emperor. . . . Even the lackeys and the chambermaids showed the liveliest satisfaction—which is saying a great deal, for these persons are not easily pleased. . . . A trumpet fanfare announced the arrival of the envoys from the Emperor of Japan, bearing as a gift to the Emperor of China a mechanical nightingale. . . . As soon as the artificial bird had been wound up, it began to sing, at the same time moving its tail, which glittered with gold and silver. . . . It had quite as great a success as its rival; and besides, it was much prettier to look at, as it was covered with diamonds, rubies and sapphires. . . . But where was the real nightingale? No one had noticed it flying out of the window, back to its green woods by the sea. The Emperor, wishing to compare the two singers, was furious. He decreed the banishment of the real nightingale, and ordered the mechanical nightingale to be placed on a silk cushion beside his bed. . . . One hears the song of the fisherman, who has recovered his lost friend.

III. Illness and Recovery of the Emperor of China.—The poor Emperor could scarcely breathe. He opened his eyes and saw Death seated beside him, wearing the monarch's golden crown and holding in one hand the royal golden sword and in the other the royal standard. From behind the folds of the heavy velvet curtains, grotesque and spectral heads peered out. They were the Emperor's good and evil deeds . . . , reminding him of things that caused the sweat to run down his brow. "Music! Music!" cried the Emperor, "so that I may not hear what they are saying! . . . Little golden bird, sing!—sing!" But the mechanical nightingale was silent. . . . Suddenly from the window came the sound of sweetest singing: it was the real nightingale. As it sang, the ghostly heads became paler and paler. . . . Even Death listened, and begged the Nightingale to continue. The Nightingale consented, but made Death promise to yield up the Emperor's sword, his banner, his golden crown. And Death relinquished each of these treasures for a song, whilst the Nightingale went on singing. It sang of the quiet churchyard, where the white roses grow, where the elder-tree scents the air, and where the grass is moistened by the tears of those who are left behind. Then Death longed to be in his garden and floated out through the window like a cold, white mist. . . . The Emperor fell into a calm and refreshing sleep. The sun was shining in upon him when he awoke strong and well.—Funeral March: The courtiers, visiting the chamber to look upon their supposedly dead ruler for the last time, stood aghast, for the Emperor was sitting up in bed, and greeted them with a cheerful "Good morning!" as they entered.

The Fisherman, whom the Nightingale has rejoined, sings anew his song.

The symphonic poem opens with a passage from the introduction to the second act of the opera which in that place bears the title, "Courants d'Air." It accompanies the excited and air-disturbing activities of the courtiers as they bustle about in preparation for the entrance of the emperor. This rapid introductory section of the tone-poem is practically equivalent to the scene of preparation which in the opera leads to the Chinese march. Even the voice-parts are preserved in the orchestra. This march, which evokes the solemn [illegible] the imperial court, is a delightful piece of grotesquerie, written for the most part in the pentatonic scale, with a daring and ingenious superposition of keys and rhythms. The imposing entrance of the emperor, seated in his baldachin, is signalized by a pompous triple fortissimo of the orchestra.

A staccato ascending and descending run for two bassoons, followed by harmonics on a solo violin, introduces the Song of the Nightingale—at first a preluding cadenza for the flute, then a melody for flute and E-flat clarinet, and later for solo violin with accompaniment of harps, piano celesta. The cadenza differs somewhat from that in the opera. The melodies for flute and solo violin that follow the cadenza are based on phrases of the Nightingale's song in the opera. The Presto section that began the symphonic poem is repeated—this time as preparation for the arrival of the envoys bearing the mechanical nightingale; and on the solo trumpet we hear the declamatory phrase to which, in the opera, the Third Japanese Envoy makes his announcement: "L'Empereur du Japon envoie son rossignol rival infime de ce lui de l'Empereur de Chine." There is a pause; and then the mechanical nightingale begins to whir, and finally to sing, in the piccolo, flute, and oboe. Its aria finished, the Emperor turns toward the other vocalist, eager to arrange a contest of song; but the true nightingale has disappeared. The Emperor, angry at this mark of disrespect, decrees the permanent banishment of the offender, and a muted trombone declaims the phrase which in the opera utters his displeasure. As he and his retinue depart in a huff, muted trombones, flutes, and muted horns, play fragments of the Chinese March.

A solo trumpet, accompanied by muted strings and harps, recalls the Song of the Fisherman that closes the second act of the opera. It is a song of mournful prophecy; for the Fisherman knows that life without beauty means the year without spring, the extinction of "summer's honey breath," the withering of the spirit: an eternal winter. . . .

The section that follows is the introduction to the third act of the opera which prepares us for the spectacle of the dying Emperor stretched upon his huge, carven bed, with Death, who has possessed himself of the monarch's crown and sword and bannar, seated beside him. A solo trombone declaims, forte, a harshly imperative phrase that in the opera is associated with Death in the ensuing scene between La Mort and Le Rossignol. There are half a hundred measures of this sombre prelude, and then we hear on the flute, beneath a reiterated B-flat of the piccolo, the voice of the real Nightingale, in compassionate response to the appeal of the anguished Emperor, who, terrified by the spectres of his past deeds, has called for music that he may find distraction. The Nightingale's song (now in the woodwind, now on a solo violin) is of dawns breaking on still gardens and fading stars; and then—in music of strange and haunting beauty—of another garden, the garden of Death. ("Plus loin est un jardin tranquille, clos d'un mur blanc. . . . Les morts en paix y dorment. Ah, tout y est silence; et la rosée des fleurs tombant va dans la mousse des froides dalles se perdre!") Death, moved and vanquished by the song, yields up his royal prey, and disappears. The Emperor would keep his singing friend forever by him at court, but the Nightingale has had enough of courts and emperors and stem-wound virtuosi, and with gentle tact declines the flattering invitation; but he promises to sing to the Emperor every night from the shadows of the woods, "jusqu'a l'aurore."

The echo of the song dies away muted solo violin, and the harps, piano, strings, and a curious glide of the muted trombone begin the funeral march that accompanies the entrance of the dutifully mourning but mistaken courtiers. An sforzando chord and an upward-sweeping harp glissando break in upon the delicious mock solemnity of the Cortège solennel; the emperor's cheerful "Bonjour à tous!" is uttered by an octave phrase of the harp and timpani.

And then follows the unforgettable epilogue which in the opera accompanied the slow descent of the curtain: the soliloquy of that philosophical mystic, the Fisherman (remembered here in the musing solo of the trumpet, intoned against a background of harps and muted strings), as he sings of his happiness in regaining his friend, and of the deathlessness of beauty and the transiency of death.

Le clair soleil chasse la nuit; gaiment au bois chante l'oiseau.
Ecoutez bien, et dans sa voix, reconnaissez voix du ciel. . . .

[From the Program-Book of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

POETS' READINGS AT AMHERST

Amherst, Oct. 29 (Special)—Professor Morton of the English department at Amherst has arranged for readings by two outstanding modern poets within the next two weeks, Lizette Woodworth Reese and Edwin Markham.

Capen Abbott of Winchester and Raymond E. Wicher of Taunton are Massachusetts additions to the Amherst glee club.

Transcript Oct 19

EIGHT 186

Round o

WEEK-END CONCERTS: EXITS FROM BERLIOZ, A HAMPERED SINGER

"THE FANTASTIC SYMPHONY" AND BOREDOM

Whys and Wherefores of an Evening of Departures—Mr. McCormack and a Reluctant Voice—Other Resources and a New Virtue in Interesting Play—His Excellent Violoncellist—Music, Dance and Color in Novel Jointure

BEYOND PRECEDENT for a Saturday evening were the departures while Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" dragged its slow length along a second Symphony Concert. At every pause they multiplied, until some bystanders estimated them at a quarter part of the audience. Clearly, it was not Mr. Koussevitzky or the orchestra that had wearied the departing. At every opportunity, all and sundry had clapped them. Nor was it Berlioz himself. In certain pieces both audiences hear him gladly at the Symphony Concerts—say in the overtures, "Benvenuto Cellini" and "Roman Carnival," or in the dances from "The Damnation of Faust." Rather, flight seemed the only refuge from the long-drawn boredom, in these days, of this particular Symphony. Within the memory of Bostonian man only one conductor was able to lessen it—Mr. Weingartner, twenty years ago; while he has such a flair for Berlioz, and can so reanimate these withered pages, that even the Parisians applaud him.

To this day some in Boston recall that memorable version. It gained a warmth and body that made the poetic scheme seem less an outworn and demoded romantic sham. It was also fortunate in the overcoming of the gravest drawback to the "Fantastic Symphony" in twentieth-century ears—Berlioz's habit of working first one motiv and then another, of keeping his melodies in isolation, each from each, while he is severally making play with them. Upon present ears, the outcome of this disregard of polyphony cannot be other than bareness and thinness. For pendant, a correspondent may have his little joke. He read in the program-book that at the close of the "Scene in the Fields," one of the piping shepherds "no longer answers" the other. "Quite so," says the post-card, "he had undoubtedly fallen asleep."

Already the Public Library maintains a course of informal lectures about the programs of the Symphony Concerts—on Monday afternoons at five o'clock. On Saturday last it began a second series of similar talks about the programs of the People's Symphony Orchestra or of visiting orchestras. It will continue them on successive Saturday evenings at 8.15. They will deal with the music in hand from the point of view of the listener. H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Last week, for the first time within the longest memory, the program-book of the Symphony Concerts contained an illustration—a drawing of Mr. Koussevitzky, sitting and relatively in repose. Mr. Morgan Dennis made it. A facsimile of the con-

---

PROGRAMS IN PROSPECT

Transcript Oct 22

Mr. Koussevitzky Proposes

AS ANTICIPATED in these columns, Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Song of the Nightingale," will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of next week. In America, Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra produced it almost exactly two years ago. At that time, Mr. Monteux had it in mind for Boston; finally decided to bequeath it to Mr. Koussevitzky. He, however, found no place for it in the concerts of last season. Now, at last—after New York, Chicago, Philadelphia—Boston is to hear the piece. Needless, almost, to say, it is Stravinsky's final version of music that he first cast in the form of a short opera—to be heard at the Metropolitan next winter; then recast as ballet-pantomime. In the music are songful passages of a strange and wondrous beauty; passages as well that whirl and snap and bite with a vivid and dissonant power. German and Russian pieces fill the remainder of the program; Weber's Overture to his opera, "Euryanthe"; the Fourth Symphony of Schumann—Mr. Koussevitzky's first large venture, in Boston with that composer; a battle-picture from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Kitej or The Magic City"—of old played as intermezzo before a curiously painted curtain in the performances of Monsieur Diaghylev's ballet; the beautiful Persian Dances from Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina."

PHILADELPHIA ... ADVERTISER SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIUMPHS IN 'PATHETIC' SYMPHONY

Advertiser

Prodigiously eloquent was Serge Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee yesterday.

It left the audience spellbound. Gradually the pent-up enthusiasm released itself. Conductor and orchestra rightly divided the ovation.

Koussevitzky never showed more complete mastery of his men than he did in this profoundly stirring performance; and never were the players more responsive. It was a virtuoso achievement all around—one of the most dramatic in Symphony history. The details of Tchaikovsky's symphonic tapestry were revealed with infinite care and fascinating skill.

The novelty on this week's program is a tone picture by Liadov, another Russian composer, called "From the Apocalypse;" a graphic composition also superbly played. The performance, in fact, was on the whole more impressive than the music itself.

Debussy's first rhapsody for clarinet, with orchestral accompaniment, won an ovation for Edmond Allegra, one of the new soloists. The final number is the vivacious Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the performance of which again displayed the brilliant virtuosity of the orchestra.

MANTELL FIRST TO PLAY MODERN 'HAMLET' IN U. S.

St. Louis is seeing the first modernized "Hamlet" given in the United States. Five twentieth-century versions of the Shakespearian tragedy have been talked of in New York, and one is in rehearsal. London was amazed by a similar "freak" performance in August.

Robert Mantell

Robert B. Mantell, 70-year-old Shakespearian actor, is playing Hamlet himself in the latest dinner clothes. Genevieve Hamper is Ophelia, wearing negligee for the mad scene. The queen uses a negligee also in the closet scene. The grave-diggers are in overalls, and Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern appear in up-to-date collegiate garb. The women are in full dress and the king in military uniform.

Mantell substitutes a cane for the obsolete sword with which to kill Polonius.

Next week Kansas City will see this new "Hamlet" and later Los Angeles.

FAMED BOY PIANIST AT SYMPHONY HALL

The 14-year-old boy pianist, Shura Cherkassky, will be the star at the

---

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

American Oct 24

Next week's regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 30, and 31, in Symphony Hall, will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; Stravinsky's Suite, "The Song of the Nightingale"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Battle at Kerjenetzt," from the Opera "Kitej," and Moussorgsky's Persian Dances from the Opera "Khovantchina."

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Oct 24

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Vividly Performed

Mr Koussevitzky has seldom contrived a more varied and a less attractive program than that played at yesterday's Symphony concert. It began with "From the Apocalypse," a "symphonic ligious associations, and some miscellaneous sound and fury, cleverly scored for orchestra. One's favorite piece by Liadov is still the agreeably tinkling "Music Box."

Debussy's rhapsody for clarinet, composed in 1910 as a test piece for pupils of the Paris Conservatoire, served yesterday to prove the skill of Mr Allegra, the new first clarinet, which was no doubt what Mr Koussevitzky put it on the program for. It is not, as music, of much value. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," like the rest of the program, was admirably performed, but it, too, is not great music.

Yet there are those who profess musical culture who would have been shocked if anything so popular, so accessible to the man in the street as "The Blue Danube" had been allowed to profane the austere nobility of such a program as yesterday's. Johann Strauss wrote for the public, but what composer doesn't try to do just that? "The Blue Danube" will outlive anything played yesterday. Or failing that, we might have had some Mozart, or Beethoven, or Wagner. P. R.

Boston Symphony Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its third concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Liadoff
  From "The Apocalypse," Symphonic Picture, op. 66.
Tschaikowsky
  Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic"
Debussy
  First Rhapsody for Orchestra, with Clarinet Solo.
Dukas..............."L'Apprenti Sorcier"

Liadoff is known here as a composer of musical miniatures—"Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake," "Baba-Yaga" and the famous "Music-Box." In the "Apocalypse," which he styles a "Symphonic Picture," he apparently indulged in tone painting on a larger scale; but what a stupendous subject! One for a genius of the first order, and Liadoff was hardly that. A charming talent, surely, a skillful musician, it is true, but without sufficient imaginative or inventive power for the task he set himself. Naturally this orchestral piece falls far short of even suggesting the mighty imagery of the verses from the Revelation of St. John the Divine, which it would illustrate in tones. The music is puerile, even trifling beside its subject.

As a piece of music apart from the text which it would illustrate it is perhaps a good example of sonorous writing for the orchestra, and as such was not ineffective as an opening piece to precede Tschaikowsky's doleful symphony, which was the principal number of the afternoon. Much has been written on this symphony and many would read into its pages meanings which were probably far from the composer's thought when he wrote it. The tragic circumstances surrounding its composition have done much to invest it with an interest far above its musical deserts, but is it not better by far to regard it as music pure and simple? In this light it is perhaps no better nor worse than others which have come from the composer's pen, charged with no more meaning than, say, his fifth, or fourth, nor than his orchestral fantasias.

From it, yesterday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky squeezed the last drop of emotion. Not a possible effect was overlooked, not a measure was allowed to pass without its due amount of emphasis, of underscoring. It must be admitted that the music of Tschaikowsky stands such treatment better than that of almost any other symphonic composer. Classic reserve is not one of its qualities and when the attempt is made to invest it with such, failure is almost certain. And Mr. Koussevitzky is eminently suited to such music, as witness not only yesterday's performance but his playing of the fifth and "Romeo and Juliet" last season. To those who enjoy music of this kind, played in this fashion, the "Pathetic" of yesterday afternoon must have been a delight.

Debussy's Rhapsody is an inconsequential composition, and it was evidently placed on the program as a means for displaying the abilities of Edmond Allegra, the new first clarinetist of the orchestra. The clarinet part, however, is hardly more than an obbligato one, and while Mr. Allegra made the most of his opportunity, and gave evidence of a beautiful tone and sound musicianship, a better medium for his talents might have been desired.

Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is fast losing its humorous appeal. Like a story retold again and again, it has lost somewhat or its savor, though it must not be forgotten that to many it was undoubtedly new. It was played somewhat perfunctorily. Mr. Koussevitzky's strong point is the intensely emotional, the dramatic, the theatrical. He would read his own feelings into the music he plays. In this regard Dukas's Scherzo afforded him little opportunity.

S. M.

Oct 30 THE NEW YORK TIMES

WILHELM GERICKE DIES ABROAD AT 80

As Boston Symphony Conductor He Placed Orchestra Among First in the World.

TWICE CAME TO AMERICA

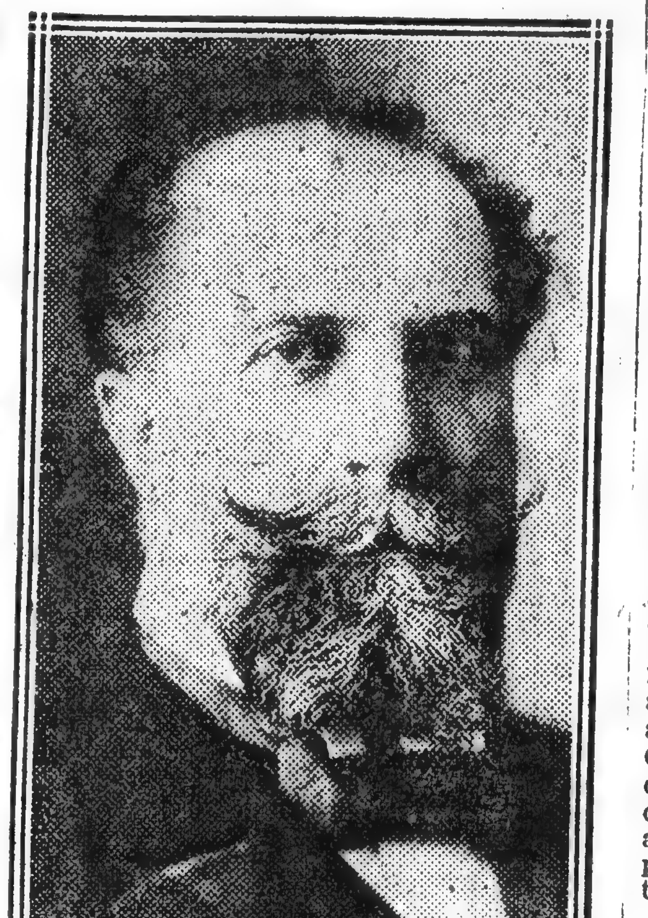
Viennese Leader's Pioneer Work in Setting Standards Here Recalled by Musicians in Tributes.

Copyright, 1925, by The New York Times Company.
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, for many years a well-known orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, is dead at his home here at the age of 80 years.

His death, which occurred on Tuesday, followed a period of failing health from infirmities of age. He leaves a widow and daughter.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke will always be associated closely and indelibly with the musical development of America. It was he, more than any other one man, who carried out the ideal of Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra was organized in 1881 and was for three years conducted by Georges Henschel. It was soon obvious that Henschel, an excellent musician, was not the conductor to bring the Boston Symphony to the pitch of excellence that Major Higginson desired.



WILHELM GERICKE.

In the Winter of 1884-85 Mr. Higginson, in Vienna, heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aïda." The impression of this performance, strengthened by careful inquiries in authoritative quarters, convinced Major Higginson that in Gericke he had found the leader he wanted, and the following Fall the new conductor from Vienna undertook his duties in Boston.

Two Terms in Boston.

Gericke brought to his work exceptional earnestness and exceptional capacities. He was born at Graz, Styria, April 18, 1845. He was a pupil of Dessoff at the Vienna Conservatory from 1862 to 1865, after which he became capellmeister at Linz. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vienna Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geschellschaft concerts and also directed the Singverein in that city. He soon gained reputation as a drillmaster of extraordinary persistence and ability and as a musician of the highest ideals. Invited by Major Higginson to come to America, he foresaw the opportunity that was given him in Boston to create by systematic and unremitting labor an orchestra that could equal the greatest organizations of the kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was from 1884 to 1889. He was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. During this time he returned to Vienna, where he resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts until 1885, returning to Boston for his second term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. Resigning this position in 1906, he retired to private life in Vienna.

The World War had a most disastrous effect upon Gericke's fortunes, just as it also nearly wrecked the orchestra he had produced in America. His investment in Austrian securities declined in value until he was in poverty. Hearing of his need, many friends and colleagues rallied to his aid. On Dec. 5, 1922, a benefit concert was given for him in Boston. The program consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the orchestral arrangement by Gericke of Brahms's piano waltzes and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Proceeds of this concert, with outside contributions collected by a committee, which included Walter Damrosch as Chairman and treasurer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz and Arthur Bodanzky, were $5,377.50. Pierre Monteux conducted. Thirty-one musicians were then in the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had been there in Gericke's time. A letter of thanks from the recipient in Vienna was read from the platform.

This fund added very materially to the comfort and security of Mr. Gericke's last years. It was one of many manifestations of the esteem and affection in which he was held by those who knew and understood the work he had done in America for the art he loved so well.

Tribute to His Work.

New York, accompanying him here on the trips of the orchestra during their two terms of residence in America, cabled a notification of his death yesterday to Frank Damrosch, head of the Institute of Musical Art.

Mrs. Gericke asked Dr. Damrosch to inform their wide circle of old friends here, a group including not only social acquaintances, but also many musicians who first came to this country as players under Gericke's baton.

Her brief message read:

"Wilhelm died twenty-seventh. Please notify friends."

Dr. Damrosch was not informed of the nature of Mr. Gericke's final illness or cause of his death. He had been in good health when last heard from and vigorous for his years.

"He was my very good personal friend," Dr. Frank Damrosch said, "and one for whom I had the highest regard as a musician and a man. The Boston Symphony's chief claim to distinction was in the beautiful balance of its choirs. Gericke was the first one to bring out this trait in the highest degree. Sometimes he sacrificed climaxes to attain it, but the result that he sought, he gained. He deserves a first rank in any history of America's musical development."

It was Gericke also, as Dr. Frank Damrosch concluded, who had brought over from Europe some of the finest instrumeltalists such as Franz Kneisel, Louis Svecenski, Alwyn Schroeder and many more, who had continued upholding his standards, as permanent residents here.

Tribute to His Standards.

America owes a deep debt of gratitude to Wilhelm Gericke, declared Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, when informed of his death last night.

"He was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard," the New York leader said, "a standard that has since those days been developed in nearly all of the endowed orchestras which have been created in America since Major Higginson in Boston first paved the way by founding the Boston Symphony.

"Mr. Gericke was a musician of the finest type. His readings of the classics were clear, sane and reverent, and, especially during his second visit to America, constantly gained in warmth and coloring.

"As a man, he was simple and lovable, absolutely free from malice and envy.

"The war brought on him heavy financial reverses, but after a while the clouds lifted, and he spent the last years of his life in absolute peace and contentment, with a loving wife and a talented daughter at his side."

Dohnanyi Tells of Benefactor.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the State Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor, who makes his home while here at the Forest Hills Inn on Long Island, received word there of his former countryman's death last evening. Mr. Dohnanyi in reply to a telephone message, said that he felt a personal loss, aside from his great respect for Gericke as a serious and scholarly musician.

"It was Mr. Gericke who first brought me from Budapest to America," Dohnanyi explained, "and I made my début as a young pianist here with the Boston Orchestra's splendid players under his direction. I accompanied them to Providence and to New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, on their regular tour, playing the G major concerto of Beethoven.

"In the following year, he invited me again to this country, when I played for the first time my own concerto for piano with the orchestra. I formerly saw him often on my visits to Vienna, after his retirement to his home there. In the last few seasons, my visits there have been for occasional concerts only, and I have not seen Mr. Gericke since two years ago, when I left him apparently hale and hearty."

Played Under Gericke.

Arthur Bodanzky, the Metropolitan conductor, and himself a Viennese, heard with regret of Gericke's passing.

"I remember him when I was a little boy," Mr. Bodanzky said, "and was taken to my first music in Vienna. I saw him conduct at a concert of the Friends of Music, the old established society there, which was giving oratorios, Haydn's 'Jahreszeiten'—that you call 'The Seasons'—and Handel's 'Messiah.'

"Just once I played as a young musician under Gericke's direction. It was the performance of a choral work of Schumann, either the 'Faust' or 'Paradise and the Peri.'

"When I met him again three years ago in Vienna I found him in good health, excellent humor, nice and charming, as also was his wife. He was not only a wonderful conductor, but always the charming gentleman as well."

American Composer's Tribute.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWTON CENTRE, Mass., Oct. 29.—Arthur Foote, the composer, tonight paid tribute to Gericke as a leader who had aided American musicians by early production of many native works.

"Wilhelm Gericke's service to music as conductor of the Boston Orchestra cannot be overestimated," said Mr. Foote. "With the highest ideals, he had a passion for perfection, the result of which was seen in the playing of his orchestra, whose qualities were a testimony also to his unusual sensitiveness to beauty of tone, for he was never weary in demanding this from his men.

"He taught us much in that way. Great music is played greatly. A straight-forward, unaffected and genuine man and musician," concluded Mr. Foote. "Admiration and affection for him grew with the years of his residence here."

Boston Remembers His Aid.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—George W. Chadwick, dean of living American composers, said of Gericke's death:

"Wilhelm Gericke was eminently the man for his time. From ordinary material he developed an orchestra which in beauty of tone and clarity of performance had no superior at that time in America.

"By his friendly interest and wise counsel he won the gratitude of the Boston group of composers. They will ever cherish his memory."

C. A. Ellis, who directed the orchestra's business affairs during both of Mr. Gericke's terms as conductor, said:

"It was Wilhelm Gericke's rare skill as conductor, his fine musicianship and devotion to his task that made the Boston Symphony the peer of the world's best orchestras. All who enjoyed his superb performances will hold him forever in remembrance."

Transcript Oct 19

Round o

WEEK-END CONCERTS: EXITS FROM BERLIOZ, A HAMPERED SINGER

"THE FANTASTIC SYMPHONY" AND BOREDOM

Whys and Wherefores of an Evening of Departures—Mr. McCormack and a Reluctant Voice—Other Resources and a New Virtue in Interesting Play—His Excellent Violoncellist—Music, Dance and Color in Novel Jointure

BEYOND PRECEDENT for a Saturday evening were the departures while Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" dragged its slow length along a second Symphony Concert. At every pause they multiplied, until some bystanders estimated them at a quarter part of the audience. Clearly, it was not Mr. Koussevitzky or the orchestra that had wearied the departing. At every opportunity, all and sundry had clapped them. Nor was it Berlioz himself. In certain pieces both audiences hear him gladly at the Symphony Concerts—say in the overtures, "Benvenuto Cellini" and "Roman Carnival," or in the dances from "The Damnation of Faust." Rather, flight seemed the only refuge from the long-drawn boredom, in these days, of this particular Symphony. Within the memory of Bostonian man only one conductor was able to lessen it—Mr. Weingartner, twenty years ago; while he has such a flair for Berlioz, and can so reanimate these withered pages, that even the Parisians applaud him.

To this day some in Boston recall that memorable version. It gained a warmth and body that made the poetic scheme seem less an outworn and demoded romantic sham. It was also fortunate in the overcoming of the gravest drawback to the "Fantastic Symphony" in twentieth-century ears—Berlioz's habit of working first one motiv and then another, of keeping his melodies in isolation, each from each, while he is severally making play with them. Upon present ears, the outcome of this disregard of polyphony cannot be other than bareness and thinness. For pendant, a correspondent may have his little joke. He read in the program-book that at the close of the "Scene in the Fields," one of the piping shepherds "no longer answers" the other. "Quite so," says the post-card, "he had undoubtedly fallen asleep."

Already the Public Library maintains a course of informal lectures about the programs of the Symphony Concerts—on Monday afternoons at five o'clock. On Saturday last it began a second series of similar talks about the programs of the People's Symphony Orchestra or of visiting orchestras. It will continue them on successive Saturday evenings at 8.15. They will deal with the music in hand from the point of view of the listener. H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Last week, for the first time within the longest memory, the program-book of the Symphony Concerts contained an illustration—a drawing of Mr. Koussevitzky, sitting and relatively in repose. Mr. Morgan Dennis made it. A facsimile of the con-

---

PROGRAMS IN PROSPECT

Transcript Oct 22

Mr. Koussevitzky Proposes

AS ANTICIPATED in these columns, Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Song of the Nightingale," will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of next week. In America, Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra produced it almost exactly two years ago. At that time, Mr. Monteux had it in mind for Boston; finally decided to bequeath it to Mr. Koussevitzky. He, however, found no place for it in the concerts of last season. Now, at last—after New York, Chicago, Philadelphia—Boston is to hear the piece. Needless, almost, to say, it is Stravinsky's final version of music that he first cast in the form of a short opera—to be heard at the Metropolitan next winter; then recast as ballet-pantomime. In the music are songful passages of a strange and wondrous beauty; passages as well that whirl and snap and bite with a vivid and dissonant power. German and Russian pieces fill the remainder of the program; Weber's Overture to his opera, "Euryanthe"; the Fourth Symphony of Schumann—Mr. Koussevitzky's first large venture, in Boston with that composer; a battle-picture from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Kitej or The Magic City"—of old played as intermezzo before a curiously painted curtain in the performances of Monsieur Diaghylev's ballet; the beautiful Persian Dances from Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina."

---

eve

which

contende

PHILADELPHIA

[ADVE]RTISER SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIUMPHS IN 'PATHETIC' SYMPHONY

Advertiser

Prodigiously eloquent was Serge Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee yesterday.

It left the audience spellbound. Gradually the pent-up enthusiasm released itself. Conductor and orchestra rightly divided the ovation.

Koussevitzky never showed more complete mastery of his men than he did in this profoundly stirring performance; and never were the players more responsive. It was a virtuoso achievement all around—one of the most dramatic in Symphony history. The details of Tchaikovsky's symphonic tapestry were revealed with infinite care and fascinating skill.

The novelty on this week's program is a tone picture by Liadov, another Russian composer, called "From the Apocalypse;" a graphic composition also superbly played. The performance, in fact, was on the whole more impressive than the music itself.

Debussy's first rhapsody for clarinet, with orchestral accompaniment, won an ovation for Edmond Allegra, one of the new soloists. The final number is the vivacious Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the performance of which again displayed the brilliant virtuosity of the orchestra.

MANTELL FIRST TO PLAY MODERN 'HAMLET' IN U. S.

St. Louis is seeing the first modernized "Hamlet" given in the United States. Five twentieth-century versions of the Shakespearian tragedy have been talked of in New York, and one is in rehearsal. London was amazed by a similar "freak" performance in August.

Robert Mantell

Robert B. Mantell, 70-year-old Shakespearian actor, is playing Hamlet himself in the latest dinner clothes. Genevieve Hamper is Ophelia, wearing negligee for the mad scene. The queen uses a negligee also in the closet scene. The grave-diggers are in overalls, and Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern appear in up-to-date collegiate garb. The women are in full dress and the king in military uniform.

Mantell substitutes a cane for the obsolete sword with which to kill Polonius.

Next week Kansas City will see this new "Hamlet" and later Los Angeles.

FAMED BOY PIANIST AT SYMPHONY HALL

Th[illegible]-year-old boy pianist, Shura Cherkassky, will be the star at the

---

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

American Oct 24

Next week's regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 30, and 31, in Symphony Hall, will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; Stravinsky's Suite, "The Song of the Nightingale"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Battle at Kerjenetzt," from the Opera "Kitej," and Moussorgsky's Persian Dances from the Opera "Khovantchina."

:30 p. m.—Aunt Betty stories and the GO Kiddies' Klub—Ruth Thompson. 6 -Dinner concert. 7—News items, baseball scores, and final reading of weather and stock reports, and S. F. produce news. 8—Educational program, talk; "Talks on Constructive Selling," B. J. Williams; "Chats About New Books," Joseph Henry Jackson; "It Pays to Analyze Character"; "Government," Dr. Katharine Rodgers Adams, Dean of Mills College and Professor of History.

KPO, San Francisco, Calif. (429 Meters)

6:15 p. m.—Baseball scores; A. A. Housman stock quotations. 6:30—"Ye Towne Cryer" and amusement information service. 6:40—Waldemar Lind and the States Orchestra. 7—Rudy Seiger's Orchestra. 8—Organ recital by Uda Waldrop, official organist of KPO at the Wurlitzer. 8:45—Talk by Wiley Winsor, director of the Y. M. C. A. daily dozen exercises over KPO, on "Building Muscle." 9—A concert program under

---

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Oct 24

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Vividly Performed

Mr Koussevitzky has seldom contrived a more varied and a less attractive program than that played at yesterday's Symphony concert. It began with "From the Apocalypse," a "symphonic picture" by Anatol Liadov, hitherto known here as the composer of the "Music Box," a highly popular trifle for piano. Then came Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony," a rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra by Debussy, and Dukas' familiar scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," suggested by Goethe's poem.

Last week's advance program listed Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," arranged by Mottl for performance at this concert, but it was omitted, thus making the concert shorter than is usual or, as a general rule, desirable.

In Chicago the Chicago Symphony was playing as its final number yesterday "The Beautiful Blue Danube," in memory of Johann Strauss, who was born Oct 25, 1825. One listener yesterday would have sacrificed the whole of Mr Koussevitsky's program gladly if he had been willing to offer us in Boston "The Blue Danube" or "Tales from Vienna Woods," which are certainly much better music than any of the works listed above.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" was vividly and eloquently interpreted, without excessive noise or tumult. Many still regard this work as a masterpiece. The applause at the end yesterday was loud and long. But the present writer has never been at once so utterly bored and so actively annoyed in the course of 15 seasons of Symphony concerts as he was yesterday by this symphony. The faults of the music, looked at intellectually, include the strident emphasis upon trite, overworked harmonies, the incredibly monotonous, insistent repetition of themes and rhythms, the crudity and naivete in style of the whole composition, and the absence of any honest or heartfelt emotion, except in the second movement, the section of which in five-four rhythm has a pretty comic opera spirit and grace.

This is, of course, only one man's opinion.

Liadov quoted in the score of his "From the Apocalypse" verses from the 10th chapter of Revelations about the angel coming down from Heaven with clouds and rainbows, and a little book in his hand, "And he set his right foot upon the sea and his left foot upon the earth, and cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth; and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices."

The thunders—one neglected to count them—were rumbling from the kettledrums yesterday. But instead of the lions roaring, one heard a good deal of what seemed to be quotations from the liturgical music of the Russian Church, which conveyed to Western ears no religious associations, and some miscellaneous sound and fury, cleverly scored for orchestra. One's favorite piece by Liadov is still the agreeably tinkling "Music Box."

Debussy's rhapsody for clarinet, composed in 1910 as a test piece for pupils of the Paris Conservatoire, served yesterday to prove the skill of Mr Allegra, the new first clarinet, which was no doubt what Mr Koussevitzky put it on the program for. It is not, as music, of much value. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," like the rest of the program, was admirably performed, but it, too, is not great music.

Yet there are those who profess musical culture who would have been shocked if anything so popular, so accessible to the man in the street as "The Blue Danube" had been allowed to profane the austere nobility of such a program as yesterday's. Johann Strauss wrote for the public, but what composer doesn't try to do just that? "The Blue Danube" will outlive anything played yesterday. Or failing that, we might have had some Mozart, or Beethoven, or Wagner. P. R.

---

ues Inc

Camden

Greater Philadel- s always ographi-

Values h the drea day sees Camden

---

with an interest far above its musical deserts, but is it not better by far to regard it as music pure and simple? In this light it is perhaps no better nor worse than others which have come from the composer's pen, charged with no more meaning than, say, his fifth, or fourth, nor than his orchestral fantasias.

Oct 30 THE NEW YORK TIMES,

WILHELM GERICKE DIES ABROAD AT 80

As Boston Symphony Conductor He Placed Orchestra Among First in the World.

TWICE CAME TO AMERICA

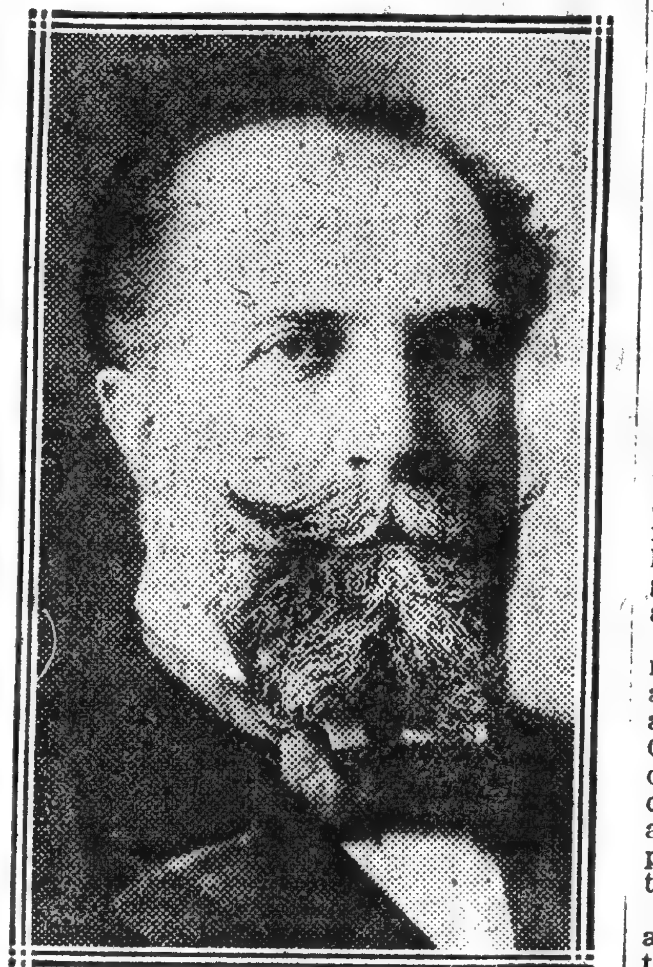
Viennese Leader's Pioneer Work in Setting Standards Here Recalled by Musicians in Tributes.

Copyright, 1925, by The New York Times Company. Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, for many years a well-known orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, is dead at his home here at the age of 80 years.

His death, which occurred on Tuesday, followed a period of failing health from infirmities of age. He leaves a widow and daughter.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke will always be associated closely and indelibly with the musical development of America. It was he, more than any other one man, who carried out the ideal of Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra was organized in 1881 and was for three years conducted by Georges Henschel. It was soon obvious that Henschel, an excellent musician, was not the conductor to bring the Boston Symphony to the pitch of excellence that Major Higginson desired.



WILHELM GERICKE.

In the Winter of 1884-85 Mr. Higginson, in Vienna, heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aïda." The impression of this performance, strengthened by careful inquiries in authoritative quarters, convinced Major Higginson that in Gericke he had found the leader he wanted, and the following Fall the new conductor from Vienna undertook his duties in Boston.

Two Terms in Boston.

Gericke brought to his work exceptional earnestness and exceptional capacities. He was born at Graz, Styria, April 18, 1845. He was a pupil of Dessoff at the Vienna Conservatory from 1862 to 1865, after which he became capellmeister at Linz. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vienna Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geschellschaft concerts and also directed the Singverein in that city. He soon gained reputation as a drillmaster of extraordinary persistence and ability and as a musician of the highest ideals. Invited by Major Higginson to come to America, he foresaw the opportunity that was given him in Boston to create by systematic and unremitting labor an orchestra that could equal the greatest organizations of the kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was from 1884 to 1889. He was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. During this time he returned to Vienna, where he resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts until 1885, returning to Boston for his second term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. Resigning this position in 1906, he retired to private life in Vienna.

The World War had a most disastrous effect upon Gericke's fortunes, just as it also nearly wrecked the orchestra he had produced in America. His investment in Austrian securities declined in value until he was in poverty. Hearing of his need, many friends and colleagues rallied to his aid. On Dec. 5, 1922, a benefit concert was given for him in Boston. The program consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the orchestral arrangement by Gericke of Brahms's piano waltzes and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Proceeds of this concert, with outside contributions collected by a committee, which included Walter Damrosch as Chairman and treasurer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz and Arthur Bodanzky, were $5,377.50. Pierre Monteux conducted. Thirty-one musicians were then in the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had been there in Gericke's time. A letter of thanks from the recipient in Vienna was read from the platform.

This fund added very materially to the comfort and security of Mr. Gericke's last years. It was one of many manifestations of the esteem and affection in which he was held by those who knew and understood the work he had done in America for the art he loved so well.

Tribute to His Work.

New York, accompanying him here on the trips of the orchestra during their two terms of residence in America, cabled a notification of his death yesterday to Frank Damrosch, head of the Institute of Musical Art.

Mrs. Gericke asked Dr. Damrosch to inform their wide circle of old friends here, a group including not only social acquaintances, but also many musicians who first came to this country as players under Gericke's baton.

Her brief message read:

"Wilhelm died twenty-seventh. Please notify friends."

Dr. Damrosch was not informed of the nature of Mr. Gericke's final illness or cause of his death. He had been in good health when last heard from and vigorous for his years.

"He was my very good personal friend," Dr. Frank Damrosch said, "and one for whom I had the highest regard as a musician and a man. The Boston Symphony's chief claim to distinction was in the beautiful balance of its choirs. Gericke was the first one to bring out this trait in the highest degree. Sometimes he sacrificed climaxes to attain it, but the result that he sought, he gained. He deserves a first rank in any history of America's musical development."

It was Gericke also, as Dr. Frank Damrosch concluded, who had brought over from Europe some of the finest instrumeltalists such as Franz Kneisel, Louis Svecenski, Alwyn Schroeder and many more, who had continued upholding his standards, as permanent residents here.

Tribute to His Standards.

America owes a deep debt of gratitude to Wilhelm Gericke, declared Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, when informed of his death last night.

"He was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard," the New York leader said, "a standard that has since those days been developed in nearly all of the endowed orchestras which have been created in America since Major Higginson in Boston first paved the way by founding the Boston Symphony.

"Mr. Gericke was a musician of the finest type. His readings of the classics were clear, sane and reverent, and, especially during his second visit to America, constantly gained in warmth and coloring.

"As a man, he was simple and lovable, absolutely free from malice and envy.

"The war brought on him heavy financial reverses, but after a while the clouds lifted, and he spent the last years of his life in absolute peace and contentment, with a loving wife and a talented daughter at his side."

Dohnanyi Tells of Benefactor.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the State Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor, who makes his home while here at the Forest Hills Inn on Long Island, received word there of his former countryman's death last evening. Mr. Dohnanyi in reply to a telephone message, said that he felt a personal loss, aside from his great respect for Gericke as a serious and scholarly musician.

"It was Mr. Gericke who first brought me from Budapest to America," Dohnanyi explained, "and I made my début as a young pianist here with the Boston Orchestra's splendid players under his direction. I accompanied them to Providence and to New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, on their regular tour, playing the G major concerto of Beethoven.

"In the following year, he invited me again to this country, when I played for the first time my own concerto for piano with the orchestra. I formerly saw him often on my visits to Vienna, after his retirement to his home there. In the last few seasons, my visits there have been for occasional concerts only, and I have not seen Mr. Gericke since two years ago, when I left him apparently hale and hearty."

Played Under Gericke.

Arthur Bodanzky, the Metropolitan conductor, and himself a Viennese, heard with regret of Gericke's passing.

"I remember him when I was a little boy," Mr. Bodanzky said, "and was taken to my first music in Vienna. I saw him conduct at a concert of the Friends of Music, the old established society there, which was giving oratorios, Haydn's 'Jahreszeiten'—that you call 'The Seasons'—and Handel's 'Messiah.'

"Just once I played as a young musician under Gericke's direction. It was the performance of a choral work of Schumann, either the 'Faust' or 'Paradise and the Peri.'

"When I met him again three years ago in Vienna I found him in good health, excellent humor, nice and charming, as also was his wife. He was not only a wonderful conductor, but always the charming gentleman as well."

American Composer's Tribute.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWTON CENTRE, Mass., Oct. 29.—Arthur Foote, the composer, tonight paid tribute to Gericke as a leader who had aided American musicians by early production of many native works.

"Wilhelm Gericke's service to music as conductor of the Boston Orchestra cannot be overestimated," said Mr. Foote. "With the highest ideals, he had a passion for perfection, the result of which was seen in the playing of his orchestra, whose qualities were a testimony also to his unusual sensitiveness to beauty of tone, for he was never weary in demanding this from his men.

"He taught us much in that way. Great music is played greatly. A straight-forward, unaffected and genuine man and musician," concluded Mr. Foote. "Admiration and affection for him grew with the years of his residence here."

Boston Remembers His Aid.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—George W. Chadwick, dean of living American composers, said of Gericke's death:

"Wilhelm Gericke was eminently the man for his time. From ordinary material he developed an orchestra which in beauty of tone and clarity of performance had no superior at that time in America.

"By his friendly interest and wise counsel he won the gratitude of the Boston group of composers. They will ever cherish his memory."

C. A. Ellis, who directed the orchestra's business affairs during both of Mr. Gericke's terms as conductor, said: "It was Wilhelm Gericke's rare skill as conductor, his fine musicianship and devotion to his task that made the Boston Symphony the peer of the world's best orchestras. All who enjoyed his [illegible] performances will hold him for-[illegible]ance."

Transcript Oct 19

136

EIGHT

Round o

Advertiser

WEEK-END CONCERTS: EXITS FROM BERLIOZ, A HAMPERED SINGER

"THE FANTASTIC SYMPHONY" AND BOREDOM

Whys and Wherefores of an Evening of Departures—Mr. McCormack and a Reluctant Voice—Other Resources and a New Virtue in Interesting Play—His Excellent Violoncellist—Music, Dance and Color in Novel Jointure

BEYOND PRECEDENT for a Saturday evening were the departures while Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" dragged its slow length along a second Symphony Concert. At every pause they multiplied, until some bystanders estimated them at a quarter part of the audience. Clearly, it was not Mr. Koussevitzky or the orchestra that had wearied the departing. At every opportunity, all and sundry had clapped them. Nor was it Berlioz himself. In certain pieces both audiences hear him gladly at the Symphony Concerts—say in the overtures, "Benvenuto Cellini" and "Roman Carnival." or in the dances from "The Damnation of Faust." Rather, flight seemed the only refuge from the long-drawn boredom, in these days, of this particular Symphony. Within the memory of Bostonian man only one conductor was able to lessen it—Mr. Weingartner, twenty years ago; while he has such a flair for Berlioz, and can so reanimate these withered pages, that even the Parisians applaud him.

To this day some in Boston recall that memorable version. It gained a warmth and body that made the poetic scheme seem less an outworn and demoded romantic sham. It was also fortunate in the overcoming of the gravest drawback to the "Fantastic Symphony" in twentieth-century ears—Berlioz's habit of working first one motiv and then another, of keeping his melodies in isolation, each from each, while he is severally making play with them. Upon present ears, the outcome of this disregard of polyphony cannot be other than bareness and thinness. For pendant, a correspondent may have his little joke. He read in the program-book that at the close of the "Scene in the Fields," one of the piping shepherds "no longer answers" the other. "Quite so," says the post-card, "he had undoubtedly fallen asleep."

Already the Public Library maintains a course of informal lectures about the programs of the Symphony Concerts—on Monday afternoons at five o'clock. On Saturday last it began a second series of similar talks about the programs of the People's Symphony Orchestra or of visiting orchestras. It will continue them on successive Saturday evenings at 8.15. They will deal with the music in hand from the point of view of the listener. H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Last week, for the first time within the longest memory, the program-book of the Symphony Concerts contained an illustration—a drawing of Mr. Koussevitzky, sitting and relatively in repose. Mr. Morgan Dennis made it. A facsimile of the conductor's [illegible] accompanies it

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA

ADVERTISER SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIUMPHS IN 'PATHETIC' SYMPHONY

Prodigiously eloquent was Serge Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee yesterday.

It left the audience spellbound. Gradually the pent-up enthusiasm released itself. Conductor and orchestra rightly divided the ovation.

Koussevitzky never showed more complete mastery of his men than he did in this profoundly stirring performance; and never were the players more responsive. It was a virtuoso achievement all around—one of the most dramatic in Symphony history. The details of Tchaikovsky's symphonic tapestry were revealed with infinite care and fascinating skill.

The novelty on this week's program is a tone picture by Liadov, another Russian composer, called "From the Apocalypse;" a graphic composition also superbly played. The performance, in fact, was on the whole more impressive than the music itself.

Debussy's first rhapsody for clarinet, with orchestral accompaniment, won an ovation for Edmond Allegra, one of the new soloists. The final number is the vivacious Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the performance of which again displayed the brilliant virtuosity of the orchestra.

MANTELL FIRST TO PLAY MODERN 'HAMLET' IN U. S.

St. Louis is seeing the first modernized "Hamlet" given in the United States. Five twentieth-century versions of the Shakespearian tragedy have been talked of in New York, and one is in rehearsal. London was amazed by a similar "freak" performance in August.

Robert Mantell

Robert B. Mantell, 70-year-old Shakespearian actor, is playing Hamlet himself in the latest dinner clothes. Genevieve Hamper is Ophelia, wearing negligee for the mad scene. The queen uses a negligee also in the closet scene. The grave-diggers are in overalls, and Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern appear in up-to-date collegiate garb. The women are in full dress and the king in military uniform.

Mantell substitutes a cane for the obsolete sword with which to kill Polonius.

Next week Kansas City will see this new "Hamlet" and later Los Angeles.

FAMED BOY PIANIST AT SYMPHONY HALL

The 14-year-old boy pianist, Shura Cherkassky, will be the star at the

---

American Oct 24

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

Next week's regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 30, and 31, in Symphony Hall, will include Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; Stravinsky's Suite, "The Song of the Nightingale"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Battle at Kerjenetzt," from the Opera "Kitej," and Moussorgsky's Persian Dances from the Opera "Khovantchina."

5:30 p.m.—Aunt Betty stories and the GO Kiddies' Klub—Ruth Thompson. 6—Dinner concert. 7—News items, baseball scores, and final reading of weather and stock reports, and S. F. produce news. 8—Educational program, talk; "Talks on Constructive Selling," B. J. Williams; "Chats About New Books," Joseph Henry Jackson; "It Pays to Analyze Character"; "Government," Dr. Katharine Rodgers Adams, Dean of Mills College and Professor of History.

KPO, San Francisco, Calif. (429 Meters)

6:15 p. m.—Baseball scores; A. A. Housman stock quotations. 6:30—"Ye Towne Cryer" and amusement information service. 6:40—Waldemar Lind and the States Orchestra. 7—Rudy Seiger's Orchestra. 8—Organ recital by Uda Waldrop, official organist of KPO at the Wurlitzer. 8:45—Talk by Wiley Winsor, director of the Y. M. C. A. daily dozen exercises over KPO, on "Building Muscle." 9—A concert program under

---

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Oct 24

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Vividly Performed

Mr Koussevitzky has seldom contrived a more varied and a less attractive program than that played at yesterday's Symphony concert. It began with "From the Apocalypse," a "symphonic picture" by Anatol Liadov, hitherto known here as the composer of the "Music Box," a highly popular trifle for piano. Then came Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony," a rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra by Debussy, and Dukas' familiar scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," suggested by Goethe's poem.

Last week's advance program listed Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," arranged by Mottl for performance at this concert, but it was omitted, thus making the concert shorter than is usual or, as a general rule, desirable.

In Chicago the Chicago Symphony was playing as its final number yesterday "The Beautiful Blue Danube," in memory of Johann Strauss, who was born Oct 25, 1825. One listener yesterday would have sacrificed the whole of Mr Koussevitzky's program gladly if he had been willing to offer us in Boston "The Blue Danube" or "Tales from Vienna Woods," which are certainly much better music than any of the works listed above.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" was vividly and eloquently interpreted, without excessive noise or tumult. Many still regard this work as a masterpiece. The applause at the end yesterday was loud and long. But the present writer has never been at once so utterly bored and so actively annoyed in the course of 15 seasons of Symphony concerts as he was yesterday by this symphony. The faults of the music, looked at intellectually, include the strident emphasis upon trite, overworked harmonies, the incredibly monotonous, insistent repetition of themes and rhythms, the crudity and naivete in style of the whole composition, and the absence of any honest or heartfelt emotion, except in the second movement, the section of which in five-four rhythm has a pretty comic opera spirit and grace.

This is, of course, only one man's opinion.

Liadov quoted in the score of his "From the Apocalypse" verses from the 10th chapter of Revelations about the angel coming down from Heaven with clouds and rainbows, and a little book in his hand. "And he set his right foot upon the sea and his left foot upon the earth, and cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth; and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices."

The thunders—one neglected to count them—were rumbling from the kettledrums yesterday. But instead of the lions roaring, one heard a good deal of what seemed to be quotations from the liturgical music of the Russian Church, which conveyed to Western ears no religious associations, and some miscellaneous sound and fury, cleverly scored for orchestra. One's favorite piece by Liadov is still the agreeably tinkling "Music Box."

Debussy's rhapsody for clarinet, composed in 1910 as a test piece for pupils of the Paris Conservatoire, served yesterday to prove the skill of Mr Allegra, the new first clarinet, which was no doubt what Mr Koussevitzky put it on the program for. It is not, as music, of much value. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," like the rest of the program, was admirably performed, but it, too, is not great music.

Yet there are those who profess musical culture who would have been shocked if anything so popular, so accessible to the man in the street as "The Blue Danube" had been allowed to profane the austere nobility of such a program as yesterday's. Johann Strauss wrote for the public, but what composer doesn't try to do just that? "The Blue Danube" will outlive anything played yesterday. Or failing that we might have had some Mozart, or Beethoven, or Wagner. P. R.

---

ues Incr

Camden

Greater Philadel-s always ographi-

Values h the drea day sees Camden

with an interest far above its musical deserts, but is it not better by far to regard it as music pure and simple? In this light it is perhaps no better nor worse than others which have come from the composer's pen, charged with no more meaning than, say, his fifth, or fourth, nor than his orchestral fantasias.

PROGRAMS IN PROSPECT

Transcript Oct 22

Mr. Koussevitzky Proposes

AS ANTICIPATED in these columns, Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Song of the Nightingale," will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of next week. In America, Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra produced it almost exactly two years ago. At that time, Mr. Monteux had it in mind for Boston; finally decided to bequeath it to Mr. Koussevitzky. He, however, found no place for it in the concerts of last season. Now, at last—after New York, Chicago, Philadelphia—Boston is to hear the piece. Needless, almost, to say, it is Stravinsky's final version of music that he first cast in the form of a short opera—to be heard at the Metropolitan next winter; then recast as ballet-pantomime. In the music are songful passages of a strange and wondrous beauty; passages as well that whirl and snap and bite with a vivid and dissonant power. German and Russian pieces fill the remainder of the program; Weber's Overture to his opera, "Euryanthe"; the Fourth Symphony of Schumann—Mr. Koussevitzky's first large venture, in Boston with that composer; a battle-picture from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Kitej or The Magic City"—of old played as intermezzo before a curiously painted curtain in the performances of Monsieur Diaghylev's ballet; the beautiful Persian Dances from Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina."

eve
which contende

Oct 30 THE NEW YORK TIMES,

WILHELM GERICKE DIES ABROAD AT 80

As Boston Symphony Conductor He Placed Orchestra Among First in the World.

TWICE CAME TO AMERICA

Viennese Leader's Pioneer Work in Setting Standards Here Recalled by Musicians in Tributes.

Copyright, 1925, by The New York Times Company.
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Oct. 29.—Wilhelm Gericke, for many years a well-known orchestral, choral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, is dead at his home here at the age of 80 years.

His death, which occurred on Tuesday, followed a period of failing health from infirmities of age. He leaves a widow and daughter.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke will always be associated closely and indelibly with the musical development of America. It was he, more than any other one man, who carried out the ideal of Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra was organized in 1881 and was for three years conducted by Georges Henschel. It was soon obvious that Henschel, an excellent musician, was not the conductor to bring the Boston Symphony to the pitch of excellence that Major Higginson desired.

[illegible] GERICKE.

In the Winter of 1884-85 Mr. Higginson, in Vienna, heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aïda." The impression of this performance, strengthened by careful inquiries in authoritative quarters, convinced Major Higginson that in Gericke he had found the leader he wanted, and the following Fall the new conductor from Vienna undertook his duties in Boston.

Two Terms in Boston.

Gericke brought to his work exceptional earnestness and exceptional capacities. He was born at Graz, Styria, April 18, 1845. He was a pupil of Dessoff at the Vienna Conservatory from 1862 to 1865, after which he became capellmeister at Linz. In 1874 he became second conductor at the Vienna Court Opera under Hans Richter.

He succeeded Brahms in 1880 as conductor of the Geschellschaft concerts and also directed the Singverein in that city. He soon gained reputation as a drillmaster of extraordinary persistence and ability and as a musician of the highest ideals. Invited by Major Higginson to come to America, he foresaw the opportunity that was given him in Boston to create by systematic and unremitting labor an orchestra that could equal the greatest organizations of the kind in the Old World.

His first term in Boston was from 1884 to 1889. He was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. During this time he returned to Vienna, where he resumed the conductorship of the Gesellschaft concerts until 1885, returning to Boston for his second term with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. Resigning this position in 1906, he retired to private life in Vienna.

The World War had a most disastrous effect upon Gericke's fortunes, just as it also nearly wrecked the orchestra he had produced in America. His investment in Austrian securities declined in value until he was in poverty. Hearing of his need, many friends and colleagues rallied to his aid. On Dec. 5, 1922, a benefit concert was given for him in Boston. The program consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the orchestral arrangement by Gericke of Brahms's piano waltzes and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Proceeds of this concert, with outside contributions collected by a committee, which included Walter Damrosch as Chairman and treasurer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz and Arthur Bodanzky, were $5,377.50. Pierre Monteux conducted. Thirty-one musicians were then in the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had been there in Gericke's time. A letter of thanks from the recipient in Vienna was read from the platform.

This fund added very materially to the comfort and security of Mr. Gericke's last years. It was one of many manifestations of the esteem and affection in which he was held by those who knew and understood the work he had done in America for the art he loved so well.

Tribute to His Work.

New York, accompanying him here on the trips of the orchestra during their two terms of residence in America, cabled a notification of his death yesterday to Frank Damrosch, head of the Institute of Musical Art.

Mrs. Gericke asked Dr. Damrosch to inform their wide circle of old friends here, a group including not only social acquaintances, but also many musicians who first came to this country as players under Gericke's baton.

Her brief message read:

"Wilhelm died twenty-seventh. Please notify friends."

Dr. Damrosch was not informed of the nature of Mr. Gericke's final illness or cause of his death. He had been in good health when last heard from and vigorous for his years.

"He was my very good personal friend," Dr. Frank Damrosch said, "and one for whom I had the highest regard as a musician and a man. The Boston Symphony's chief claim to distinction was in the beautiful balance of its choirs. Gericke was the first one to bring out this trait in the highest degree. Sometimes he sacrificed climaxes to attain it, but the result that he sought, he gained. He deserves a first rank in any history of America's musical development."

It was Gericke also, as Dr. Frank Damrosch concluded, who had brought over from Europe some of the finest instrumeltalists such as Franz Kneisel, Louis Svecenski, Alwyn Schroeder and many more, who had continued upholding his standards, as permanent residents here.

Tribute to His Standards.

America owes a deep debt of gratitude to Wilhelm Gericke, declared Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, when informed of his death last night.

"He was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard," the New York leader said, "a standard that has since those days been developed in nearly all of the endowed orchestras which have been created in America since Major Higginson in Boston first paved the way by founding the Boston Symphony.

"Mr. Gericke was a musician of the finest type. His readings of the classics were clear, sane and reverent, and, especially during his second visit to America, constantly gained in warmth and coloring.

"As a man, he was simple and lovable, absolutely free from malice and envy.

"The war brought on him heavy financial reverses, but after a while the clouds lifted, and he spent the last years of his life in absolute peace and contentment, with a loving wife and a talented daughter at his side."

Dohnanyi Tells of Benefactor.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the State Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor, who makes his home while here at the Forest Hills Inn on Long Island, received word there of his former countryman's death last evening. Mr. Dohnanyi in reply to a telephone message, said that he felt a personal loss, aside from his great respect for Gericke as a serious and scholarly musician.

"It was Mr. Gericke who first brought me from Budapest to America," Dohnanyi explained, "and I made my début as a young pianist here with the Boston Orchestra's splendid players under his direction. I accompanied them to Providence and to New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, on their regular tour, playing the G major concerto of Beethoven.

"In the following year, he invited me again to this country, when I played for the first time my own concerto for piano with the orchestra. I formerly saw him often on my visits to Vienna, after his retirement to his home there. In the last few seasons, my visits there have been for occasional concerts only, and I have not seen Mr. Gericke since two years ago, when I left him apparently hale and hearty."

Played Under Gericke.

Arthur Bodanzky, the Metropolitan conductor, and himself a Viennese, heard with regret of Gericke's passing.

"I remember him when I was a little boy," Mr. Bodanzky said, "and was taken to my first music in Vienna. I saw him conduct at a concert of the Friends of Music, the old established society there, which was giving oratorios, Haydn's 'Jahreszeiten'—that you call 'The Seasons'—and Handel's 'Messiah.'

"Just once I played as a young musician under Gericke's direction. It was the performance of a choral work of Schumann, either the 'Faust' or 'Paradise and the Peri.'

"When I met him again three years ago in Vienna I found him in good health, excellent humor, nice and charming, as also was his wife. He was not only a wonderful conductor, but always the charming gentleman as well."

American Composer's Tribute.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWTON CENTRE, Mass., Oct. 29.—Arthur Foote, the composer, tonight paid tribute to Gericke as a leader who had aided American musicians by early production of many native works.

"Wilhelm Gericke's service to music as conductor of the Boston Orchestra cannot be overestimated," said Mr. Foote. "With the highest ideals, he had a passion for perfection, the result of which was seen in the playing of his orchestra, whose qualities were a testimony also to his unusual sensitiveness to beauty of tone, for he was never weary in demanding this from his men.

"He taught us much in that way. Great music is played greatly. A straight-forward, unaffected and genuine man and musician," concluded Mr Foote. "Admiration and affection for him grew with the years of his residence here."

Boston Remembers His Aid.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—George W. Chadwick, dean of living American composers, said of Gericke's death:

"Wilhelm Gericke was eminently the man for his time. From ordinary material he developed an orchestra which in beauty of tone and clarity of performance had no superior at that time in America.

"By his friendly interest and wise counsel he won the gratitude of the Boston group of composers. They will ever cherish his memory."

C. A. Ellis, who directed the orchestra's business affairs during both of Mr. Gericke's terms as conductor, said:

"It was Wilhelm Gericke's rare skill as conductor, his fine musicianship and devotion to his task that made the Boston Symphony the peer of the world's best orchestras. All who enjoyed his superb performances will hold him forever in grateful remembrance."

REDUCTION

RATIO

18x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
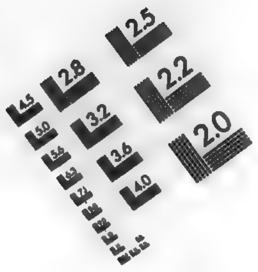
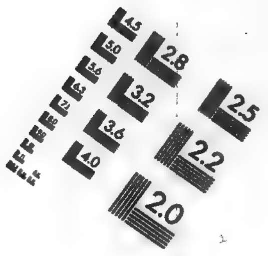
2.5 mm

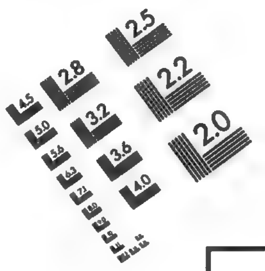
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

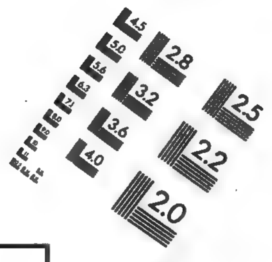
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

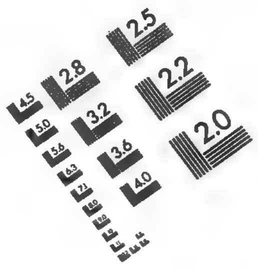


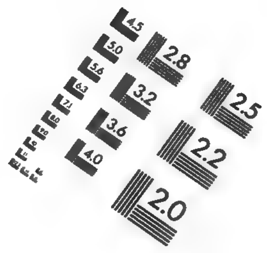


PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





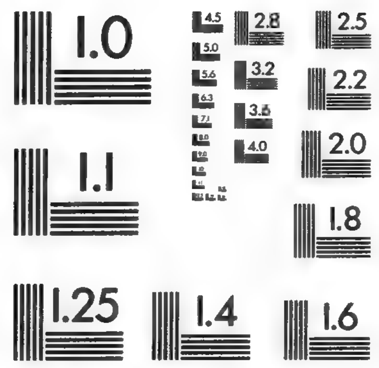




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
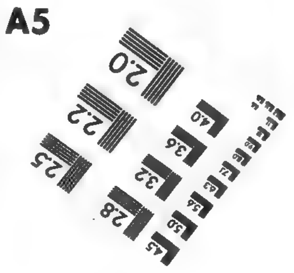
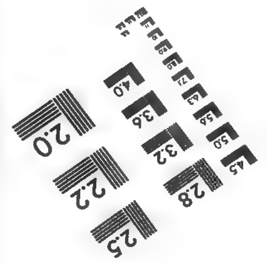
2.5 mm

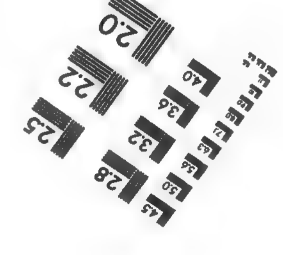
A5

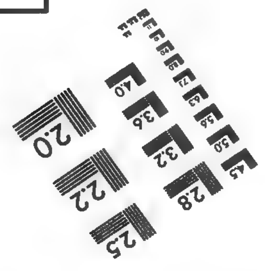




A4

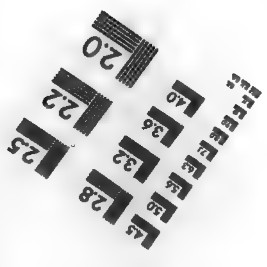
A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
4.5 mm

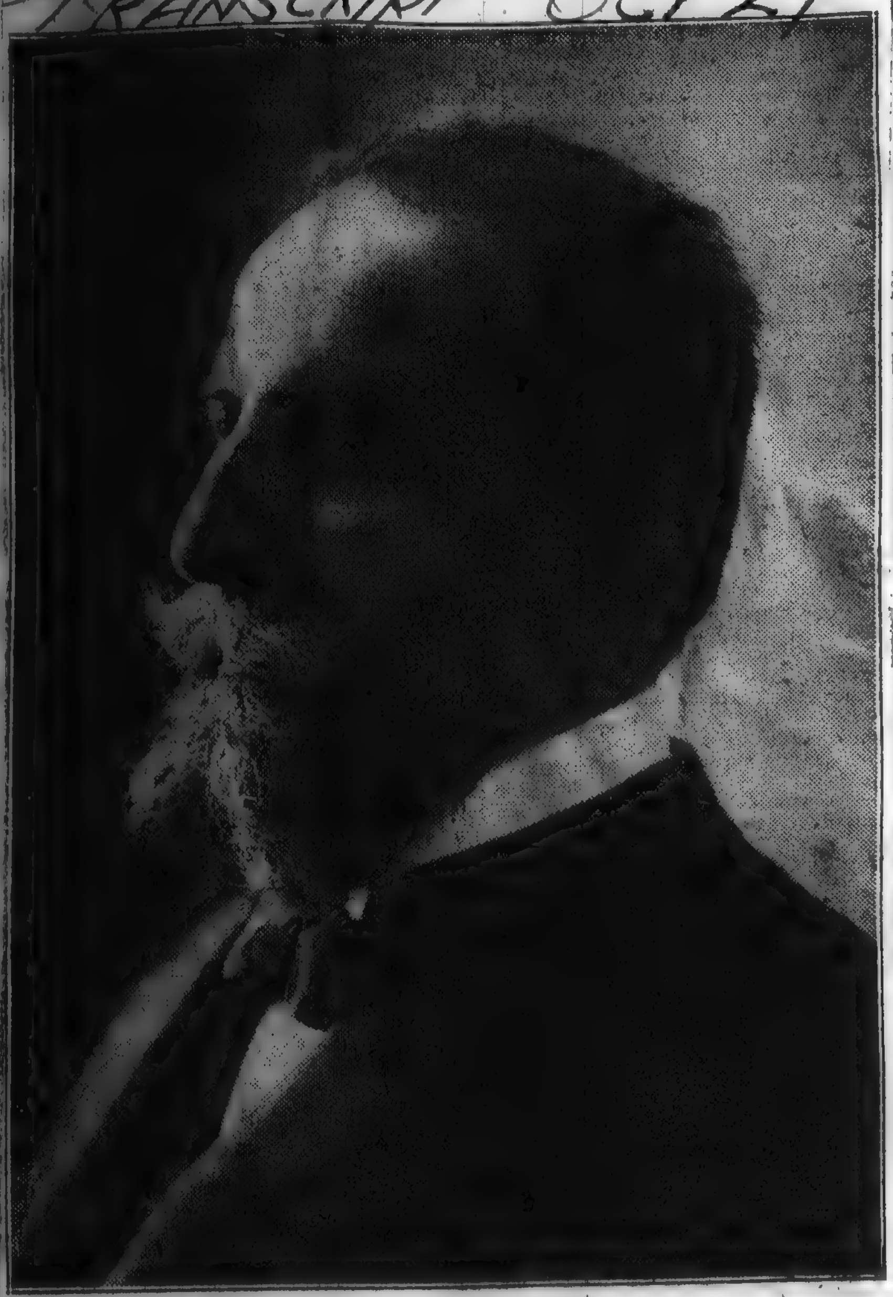
3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Wilhelm Gericke, the Second Conductor of Boston Symphony

Death in Vienna of the Man Long Associated With the Early Progress of a Great Musical Organization

Transcript Oct 29



WILHELM GERICKE is dead. Today a cablegram came from Vienna telling of the death of the man who perhaps as much as any one else made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is today. He died on Tuesday. He had been ill for a long time and so the end was not unexpected. But with the coming of the cablegram gloom was spread throughout Symphony Hall where the strains of Stravinsky's Song of the Nightingale were filling the vast empty spaces of the auditorium as the orchestra was practicing under the magic wand of Koussevitsky. Only a few men are left in the orchestra now who once bent their bows at the direction of the great Gericke but those who knew him played their parts a little more gently, a little more sadly, for the spirit of Gericke still hovers about the building. As in a busy banking house there was cast a veil of silence for a moment when the word came while in a little room at the New England Conservatory tears came to the eyes of a man who was teaching pupils the way to become—perhaps second Gerickes. William C. Endicott was the man in the bank to whom the cablegram came; Timothy Adamowsky the teacher who could not go on with his class, for he was the man whom Gericke brought from abroad to be a part of the orchestra which he conducted in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. In the first years of its existence George Henschel led its difficult way. When the end of his leadership came, Wilhelm Gericke stood at the front of the platform to lead the men through the delightful intricacies of Brahms's waltzes which he played for the audiences of Boston for the first time. Three years ago when they gave a testimonial and benefit concert for the great conductor who was then in exile in Austria and in dire need of funds they played again Gericke's own arrangements of these waltzes. Boston has never regretted this gift which Gericke gave to its vast music loving population.

Early Promise

Wilhelm Gericke was born in Schwanberg, Styria, on the fourteenth of April, 1845. He was not forty years of age when he came to Boston. It was when he was fifteen years old that he first showed signs of having talent for music. His education was almost solely received at the Vienna Conservatory. Here his progress was so complete that upon his graduation he was offered and accepted the position of one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. His training had been of the most exact type. His temperament was such that he loved the classics. To the detail and mastery of technique he devoted much of his attention and when he came to Boston for the first time, the growing orchestra was made to pay strict attention to the mastery of this and the mas- [illegible] After [illegible] remarked to Mr. Henry Lee Higginson: "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra." When, after five years of leading, he left the Boston Symphony it might well have been said: "These are musicians and this is an orchestra."

It was on the evening of Oct. 20, 1884, that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, was in Vienna and heard Gericke conduct. Mr. Higginson attended a concert at the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and so favorable was the impression which the handling of the score in the hands of Gericke made upon Mr. Higginson that immediately negotiations were under way to bring the Austrian to Boston. Two days later arrangements had been made and Gericke was ready to start to America.

Gericke took the men he had when he arrived and did with them the best that he could. A year or more after he first stood at the conductor's desk he reorganized the orchestra. He sent to Vienna, where he found many new and younger men. These he had come to sit on the platform with him. Whether any of those now playing under Koussevitsky are men whom Gericke found could not be learned today. Timothy and Josef Adamowsky of the New England Conservatory of Music were two of those whom Gericke imported, and two who will mourn the most at his passing.

Not a Nationalist

During his first stay in Boston Gericke proved himself an eclectic, selecting whenever it was possible, the music which at the time was generally considered the best. He was not an explorer into strange musical domains, preferring to choose music that time had proved worthy of the name classic. But he was not a nationalist. Italian, German, English, Russian, it made little difference to him. His one object was to choose worthy composers.

It has been said that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effect that the composers originally intended for their works. Whether it was Beethoven or Brahms, his beloved Brahms, Mozart or Schumann, he always seemed to give it the interpretation which its composer meant it to have, never intruding sensational effects of his own, never interpreting it in his own individual light.

Gericke was a strong disciplinarian, but as Mr. Timothy Adamowsky today pointed out, there never was a more likable personality at the head of a Boston orchestra. "He was very severe but, oh, he was very kind. Very just and very kind. He really made the Boston Symphony. He brought it to perfection of roundness in sound, he made it mellow, not an assemblage of individualists." But he let such men as Listeman and Leopold Lichtenberg go, whether for disciplinary reasons or for musical reasons it has never been told. The public only knew that they were gone. But in their place came such men as the Messrs. Adamowski and Charles M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel.

Prophets Confounded

When Gericke reorganized his orchestra the musical critics of the city declared that they played well together, but also objected because there was "more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director. They prophesied that the enterprise would die a natural death at the end of the season. This, of course, was all before the present Symphony Hall was built, that edifice being opened in 1900. It might be noted that Gericke was one of the first to introduce Richard Straus—and that the audience walked out on the performance.

But under Mr. Gericke's guidance the fame of the orchestra grew and in the year 1888-89, as M. A. Wolfe Howe's book points out, 112 concerts were given before audiences averaging 2500. In January, 1889, it was publicly announced that the conductor's health was undermined by the New England climate and that he would not return the next season. The choice of his successor was announced. Following a tour in the West as far as St. Louis, he was given a farewell testimonial concert in Boston in May, 1889.

Au Revoir

Of this concert, Louis Elson, the music critic, wrote:

"The enthusiasm which had ben bubbling up all through the evening, found its full vent at the end of the concert. Then the audience rose (as they had done at the beginning of the concert also) and shouted themselves hoarse, while waving of hats and handkerchiefs was carried on even by the most sedate of individuals. Why in the world did not the trumpeters add the climax by blowing a 'Tusch' just here? But everyone was hushed in agreeable surprise when Mr. Gericke squared himself for a struggle with our language, and gave with a charming little speech, all the more [illegible] because of its naive sentence [illegible] of Boston how much he appreciated their recognition; he thanked the orchestra for their faithful work, the public for their steady attention; he thanked the Cecilia for assisting at his last concert, and he thanked Mr. Higginson (all Boston, and in some degree all America, may join in this) for the munificence which had made the orchestra what it was, and then he added the single work of parting, 'Farewell.' We can all hope that the last word is premature. Let us compromise the parting, oh, most popular and deserving conductor, on the basis of 'Au revoir.'"

A private farewell took place later at the home of Mrs. Ole Bull at Cambridge. On this memorable occasion an album containing verses by Holmes, Aldrich and others was presented to Mr. Gericke. On the fly-leaf, over the signature of John S. Dwight, appeared these words:

To THE MAKER OF THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Later Mr. Gericke came back to Boston. In the interim the conductors were Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The former acted in this capacity for four years and the latter was the leader for five.

Start All Over Again

Mr. Gericke found new conditions when he returned. Players had come and gone in the nine-year interim and new human material for Gericke to mould to his whims confronted him. The world of music had, too, undergone changes and, as Mr. Howe points out, the conductorship of Nikisch and Baur had done much to broaden the outlook of American audiences.

Many objected to Gericke's choice of music and felt that he too often gave them the familiar, the classic. But he heeded these complaints and near the end of his second term more and more showed sympathy with the moderns and played them with a wonderful enthusiasm and devotion. During this second term two important events took place. One was the opening of the new Symphony Hall and the other was the establishment of the pension fund. It was in the winter of 1906 that a misunderstanding arose. There was a failure to agree upon terms by which his contract was to be renewed and in February of that year his resignation was announced. Dr. Karl Muck was his successor.

William Endicott, in the busy offices of Kidder, Peabody & Co., had this to say of Gericke: "He was a charming man. He knew of little but music, but that he knew to his finger tips. I was very fond of him and knew him well. The war hurt Gericke, and, of course, with all the bitterness which attended it, it made of him almost an exile from this land where for thirteen years he had done so much for us. He was very fond of America, too, and had many warm friends here that will miss him more than I can tell."

Proof of the sincerity of Mr. Endicott's statement was the benefit concert which was given him on Dec. 5, 1922 at Symphony Hall. At this concert Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, his own arangements of Brahm's waltzs, Straus's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," all favorites of Gericke, were played to a packed house. A fund was raised and sent to him to help in the difficult years in Vienna. Gericke wrote back a letter of appreciation that is one of the most prized possessions in the archives at Symphony Hall.

Arthur Foote, at Jordan Hall, today summed up the characteristics of the man when he said, "He had the utmost feeling for beauty of tone in an orchestra. His was the fullest artistic conscience. Whether he cared for it or not he would afford one piece of music the same sympathetic treatment that he poured forth into the music which he loved. He was a splendid conductor; whether better than later ones it is not for me to say. He was very uncompromising in his ideals, very quiet by nature, deeply loved by all who knew him."

From Emil Mollenhauer come words that are fitting to end this summary of the great Gericke: "Words cannot express the regret I feel for his passing. Gericke was not only one of the world's great conductors, he was one of the world's great men, in spirit as in deed. I refer especially to the noble quality of his personal honor, the breadth and kindness of his human sympathy. In his leadership he was never the autocrat. He was so sincere a musician, and so able in his profession, that these qualities were always enough to command the respect and close following of his men, without other need of discipline. A musician who did credit to the beauty of music is gone. He will be long admired and long mourned."

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN SIXTH

Post — Oct 24

"Pathetic" Engrossing Under Koussevitzky's Baton

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Outshining even his memorable version of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, at the concert of yesterday afternoon, proved the emotional and musical climax, thus far, of the present Symphony season. And a wildly applauding audience seemed so to regard it.

SERVICE TO COMPOSER

Let those who choose protest the filtration of certain German classics through the conductor's Slavic temperament. There is room here for two opinions. But beyond disputing, Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky, as revealed to us more than once last season, and again yesterday, is the true, the quintessential Tchaikovsky.

To have sat through this extraordinary performance of the "Pathetic" with score in hand would have been here and there to find Mr. Koussevitzky Gildoue-Tchaikovskying Tchaikovsky. Gilding the lily, the cynical might call it. Yet, surely for such service, the composer, had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday, would have returned devout thanks.

Eloquence Is Sound

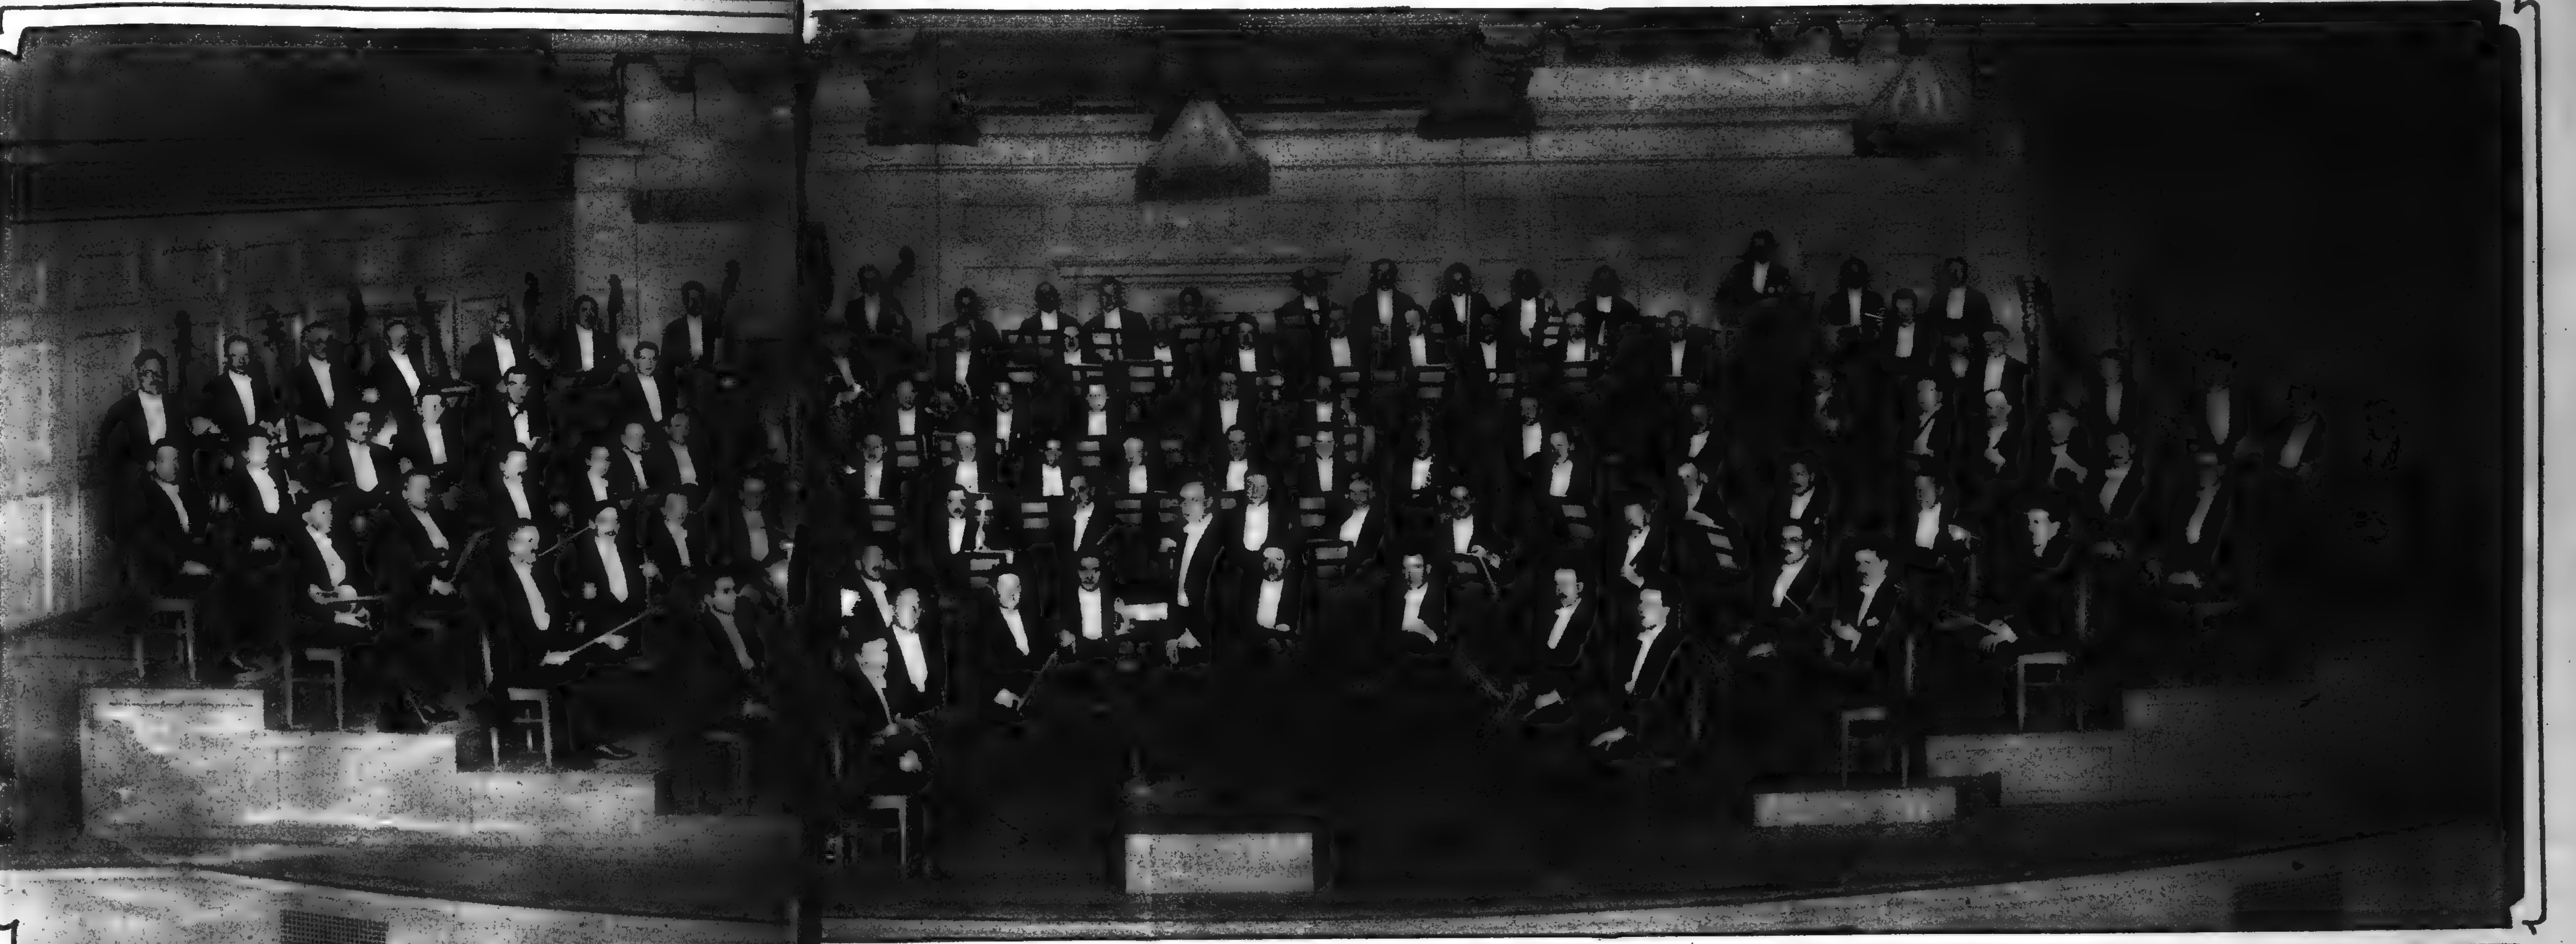
Would he paint the blackness and bleakness of desolation and despair, would he cry out in protest against our common fate, would he interrupt the music of wordly pleasure with the reminder that Death lurks ever near, or would he seek release in frenzied gaiety?—then and there did Mr. Koussevitzky, and his seconding thrice eloquent orchestra, sharpen and intensify Tchaikovsky's meaning, until the listener was racked or exhilarated, calmed or saddened far beyond the usual experience of hearing music.

And in passing, let it be noted that the sentimental Tchaikovsky was not underscored. Here Koussevitzky the musician of taste and feeling joined hands with Koussevitzky the dra-

---

THE BOSTON SY Y ORCHESTRA LED BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

(Wald)



The Boston Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky after the opening Saturd ng concert of the 1925-26 With each string sectio larger than ever before. d the seating arrangement ill at the left front, but the that the conductor has al violas are at the right fro nd the 'cellos are beside t to the right. The brass se exception of the horns, is in brilliance. Since there a ies of Boston concerts, an given on five Tuesday afte ogrammes of the new serie development of symphonic e of our own day. Below Koussevitzky, leader of the (Garo)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Bklyn Life + Activities of Long Is. Society

OCT 31 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY INCREASES BOSTON CONCERTS TO 73—The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1,000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 73 against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York, where ten concerts are given.

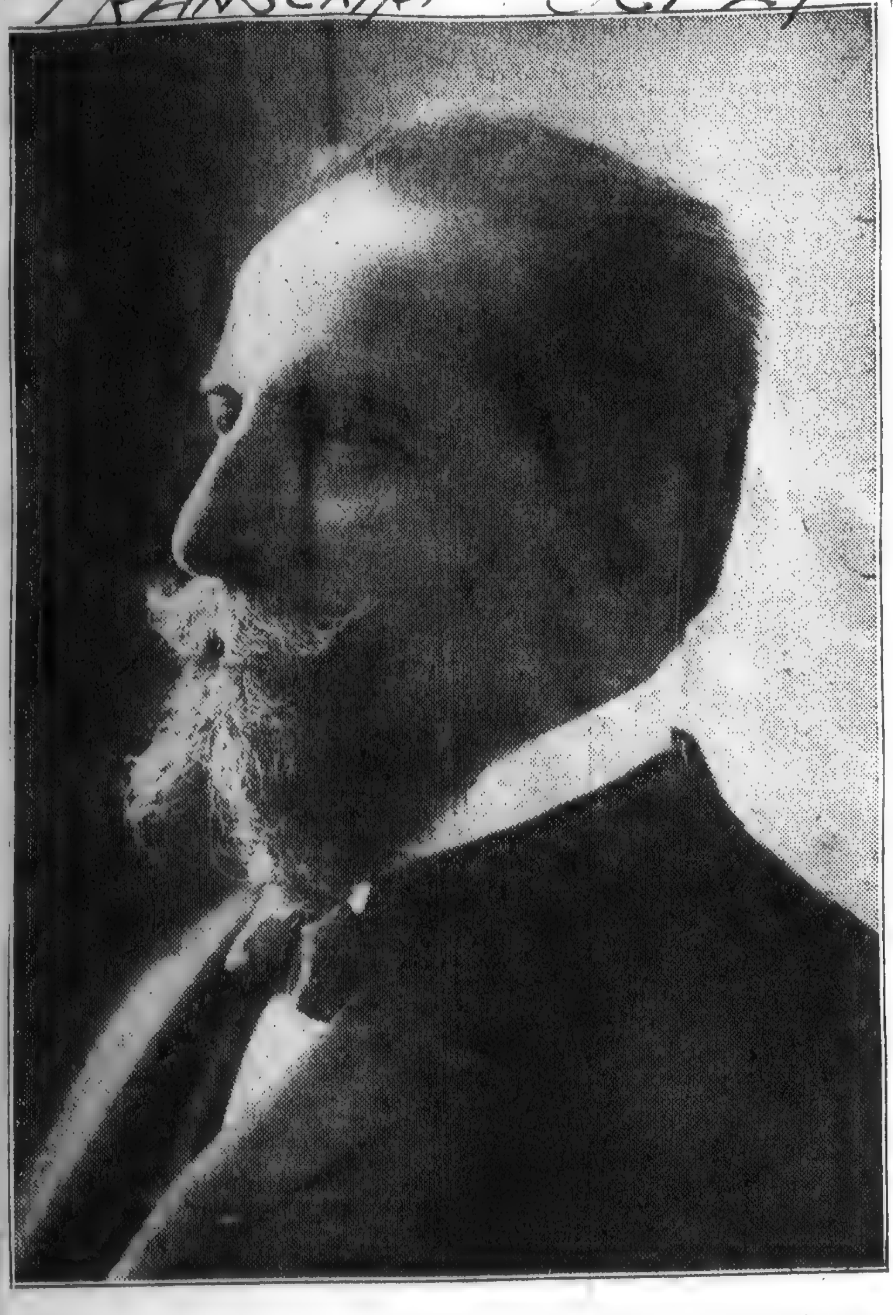
This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian Conductor of the Orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this same orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, in this vast country, and thus taking Symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky," which have come to be an annual institution and which still from that time to this attract as much attention in Paris as any Symphony concerts. In London every season Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted operas with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous Orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the Orchestra visits, and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Wilhelm Gericke, the Second Conductor of Boston Symphony

Death in Vienna of the Man Long Associated With the Early Progress of a Great Musical Organization

Transcript Oct 29



WILHELM GERICKE is dead. Today a cablegram came from Vienna telling of the death of the man who perhaps as much as any one else made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is today. He died on Tuesday. He had been ill for a long time and so the end was not unexpected. But with the coming of the cablegram gloom was spread throughout Symphony Hall where the strains of Stravinsky's Song of the Nightingale were filling the vast empty spaces of the auditorium as the orchestra was practicing under the magic wand of Koussevitsky. Only a few men are left in the orchestra now who once bent their bows at the direction of the great Gericke but those who knew him played their parts a little more gently, a little more sadly, for the spirit of Gericke still hovers about the building. As in a busy banking house there was cast a veil of silence for a moment when the word came while in a little room at the New England Conservatory tears came to the eyes of a man who was teaching pupils the way to become—perhaps second Gerickes. William C. Endicott was the man in the bank to whom the cablegram came; Timothy Adamowsky the teacher who could not go on with his class, for he was the man whom Gericke brought from abroad to be a part of the orchestra which he conducted in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. In the first years of its existence George Henschel led its difficult way. When the end of his leadership came, Wilhelm Gericke stood at the front of the platform to lead the men through the delightful intricacies of Brahms's waltzes which he played for the audiences of Boston for the first time. Three years ago when they gave a testimonial and benefit concert for the great conductor who was then in exile in Austria and in dire need of funds they played again Gericke's own arrangements of these waltzes. Boston has never regretted this gift which Gericke gave to its vast music loving population.

Early Promise

Wilhelm Gericke was born in Schwanberg, Styria, on the fourteenth of April, 1845. He was not forty years of age when he came to Boston. It was when he was fifteen years old that he first showed signs of having talent for music. His education was almost solely received at the Vienna Conservatory. Here his progress was so complete that upon his graduation he was offered and accepted the position of one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. His training had been of the most exact type. His temperament was such that he loved the classics. To the detail and mastery of technique he devoted much of his attention and when he came to Boston for the first time, the growing orchestra was made to pay strict at-[illegible] to the mastery of this and the mastery of [illegible]. After his second concert he remarked to Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra." When, after five years of leading, he left the Boston Symphony it might well have been said: "These are musicians and this is an orchestra."

It was on the evening of Oct. 20, 1884, that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, was in Vienna and heard Gericke conduct. Mr. Higginson attended a concert at the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and so favorable was the impression which the handling of the score in the hands of Gericke made upon Mr. Higginson that immediately negotiations were under way to bring the Austrian to Boston. Two days later arrangements had been made and Gericke was ready to start to America.

Gericke took the men he had when he arrived and did with them the best that he could. A year or more after he first stood at the conductor's desk he reorganized the orchestra. He sent to Vienna, where he found many new and younger men. These he had come to sit on the platform with him. Whether any of those now playing under Koussevitsky are men whom Gericke found could not be learned today. Timothy and Josef Adamowsky of the New England Conservatory of Music were two of those whom Gericke imported, and two who will mourn the most at his passing.

Not a Nationalist

During his first stay in Boston Gericke proved himself an eclectic, selecting whenever it was possible, the music which at the time was generally considered the best. He was not an explorer into strange musical domains, preferring to choose music that time had proved worthy of the name classic. But he was not a nationalist. Italian, German, English, Russian, it made little difference to him. His one object was to choose worthy composers.

It has been said that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effect that the composers originally intended for their works. Whether it was Beethoven or Brahms, his beloved Brahms, Mozart or Schumann, he always seemed to give it the interpretation which its composer meant it to have, never intruding sensational effects of his own, never interpreting it in his own individual light.

Gericke was a strong disciplinarian, but as Mr. Timothy Adamowsky today pointed out, there never was a more likable personality at the head of a Boston orchestra. "He was very severe but, oh, he was very kind. Very just and very kind. He really made the Boston Symphony. He brought it to perfection of roundness in sound, he made it mellow, not an assemblage of individualists." But he let such men as Aszteman and Leopold Lichtenberg go, whether for disciplinary reasons or for musical reasons it has never been told. The public only knew that they were gone. But in their place came such men as the Messrs. Adamowski and Charles M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel.

Prophets Confounded

When Gericke reorganized his orchestra the musical critics of the city declared that they played well together, but also objected because there was "more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director. They prophesied that the enterprise would die a natural death at the end of the season. This, of course, was all before the present Symphony Hall was built, that edifice being opened in 1900. It might be noted that Gericke was one of the first to introduce Richard Straus—and that the audience walked out on the performance.

But under Mr. Gericke's guidance the fame of the orchestra grew and in the year 1888-89, as M. A. Wolfe Howe's book points out, 112 concerts were given before audiences averaging 2500. In January, 1889, it was publicly announced that the conductor's health was undermined by the New England climate and that he would not return the next season. The choice of his successor was announced. Following a tour in the West as far as St. Louis, he was given a farewell testimonial concert in Boston in May, 1889.

Au Revoir

Of this concert, Louis Elson, the music critic, wrote:

"The enthusiasm which had ben bubbling up all through the evening, found its full vent at the end of the concert. Then the audience rose (as they had done at the beginning of the concert also) and shouted themselves hoarse, while waving of hats and handkerchiefs was carried on even by the most sedate of individuals. Why in the world did not the trumpeters add the climax by blowing a 'Tusch' just here? But everyone was hushed in agreeable surprise when Mr. Gericke squared himself for a struggle with our language, and gave [illegible] a charming little speech, all the mo[illegible] [illegible]tful because of its naive [illegible] and evident sincerity. He told the [illegible] of Boston how much he appreciated their recognition; he thanked the orchestra for their faithful work, the public for their steady attention; he thanked the Cecilia for assisting at his last concert, and he thanked Mr. Higginson (all Boston, and in some degree all America, may join in this) for the munificence which had made the orchestra what it was, and then he added the single work of parting, 'Farewell.' We can all hope that the last word is premature. Let us compromise the parting, oh, most popular and deserving conductor, on the basis of 'Au revoir.'"

A private farewell took place later at the home of Mrs. Ole Bull at Cambridge. On this memorable occasion an album containing verses by Holmes, Aldrich and others was presented to Mr. Gericke. On the fly-leaf, over the signature of John S. Dwight, appeared these words:

To the Maker of the Boston
Symphony Orchestra

Later Mr. Gericke came back to Boston. In the interim the conductors were Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The former acted in this capacity for four years and the latter was the leader for five.

Start All Over Again

Mr. Gericke found new conditions when he returned. Players had come and gone in the nine-year interim and new human material for Gericke to mould to his whims confronted him. The world of music had, too, undergone changes and, as Mr. Howe points out, the conductorship of Nikisch and Baur had done much to broaden the outlook of American audiences.

Many objected to Gericke's choice of music and felt that he too often gave them the familiar, the classic. But he heeded these complaints and near the end of his second term more and more showed sympathy with the moderns and played them with a wonderful enthusiasm and devotion. During this second term two important events took place. One was the opening of the new Symphony Hall and the other was the establishment of the pension fund. It was in the winter of 1906 that a misunderstanding arose. There was a failure to agree upon terms by which his contract was to be renewed and in February of that year his resignation was announced. Dr. Karl Muck was his successor.

William Endicott, in the busy offices of Kidder, Peabody & Co., had this to say of Gericke: "He was a charming man. He knew of little but music, but that he knew to his finger tips. I was very fond of him and knew him well. The war hurt Gericke, and, of course, with all the bitterness which attended it, it made of him almost an exile from this land where for thirteen years he had done so much for us. He was very fond of America, too, and had many warm friends here that will miss him more than I can tell."

Proof of the sincerity of Mr. Endicott's statement was the benefit concert which was given him on Dec. 5, 1922 at Symphony Hall. At this concert Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, his own arangements of Brahm's waltzs, Straus's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," all favorites of Gericke, were played to a packed house. A fund was raised and sent to him to help in the difficult year in Vienna. Gericke wrote back a letter of appreciation that is one of the most prized possessions in the archives at Symphony Hall.

Arthur Foote, at Jordan Hall, today summed up the characteristics of the man when he said, "He had the utmost feeling for beauty of tone in an orchestra. His was the fullest artistic conscience. Whether he cared for it or not he would afford one piece of music the same sympathetic treatment that he poured forth into the music which he loved. He was a splendid conductor; whether better than later ones it is not for me to say. He was very uncompromising in his ideals, very quiet by nature, deeply loved by all who knew him."

From Emil Mollenhauer come words that are fitting to end this summary of the great Gericke: "Words cannot express the regret I feel for his passing. Gericke was not only one of the world's great conductors, he was one of the world's great men, in spirit as in deed. I refer especially to the noble quality of his personal honor, the breadth and kindness of his human sympathy. In his leadership he was never the autocrat. He was so sincere a musician, and so able in his profession, that these qualities were always enough to command the respect and close following of his men, without other need of discipline. A musician who did credit to the beauty of music is gone. He will be long admired and long mourned."

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN SIXTH

Post — Oct 24

"Pathetic" Engrossing Under Koussevitzky's Baton

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Outshining even his memorable version of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, at the concert of yesterday afternoon, proved the emotional and musical climax, thus far, of the present Symphony season. And a wildly applauding audience seemed so to regard it.

SERVICE TO COMPOSER

Let those who choose protest the filtration of certain German classics through the conductor's Slavic temperament. There is room here for two opinions. But beyond disputing, Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky, as revealed to us more than once last season, and again yesterday, is the true, the quintessential Tchaikovsky.

To have sat through this extraordinary performance of the "Pathetic" with score in hand would have been here and there to find Mr. Koussevitzky oue-Tchaikovskying Tchaikovsky. Gilding the lily, the cynical might call it. Yet, surely for such service, the composer, had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday, would have returned devout thanks.

Eloquence Is Sound

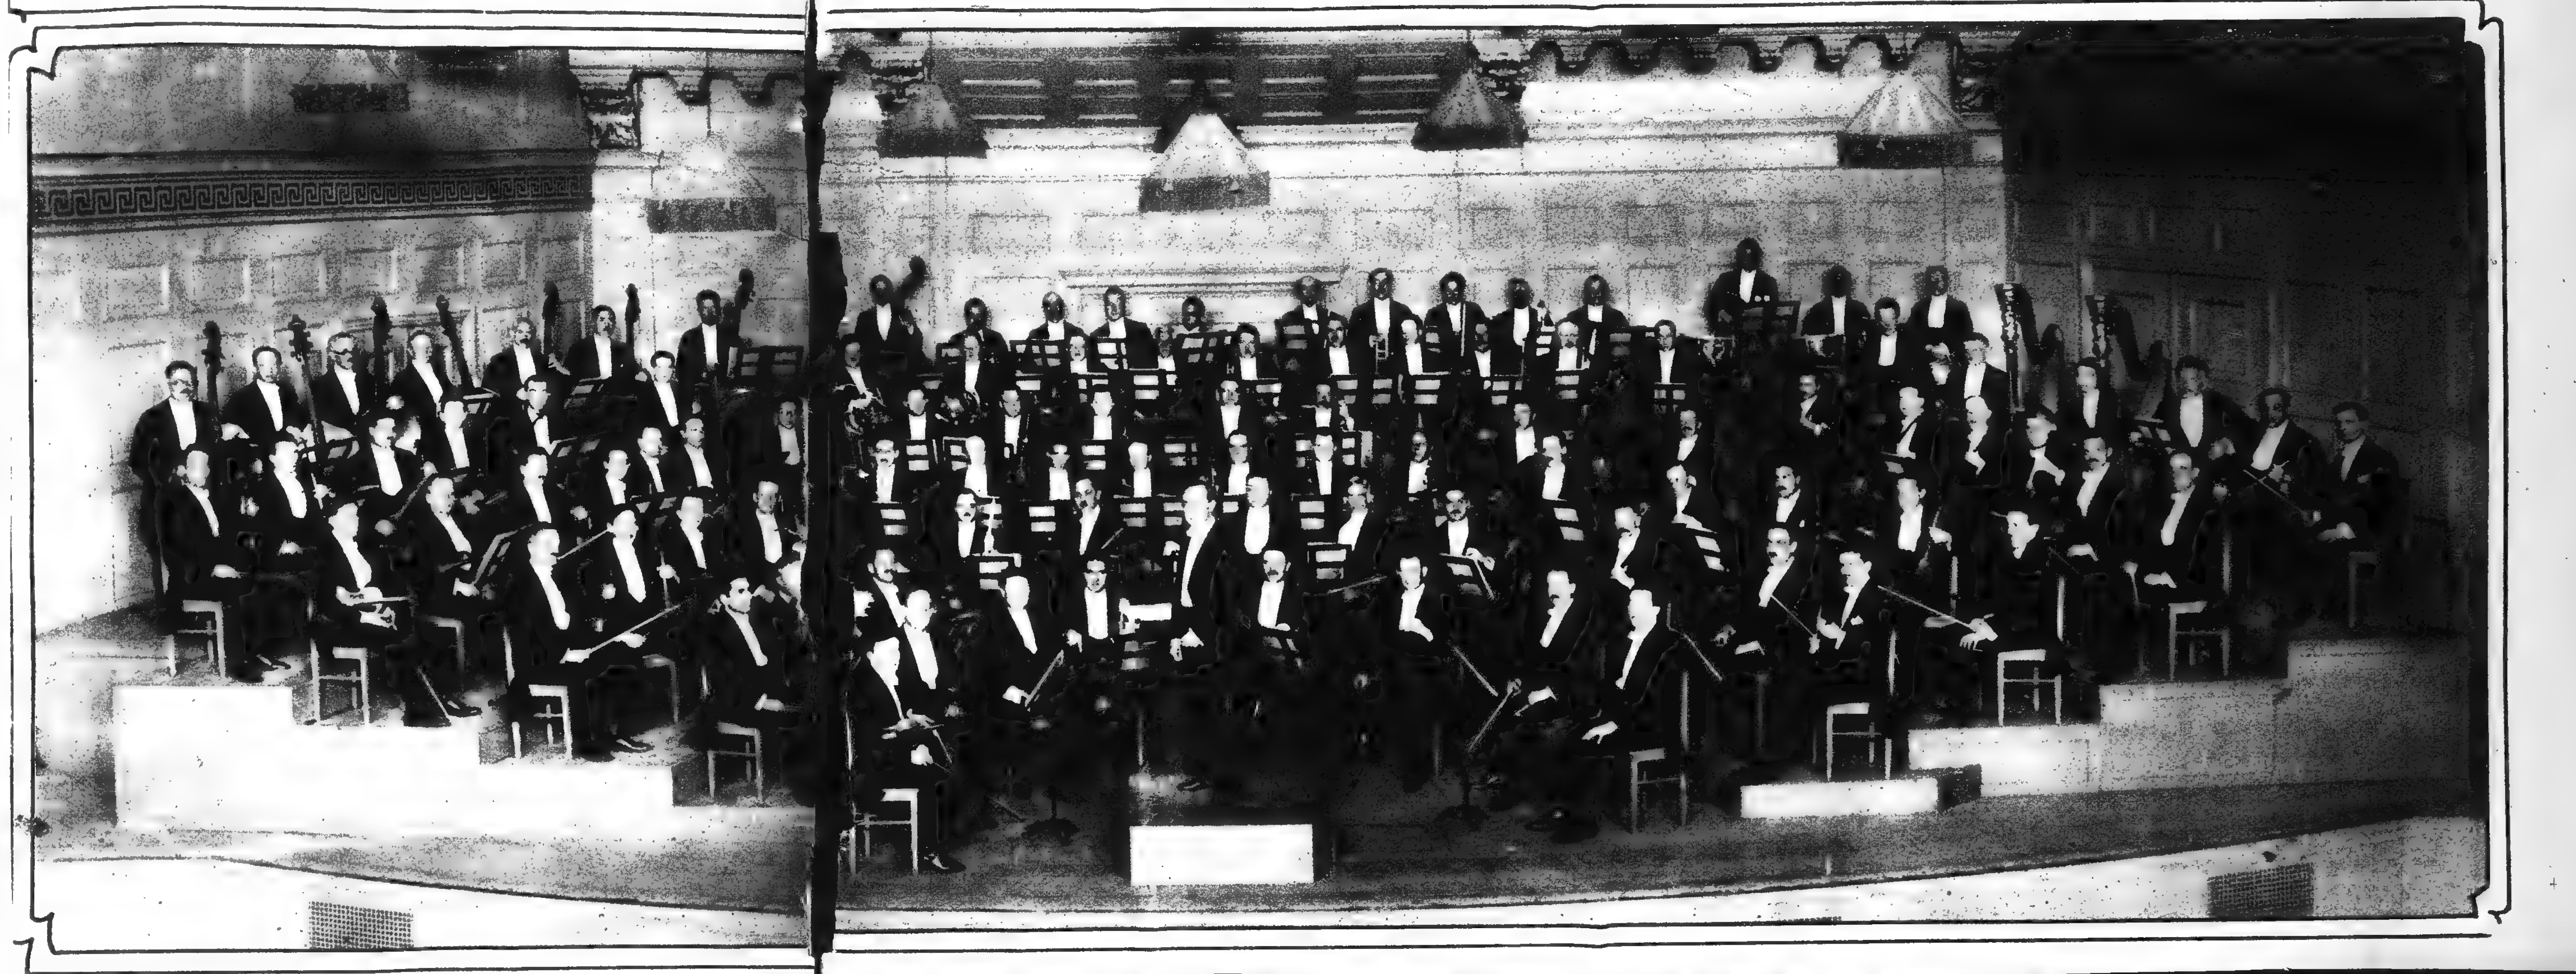
Would he paint the blackness and bleakness of desolation and despair, would he cry out in protest against our common fate, would he interrupt the music of wordly pleasure with the reminder that Death lurks ever near, or would he seek release in frenzied gaiety?—then and there did Mr. Koussevitzky, and his seconding thrice eloquent orchestra, sharpen and intensify Tchaikovsky's meaning until the listener was racked or exhilarated, calmed or saddened far beyond the usual experience of hearing music.

And in passing, let it be noted that the sentimental Tchaikovsky was not underscored. Here Koussevitzky the musician of taste and feeling joined hands with Koussevitzky the dra-

---

THE BOSTON SY[illegible]Y ORCHESTRA LED BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

(Wald)



The Boston Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky, after the opening Saturday evening concert of the 1925-26 season, on the stage of Symphony hall. With each string section increased, the personnel this season is larger than ever before. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. The brass section, formerly at the right rear with the exception of the horns, is now at the centre rear, thereby gaining in brilliance. Since there are waiting lists for each of the three series of Boston concerts, an additional series is now announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning December 1. The programmes of the new series will be in historical order to show the development of symphonic music from its earliest stages to the style of our own day. Below is shown a recent photograph of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. (Garo)

FOR those who wish to enjoy music in its finest form.
Who wish to be known as musically cultured; who wish their home to be known as a place of deli[illegible] atmosphere and [illegible]inment.

Established 1857 Tel. South 0534
JOHN FEITNER
Designers [illegible]
Monuments & Mausole[illegible]
24th & 25th Street Near 5th Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRANK M. McCURDY CO.
INCORPORATED
Real Estate Sold Quickly
21 Years' Experience
158 REMSEN STREET
Phones: Main 5906, 5907, 1695

HENRY 3038
Butler's Warehouses Inc.
2-4 Degraw Street
BROOKLYN
BONDED—FREE—WATERFRONT—STORES

25 Broadway, New York City

Wilhelm Gericke, the Second Conductor of Boston Symphony

Death in Vienna of the Man Long Associated With the Early Progress of a Great Musical Organization

Transcript Oct 24

WILHELM GERICKE is dead. Today a cablegram came from Vienna telling of the death of the man who perhaps as much as any one else made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is today. He died on Tuesday. He had been ill for a long time and so the end was not unexpected. But with the coming of the cablegram gloom was spread throughout Symphony Hall where the strains of Stravinsky's Song of the Nightingale were filling the vast empty spaces of the auditorium as the orchestra was practicing under the magic wand of Koussevitzky. Only a few men are left in the orchestra now who once bent their bows at the direction of the great Gericke but those who knew him played their parts a little more gently, a little more sadly, for the spirit of Gericke still hovers about the building. And in a busy [illegible] house there was cast a veil of [illegible] for a moment when the word came while in a little room at the New England Conservatory tears came to the eyes of a man who was teaching pupils the way to [illegible] perhaps second Gerickes. [illegible] dicott was the man in the [illegible] the cablegram came; Timothy Adamowski, the teacher who could not go on with his class, for he was the man whom Gericke brought from abroad to be a part of the orchestra which he conducted in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. In the first years of its existence George Henschel led its difficult way. When the end of his leadership came, Wilhelm Gericke stood at the front of the platform to lead the men through the delightful intricacies of Brahms's waltzes which he played for the audiences of Boston for the first time. [illegible] years [illegible] when they gave a testimonial [illegible] concert for the great [illegible] then in exile in Austria and [illegible] funds they played again Gericke's own arrangements of these waltzes. Boston has never regretted this gift which Gericke gave to its vast [illegible]

Early Promise

Wilhelm Gericke was born in Schwanberg, Styria, on the fourteenth of April, 1845. He was not forty years old when he came to Boston. It was when he was fifteen years old that he first showed signs of having talent for music. His education was almost solely received at the Vienna Conservatory. Here his progress was so complete that upon his graduation he was offered and accepted the position of one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. His training had been of the most exact type. His temperament was such that he loved the classics. To the detail and mastery of technique he devoted much of his attention and when he came to Boston for the first time, the growing orchestra was made to pay strict attention to the mastery of this and the mastery of finesse. After his second concert he remarked to Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra." When, after five years of leading, he left the Boston Symphony it might well have been said: "These are musicians and this is an orchestra."

It was on the evening of Oct. 20, 1881 that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, was in Vienna and heard Gericke conduct. Mr. Higginson attended a concert at the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and so favorable was the impression which the handling of the [illegible] in the hands of Gericke made upon Mr. Higginson that immediately [illegible] were under way to bring [illegible] Boston. Two days later [illegible] had been made and Gericke was [illegible] to America.

Gericke took the [illegible] arrived and did with [illegible] could. A year or more after he [illegible] at the conductor's [illegible] the orchestra. He [illegible] he found many new and [illegible] These he had come to [illegible] with him. Whether any of [illegible] ing under Koussevitzky are [illegible] Gericke found could not be [illegible] Timothy and Josef Adamowski [illegible] England Conservatory of Music [illegible] of those whom Gericke imported [illegible] who will mourn the most [illegible]

Not a Nationalist

During his first [illegible] proved himself an eclectic [illegible] ever it was possible, [illegible] the time was generally [illegible] He was not [illegible] musical domains, preferring [illegible] music that time had [illegible] name classic. But he [illegible] alist, Italian, German, English, Russian, it made little difference to him. His object was to choose worthy composers

It has been said that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effect that the composers originally intended for their works. Whether it was Beethoven or Brahms, his beloved Brahms, Mozart or Schumann, he always seemed to give it the interpretation which its composor meant it to have, never intruding sensational effects of his own, never interpreting it in his own individual light.

Gericke was a strong disciplinarian, but as Mr. Timothy Adamowsky today pointed out, there never was a more [illegible] personality at the head of a Boston orchestra. "He was very severe but, oh, he was very kind. Very just and very kind. He really made the Boston Symphony. He brought it to perfection of roundness in sound, he made it mellow, [illegible] an assemblage of individualists." But he let such men as Aszteman and Leopold Lichtenberg go, whether for disciplinary reasons or for musical reasons it has never been told. The public only knew that they were gone. But in their place came such men as the Messrs. Adamowski and Charles M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel.

Prophets Confounded

When Gericke reorganized the orchestra the musical critics of the city declared that they played well together, but also [illegible] because there was "more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director." They prophesied that the enterprise would die a natural death at the end of the season. [illegible] before the present Symphony Hall was built, that edifice being opened in 1900. It might be noted that Gericke was one of the first to introduce Richard Strauss—and that the audience walked out on the performance.

But under Mr. Gericke's guidance the fame of the orchestra grew and in the year 1888-89, as M. A. De Wolfe Howe's book points out, 112 concerts were given before audiences averaging 2000. In January, 1889, it was publicly announced that the conductor's health was undermined by the New England climate and that he would not return the next season. The choice of his successor was announced. Following a tour in the West as far as St. Louis, he was given a farewell testimonial concert in Boston in May, 1889.

Au Revoit

Of this concert, Louis Elson, the music critic, wrote:

"The enthusiasm which had been bubbling up all through the evening found its full vent at the end of the concert. Then the audience rose [illegible] they had done at the beginning of the concert [illegible] themselves hoarse, while waving of hats and handkerchiefs was carried on even by the most sedate of individuals. Why in the world did not the trumpeters add the climax by blowing a 'Tusch' just here? But everyone was hushed in agreeable surprise when Mr. Gericke squared himself for a struggle with our language, and gave [illegible] a charming little speech, all the more [illegible]ful because of its naive senten[illegible] [illegible] of Boston how much he appreciated their recognition; he thanked the orchestra for their faithful work, the public for their steady attention; he thanked the Cecilia for assisting at his last concert, and he thanked Mr. Higginson (all Boston and in some degree all America may join in this) for the munificence which had made the orchestra possible [illegible] the single word of parting, 'Farewell.' [illegible]

Start All Over Again

[illegible] together and played them with a wonderful enthusiasm [illegible] During this second term [illegible] events took place. One was the opening of the new Symphony Hall and the other was the establishment [illegible] It was in the winter of 1906 that a misunderstanding arose. There was a failure to agree upon terms [illegible] was [illegible] his resignation was [illegible]

[illegible]

Arthur Foote [illegible] summed up the [illegible] when he said, "He had the [illegible] for beauty of tone [illegible] His was the fullest artistic [illegible] he cared for it or not [illegible] piece of music the [illegible] ment that he poured [illegible] which he loved [illegible] ductor, whether [illegible] not for me to say [illegible] compromising in his [illegible] nature deeply loved [illegible]

[illegible] the long admired and loved [illegible]"

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN SIXTH

Post Oct 24

"Pathetic" Engrossing Under Koussevitzky's Baton

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Outshining even his memorable version of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at the concert of yesterday afternoon proved the emotional and musical climax, thus far, of the present Symphony season. And a wildly applauding audience seemed [illegible] regard it.

SERVICE TO COMPOSER

Let these [illegible] the [illegible] opinion [illegible] Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky [illegible] vealed to us more than once [illegible] son, and again yesterday, [illegible] the quintessential Tchaikovsky.

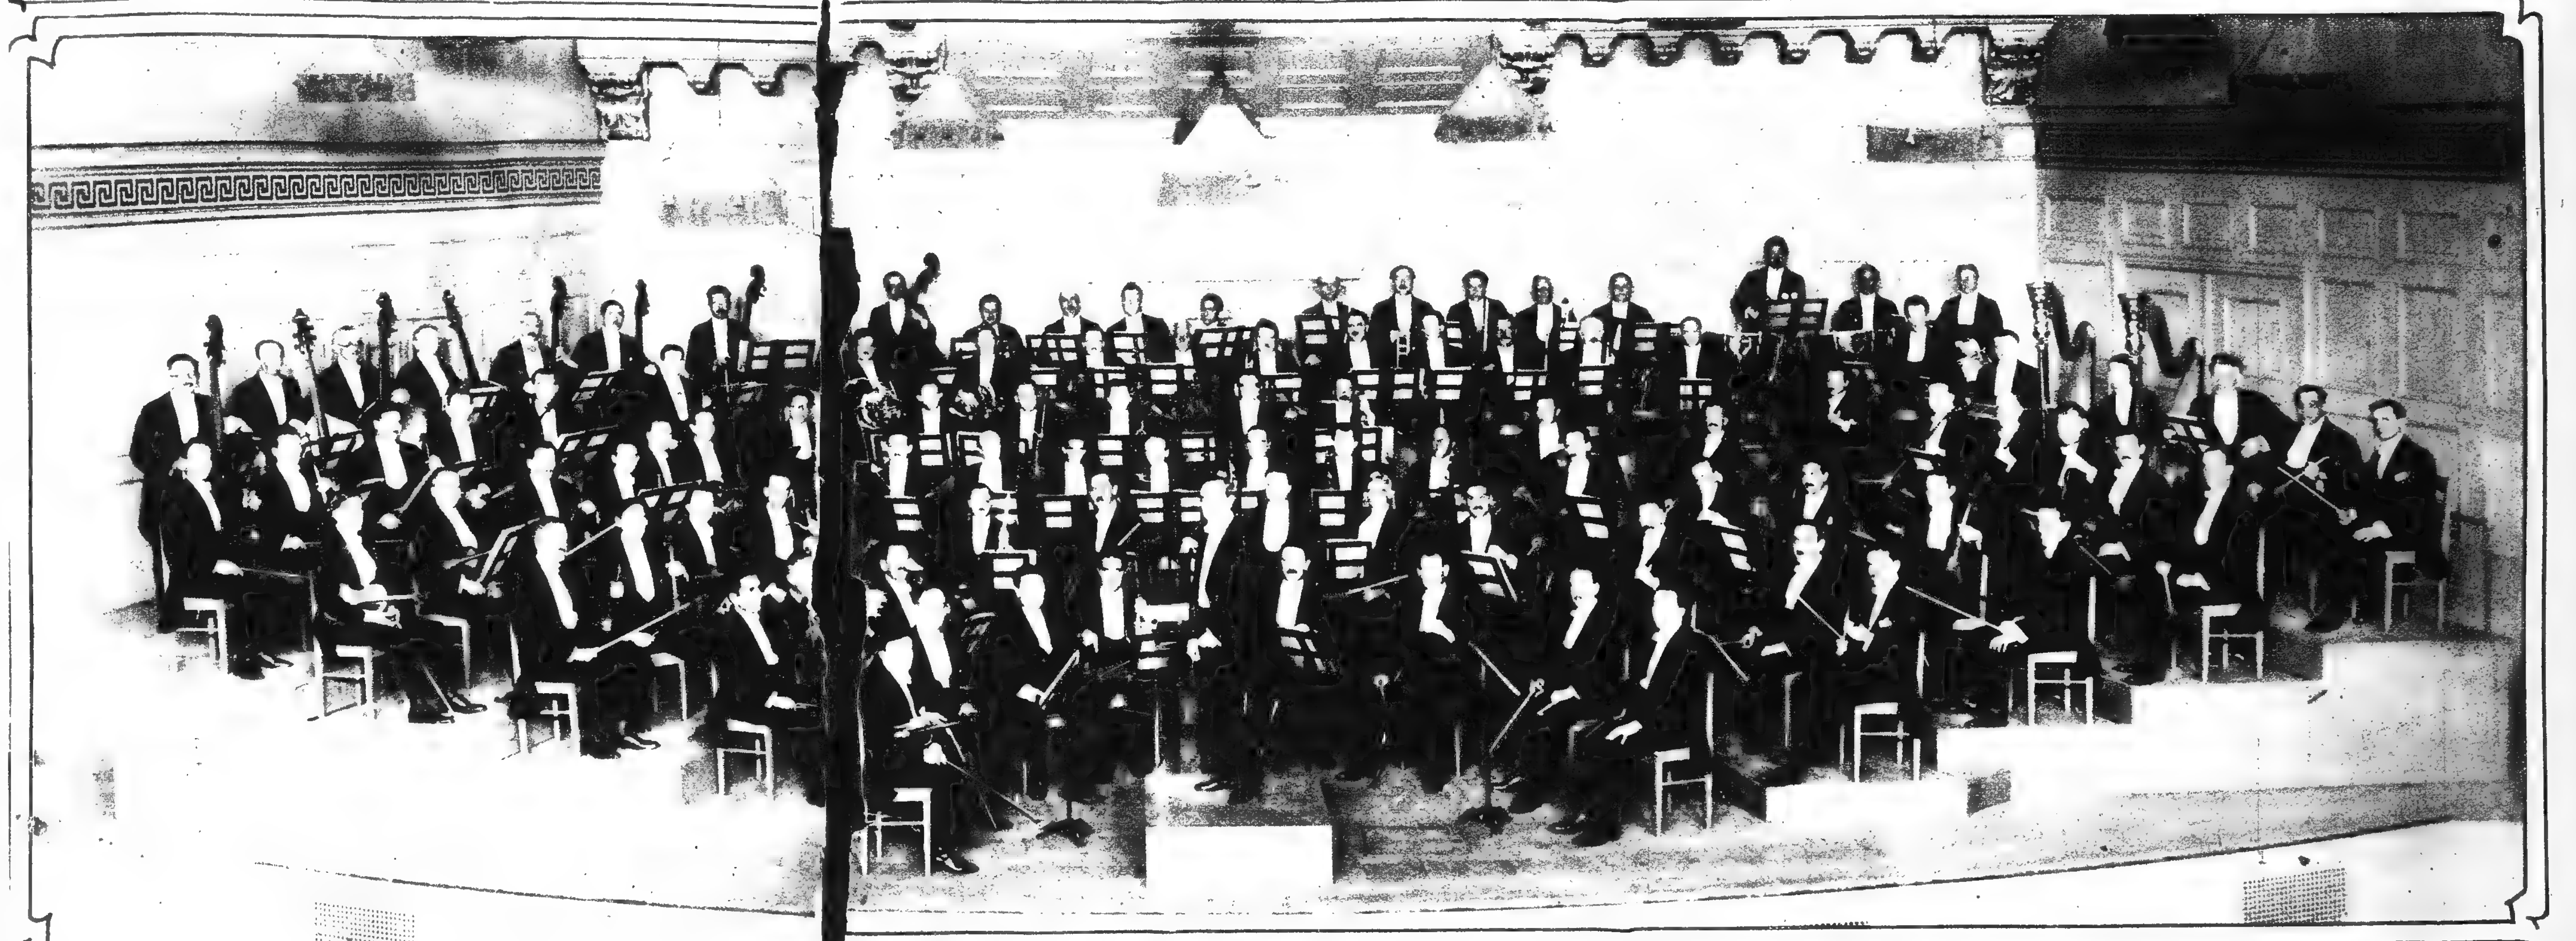
To have sat through this extraordinary performance of the "Pathetic" with score in hand would have [illegible] here and there to find Mr. Koussevitzky [illegible] ous-Tchaikovsky [illegible] ing the lily, the cynical might call it. Yet, surely for such service, the composer, had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday, would have returned devout thanks.

Eloquence Is Sound

[illegible] the blackness [illegible] bleakness of desolation and despair would [illegible] our common fate would [illegible] this music of weirdly pleasure with the reminder that Death [illegible] or would [illegible] release [illegible] galety [illegible] and there [illegible] vitzky and his [illegible] eloquent orchestra, sharpen and [illegible] tensify Tchaikovsky's [illegible] the listener was racked or exhilarated, calmed or saddened far beyond the usual experience of hearing music.

And in passing, let it be noted that the sentimental Tchaikovsky was not underscored. Here Koussevitzky the musician of taste and feeling joined hands with Koussevitzky the dra[illegible]

THE BOSTON SY[illegible]Y ORCHESTRA LED BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY



(Wald)

The Boston Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky, after the opening Saturday evening concert of the 1925-26 season, on the stage of Symphony hall. With each string section increased, the personnel this season is larger than ever before. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. The brass section, formerly at the right rear with the exception of the horns, is now at the centre rear, thereby gaining in brilliance. Since there are waiting lists for each of the three series of Boston concerts, an additional series is now announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning December 1. The programmes of the new series will be in historical order to show the development of symphonic music from its earliest stages to the style of our own day. Below is shown a recent photograph of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. (Garo)

FOR those who wish to enjoy music in its finest form.
Who wish to be known as musically [illegible] who wish their home to be known [illegible] phere and [illegible]ment.

JOHN FEITNER

FRANK M. McCURDY CO.
INCORPORATED
Real Estate Sold Quickly
158 REMSEN STREET
Phones: Main 5906, 5907, 1695

Butler's Warehouses Inc.
24 Degraw Street
BROOKLYN

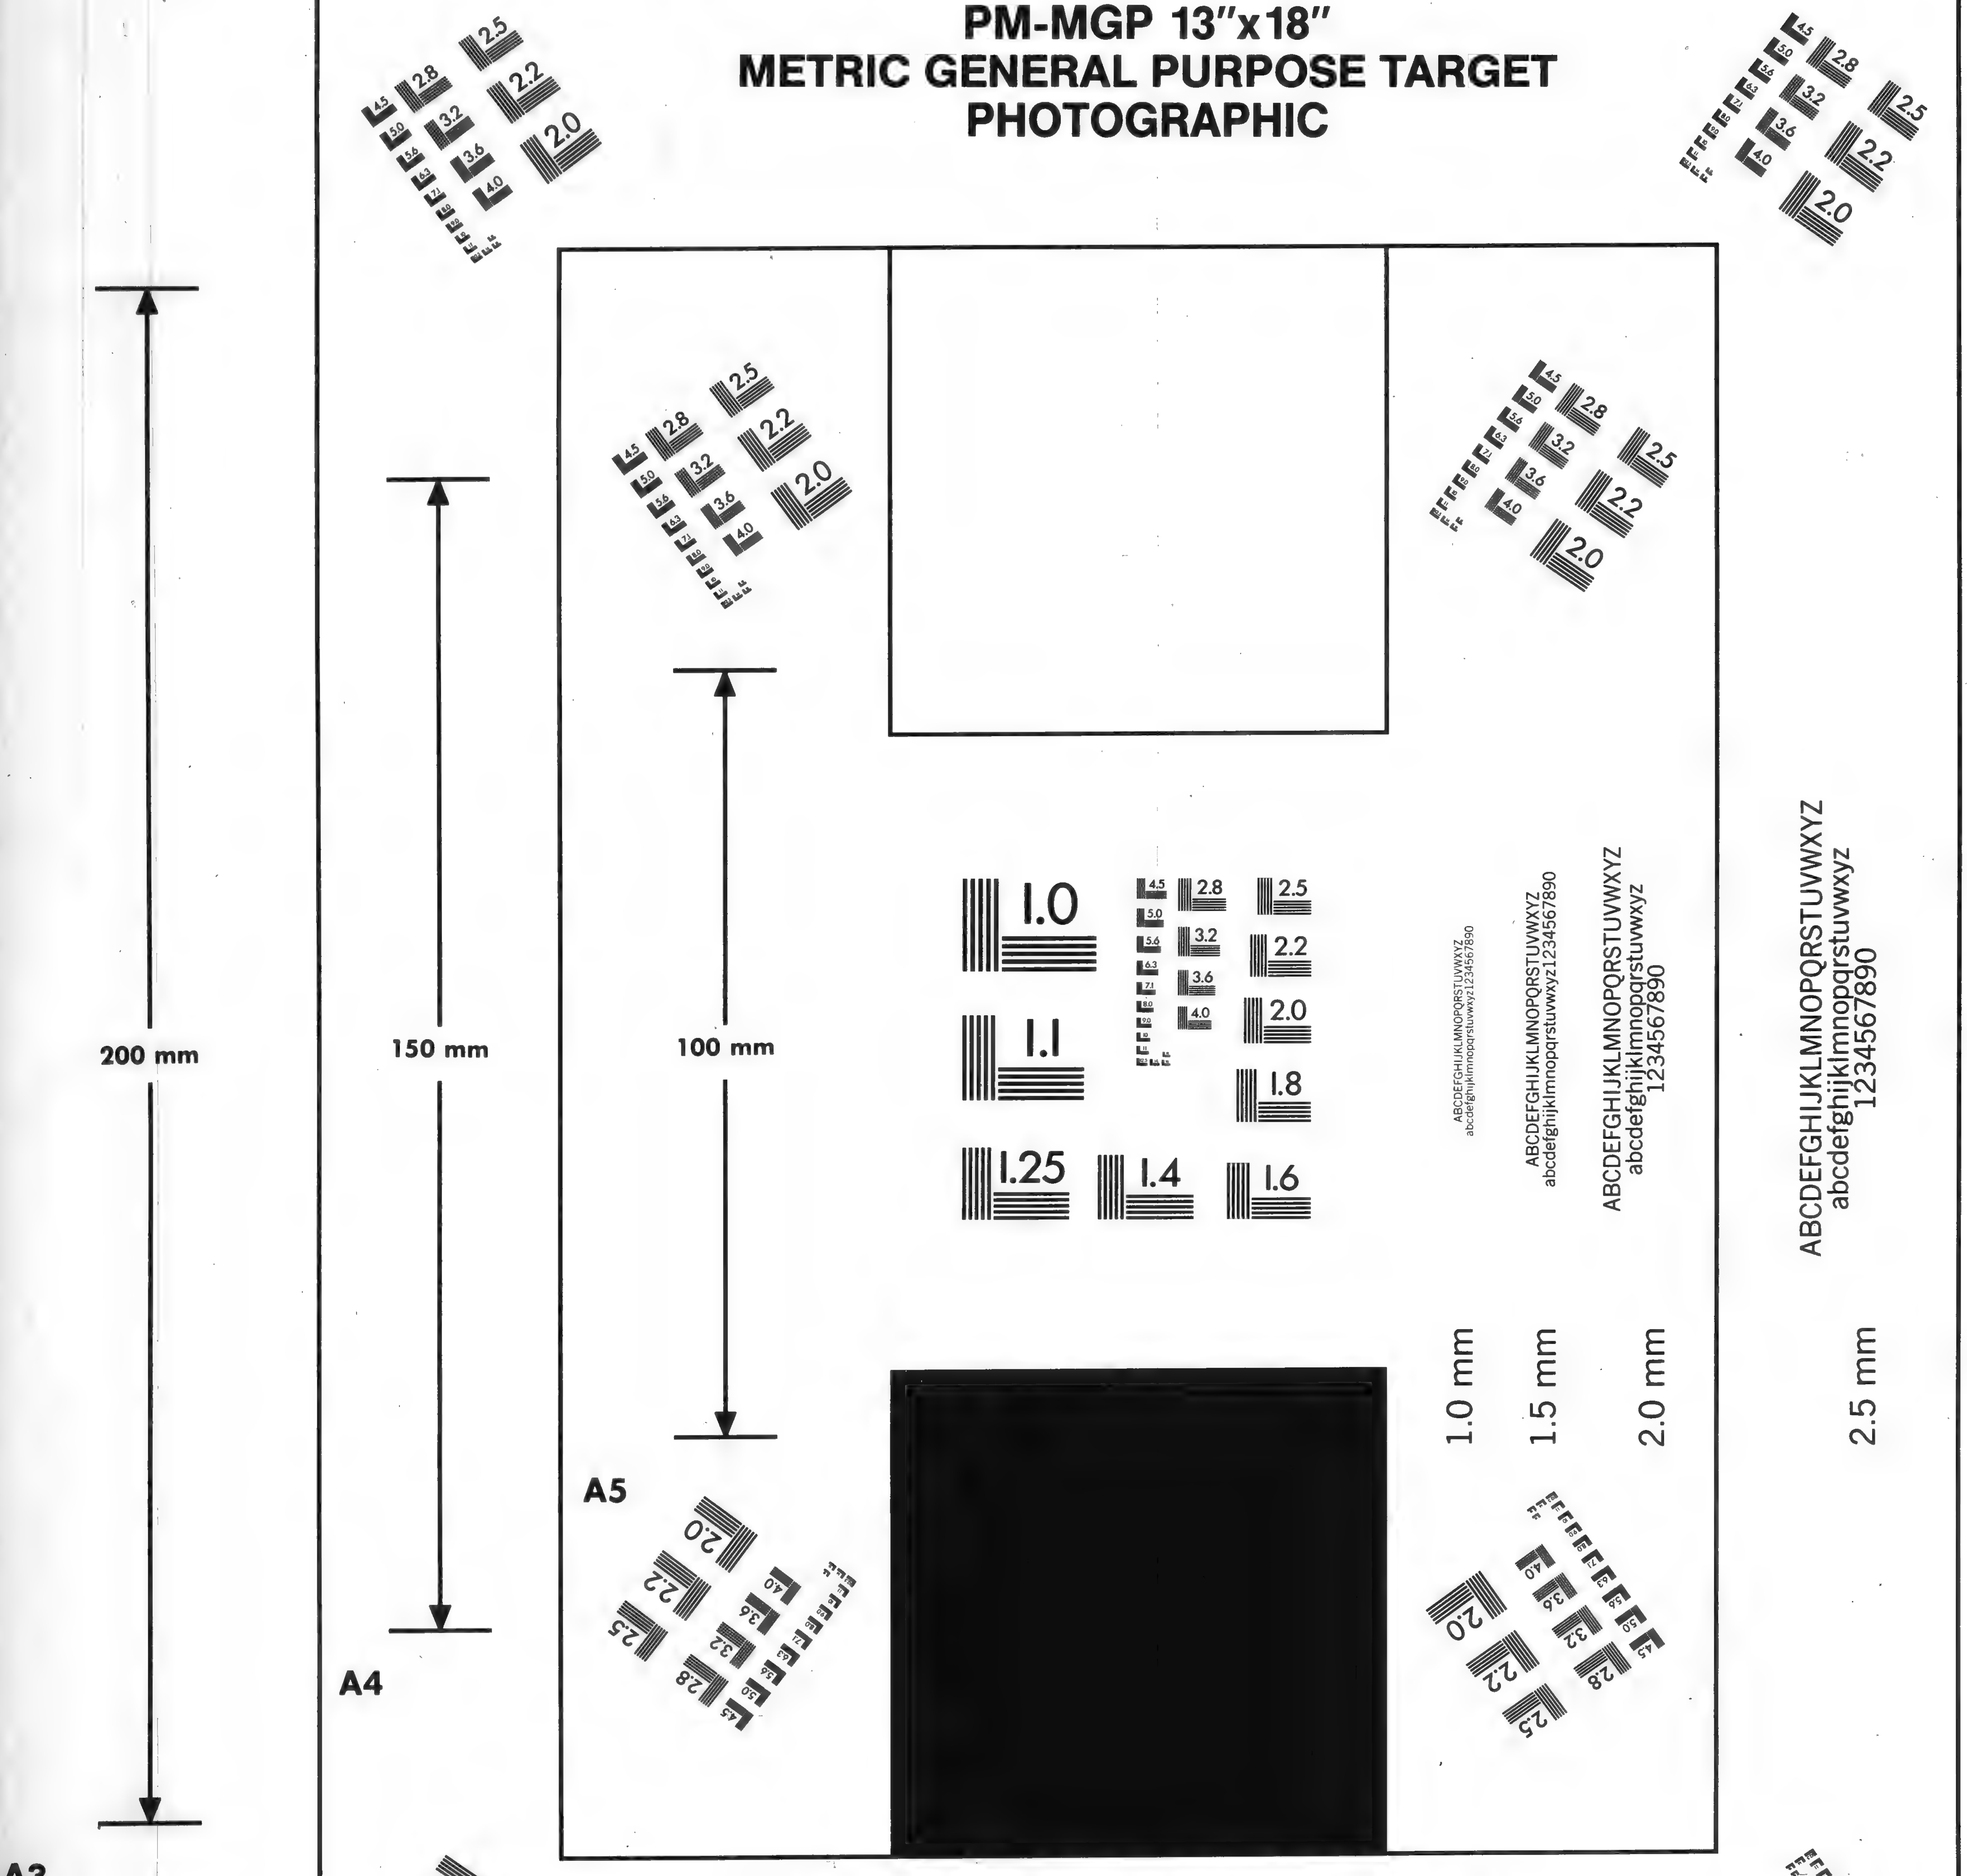
25 Broadway, New York City

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

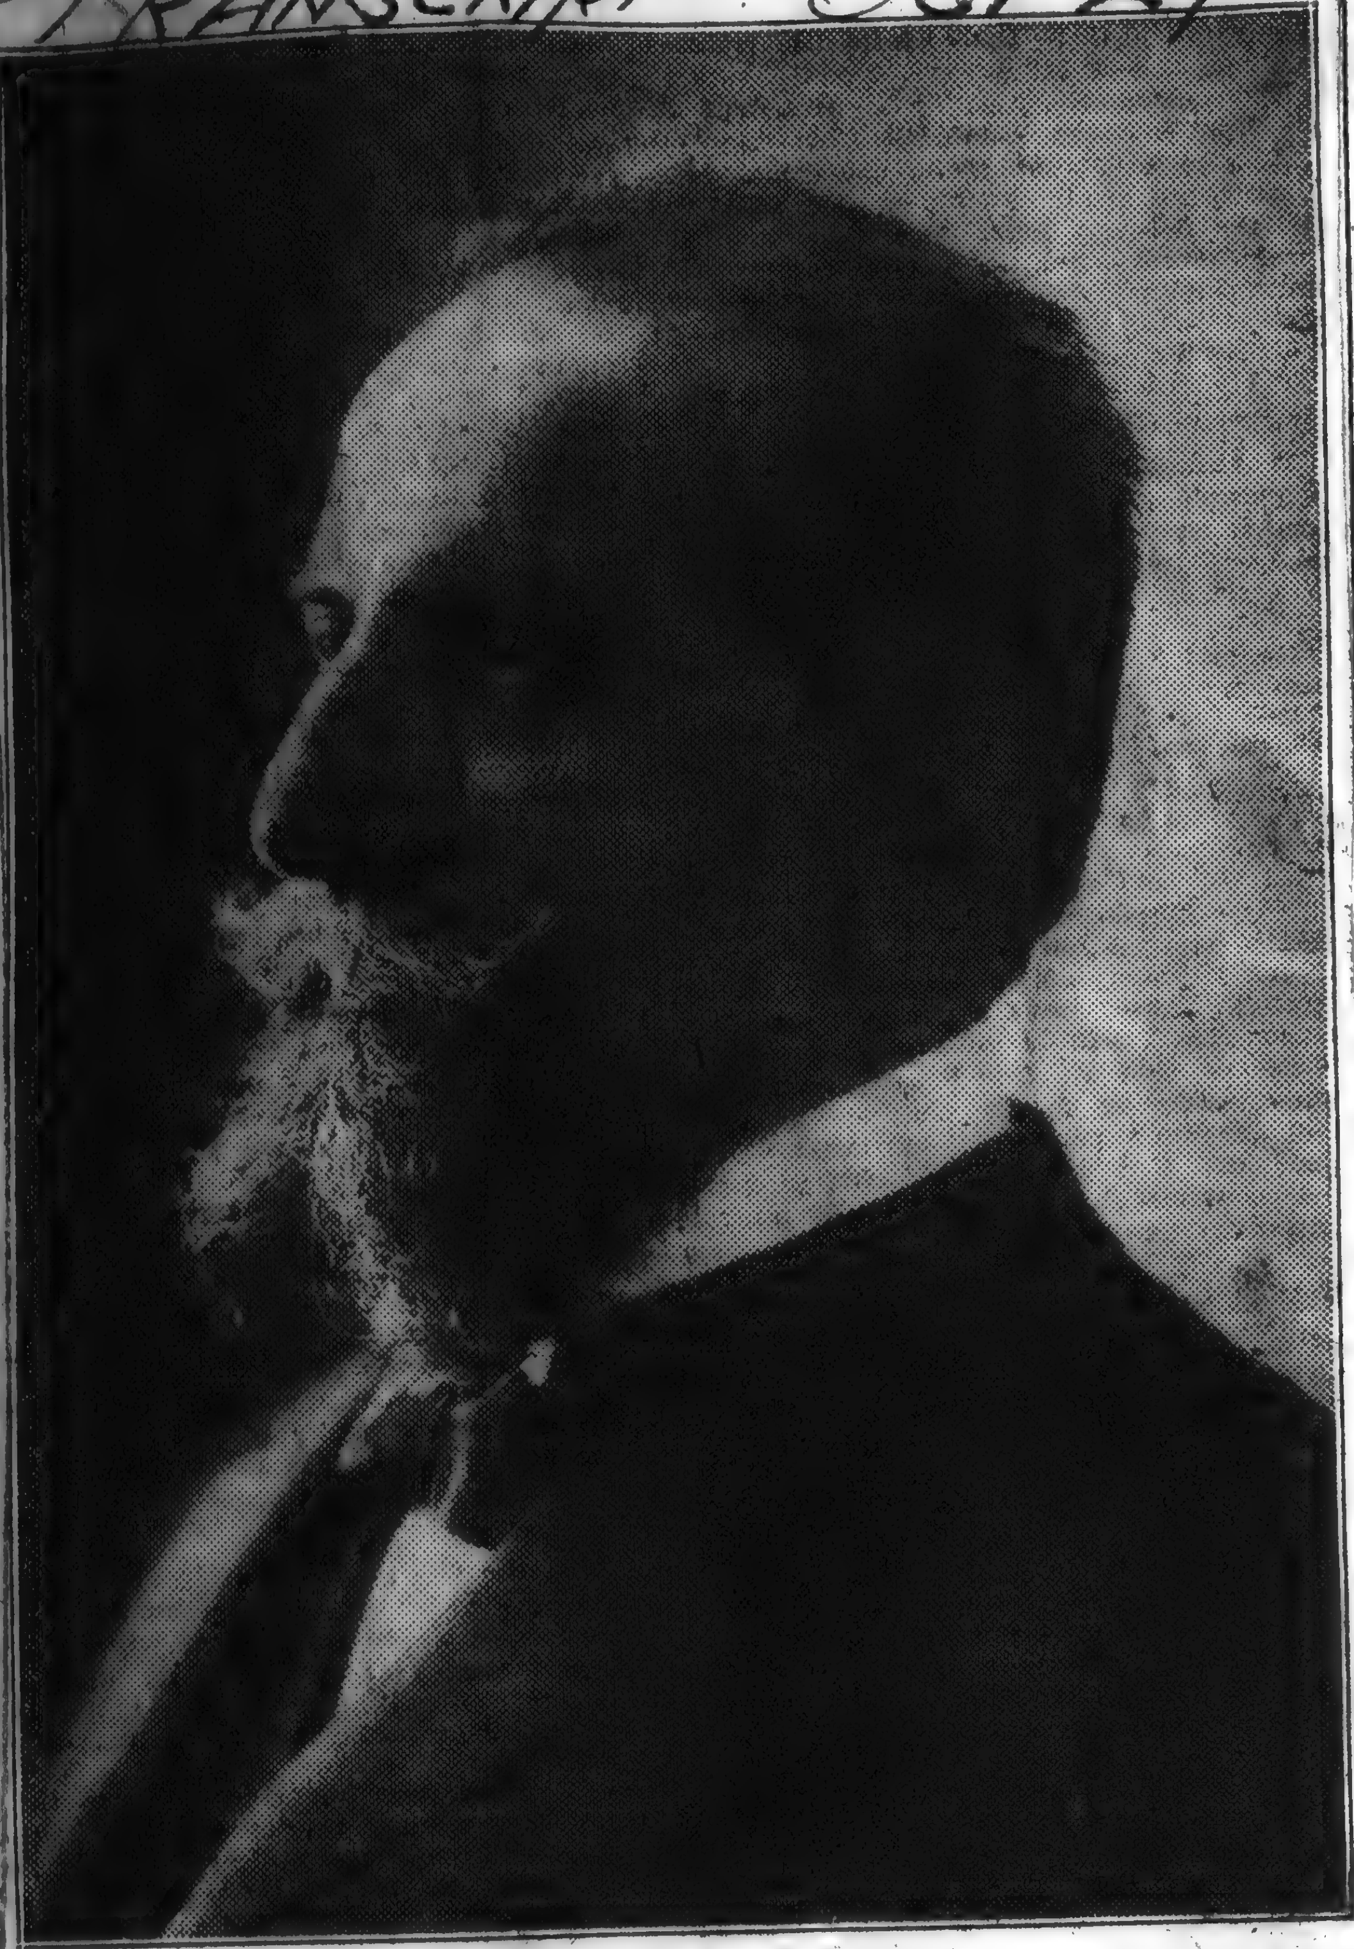
PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Wilhelm Gericke, the Second Conductor of Boston Symphony

Death in Vienna of the Man Long Associated With the Early Progress of a Great Musical Organization

Transcript Oct 29



WILHELM GERICKE is dead. Today a cablegram came from Vienna telling of the death of the man who perhaps as much as any one else made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is today. He died on Tuesday. He had been ill for a long time and so the end was not unexpected. But with the coming of the cablegram gloom was spread throughout Symphony Hall where the strains of Stravinsky's Song of the Nightingale were filling the vast empty spaces of the auditorium as the orchestra was practicing under the magic wand of Koussevitsky. Only a few men are left in the orchestra now who once bent their bows at the direction of the great Gericke but those who knew him played their parts a little more gently, a little more sadly, for the spirit of Gericke still hovers about the building. And in a busy banking house there was cast a veil of silence for a moment when the word came while in a little room at the New England Conservatory tears came to the eyes of a man who was teaching pupils the way to become—perhaps second Gerickes. William C. Endicott was the man in the bank to whom the cablegram came; Timothy Adamowsky the teacher who could not go on with his class, for he was the man whom Gericke brought from abroad to be a part of the orchestra which he conducted in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. In the first years of its existence George Henschel led its difficult way. When the end of his leadership came, Wilhelm Gericke stood at the front of the platform to lead the men through the delightful intricacies of Brahms's waltzes which he played for the audiences of Boston for the first time. Three years ago when they gave a testimonial and benefit concert for the great conductor who was then in exile in Austria and in dire need of funds they played again Gericke's own arrangements of these waltzes. Boston has never regretted this gift which Gericke gave to its vast music loving population.

Early Promise

Wilhelm Gericke was born in Schwanberg, Styria, on the fourteenth of April, 1845. He was not forty years of age when he came to Boston. It was when he was fifteen years old that he first showed signs of having talent for music. His education was almost solely received at the Vienna Conservatory. Here his progress was so complete that upon his graduation he was offered and accepted the position of one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. His training had been of the most exact type. His temperament was such that he loved the classics. To the detail and mastery of technique he devoted much of his attention and when he came to Boston for the first time, the growing orchestra was made to pay strict attention to the mastery of this and the mastery of finesse. After his second concert he remarked to Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra." When, after five years of leading, he left the Boston Symphony it might well have been said: "These are musicians and this is an orchestra."

It was on the evening of Oct. 20, 1884, that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, was in Vienna and heard Gericke conduct. Mr. Higginson attended a concert at the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and so favorable was the impression which the handling of the score in the hands of Gericke made upon Mr. Higginson that immediately negotiations were under way to bring the Austrian to Boston. Two days later arrangements had been made and Gericke was ready to start to America.

Gericke took the men he had when he arrived and did with them the best that he could. A year or more after he first stood at the conductor's desk he reorganized the orchestra. He sent to Vienna, where he found many new and younger men. These he had come to sit on the platform with him. Whether any of those now playing under Koussevitzky are men whom Gericke found could not be learned today.

It has been said that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effect that the composers originally intended for their works. Whether it was Beethoven or Brahms, his beloved Brahms, Mozart or chumann, he always seemed to give it the interpretation which its composer meant it to have, never intrudng sensational effects of his own, never interpreting it in his own individual light.

Gericke was a strong disciplinarian, but as Mr. Timothy Adamowsky today pointed out, there never was a more likable personality at the head of a Boston orchestra. "He was very severe but, oh, he was very kind. Very just and very kind. He really made the Boston Symphony. He brought it to perfection of roundness in sound, he made it mellow, not an assemblage of individualists." But he let such men as iszteman and Leopold Lichtenberg go, whether for disciplinary reasons or for musical reasons it has never been told. The public only knew that they were gone. But in their place came such men as the Messrs. Adamowski and Charles M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel.

Prophets Confounded

When Gericke reorganized his orchestra the musical critics of the city declared that they played well together, but also objected because there was "more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director. They prophesied that the enterprise would die a natural death at the end of the season. This, of course, was all before the present Symphony Hall was built, that edifice being opened in 1900. It might be noted that Gericke was one of the first to introduce Richard Straus—and that the audience walked out on the performance.

But under Mr. Gericke's guidance the fame of the orchestra grew and in the year 1888-89, as M. A. Wolfe Howe's book points out, 112 concerts were given before audiences averaging 2500. In January, 1889, it was publicly announced that the conductor's health was undermined by the New England climate and that he would not return the next season. The choice of his successor was announced. Following a tour in the West as far as St. Louis, he was given a farewell testimonial concert in Boston in May, 1889.

Au Revoir

Of this concert, Louis Elson, the music critic, wrote:

"The enthusiasm which had ben bubbling up all through the evening, found its full vent at the end of the concert. Then the audience rose (as they had done at the beginning of the concert also) and shouted themselves hoarse, while waving of hats and handkerchiefs was carried on even by the most sedate of individuals. Why in the world did not the trumpeters add the climax by blowing a 'Tusch' just here? But everyone was hushed in agreeable surprise when Mr. Gericke squared himself for a struggle with our language, and gave with a charming little speech, all the more delightful because of its naive sentences and evident sincerity. He told the people of Boston how much he appreciated their recognition; he thanked the orchestra for their faithful work, the public for their steady attention; he thanked the Cecilia for assisting at his last concert, and he thanked Mr. Higginson (all Boston, and in some degree all America, may join in this) for the munificence which had made the orchestra what it was, and then he added the single work of parting, 'Farewell.' We can all hope that the last word is premature. Let us compromise the parting, oh, most popular and deserving conductor, on the basis of 'Au revoir.' "

A private farewell took place later at the home of Mrs. Ole Bull at Cambridge. On this memorable occasion an album containing verses by Holmes, Aldrich and others was presented to Mr. Gericke. On the fly-leaf, over the signature of John S. Dwight, appeared these words:

TO THE MAKER OF THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Later Mr. Gericke came back to Boston. In the interim the conductors were Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The former acted in this capacity for four years and the latter was the leader for five.

All Over Again

with a wonderful enthusiasm and devotion. During this second term two important events took place. One was the opening of the new Symphony Hall and the other was the establishment of the pension fund. It was in the winter of 1906 that a misunderstanding arose. There was a failure to agree upon terms by which his contract was to be renewed and in February of that year his resignation was announced. Dr. Karl Muck was his successor.

William Endicott, in the busy offices of Kidder, Peabody & Co., had this to say of Gericke: "He was a charming man. He knew of little but music, but that he knew to his finger tips. I was very fond of him and knew him well. The war hurt Gericke, and, of course, with all the bitterness which attended it, it made of him almost an exile from this land where for thirteen years he had done so much for us. He was very fond of America, too, and had many warm friends here that will miss him more than I can tell."

Proof of the sincerity of Mr. Endicott's statement was the benefit concert which was given him on Dec. 5, 1922 at Symphony Hall. At this concert Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, his own arangements of Brahm's waltzs, Straus's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," all favorites of Gericke, were played to a packed house. A fund was raised and sent to him to help in the difficult years in Vienna. Gericke wrote back a letter of appreciation that is one of the most prized possessions in the archives at Symphony Hall.

Arthur Foote, at Jordan Hall, today summed up the characteristics of the man when he said, "He had the utmost feeling for beauty of tone in an orchestra. His was the fullest artistic conscience. Whether he cared for it or not he would afford one piece of music the same sympathetic treatment that he poured forth into the music which he loved. He was a splendid conductor; whether better than later ones it is not for me to say. He was very uncompromising in his ideals, very quiet by nature, deeply loved by all who knew him."

From Emil Mollenhauer come words that are fitting to end this summary of the great Gericke: "Words cannot express the regret I feel for his passing. Gericke was not only one of the world's great conductors, he was one of the world's great men, in spirit as in deed. I refer especially to the noble quality of his personal honor, the breadth and kindness of his human sympathy. In his leadership he was never the autocrat. He was so sincere a musician, and so able in his profession, that these qualities were always enough to command the respect and close following of his men, without other need of discipline. A musician who did credit to the beauty of music is gone. He will be long admired and long mourned."

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN SIXTH

Post — Oct 24

"Pathetic" Engrossing Under Koussevitzky's Baton

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Outshining even his memorable version of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, at the concert of yesterday afternoon, proved the emotional and musical climax, thus far, of the present Symphony season. And a wildly applauding audience seemed so to regard it.

SERVICE TO COMPOSER

Let those who choose protest the filtration of certain German classics through the conductor's Slavic temperament. There is room here for two opinions. But beyond disputing, Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky, as revealed to us more than once last season, and again yesterday, is the true, the quintessential Tchaikovsky.

To have sat through this extraordinary performance of the "Pathetic" with score in hand would have been here and there to find Mr. Koussevitzky Gildoue-Tchaikovskying Tchaikovsky. Gilding the lily, the cynical might call it. Yet, surely for such service, the composer, had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday, would have returned devout thanks.

Eloquence Is Sound

Would he paint the blackness and bleakness of desolation and despair, would he cry out in protest against our common fate, would he interrupt the music of wordly pleasure with the reminder that Death lurks ever near, or would he seek release in frenzied gaiety?—then and there did Mr. Koussevitzky, and his seconding thrice eloquent orchestra, sharpen and intensify Tchaikovsky's meaning, until the listener was racked or exhilarated, calmed or saddened far beyond the usual experience of hearing music.

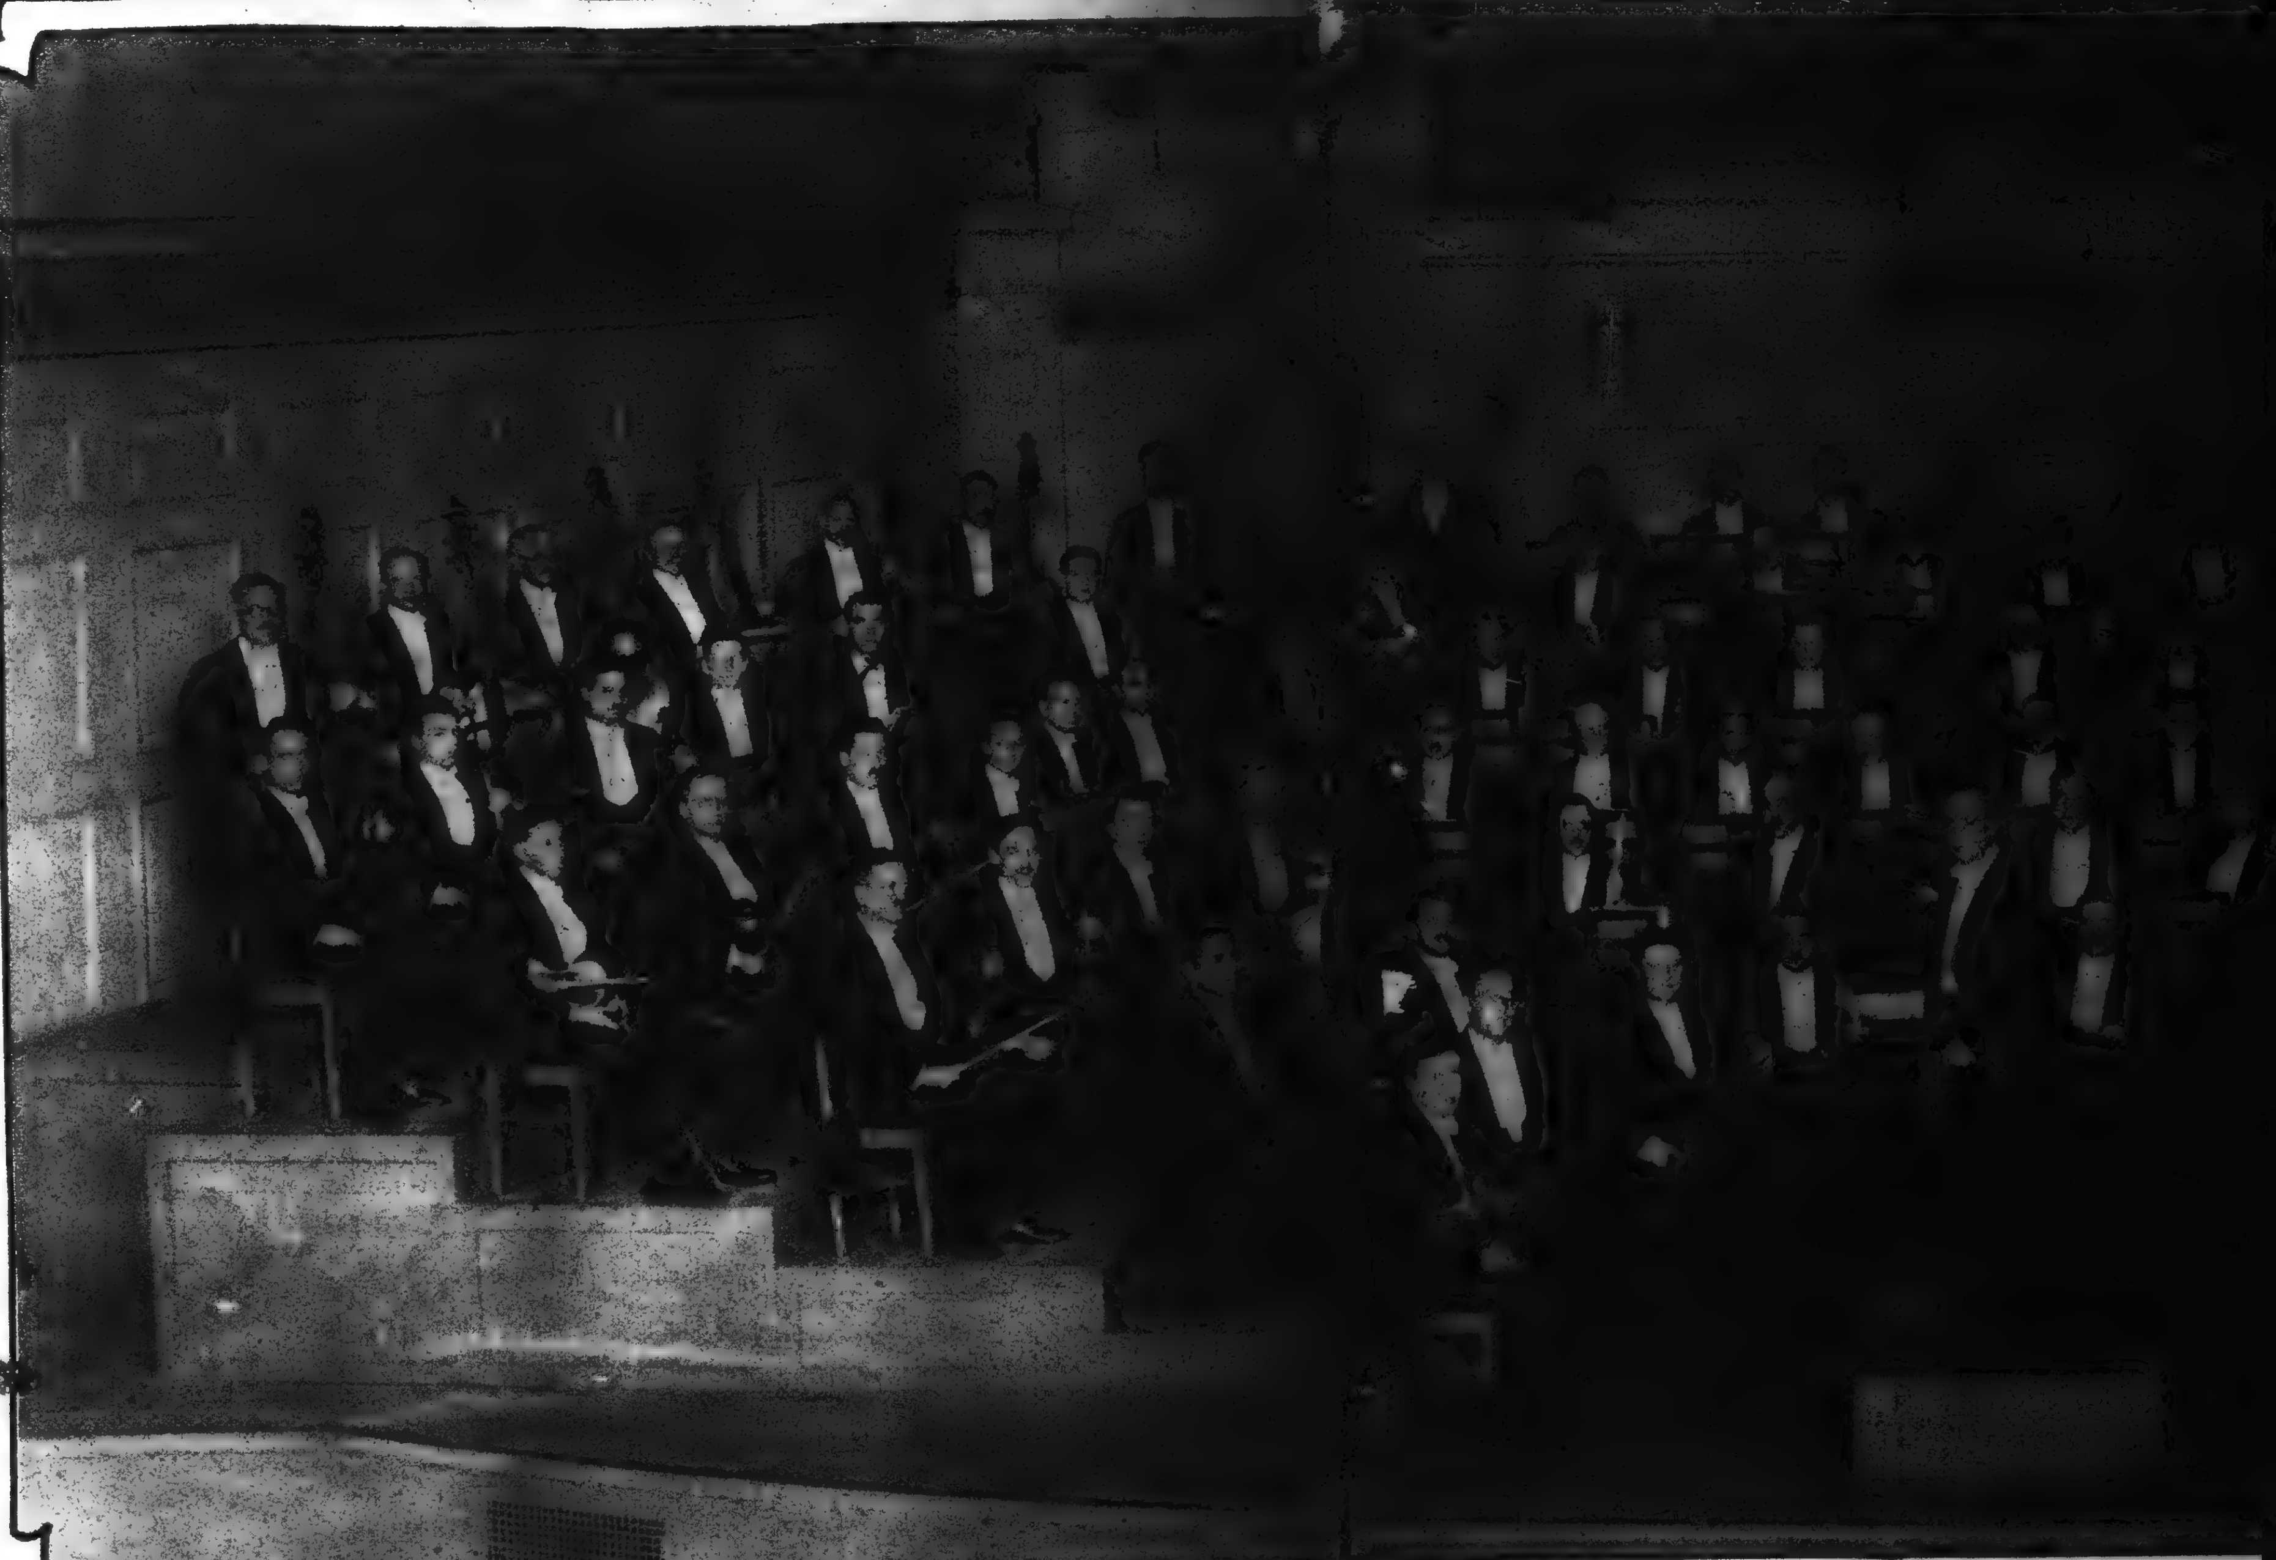
And in passing, let it be noted that the sentimental Tchaikovsky was not underscored. Here Koussevitzky the musician of taste and feeling joined hands with Koussevitzky the dra

---

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION,

THE BOSTON

THE BOSTON SY Y ORCHESTRA LE



The Boston Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky after the opening Saturday evening concert of the 1925-26 s … With each string section … larger than ever before. … the seating arrangement … ll at the left front, but the … that the conductor has all … violas are at the right fron … d the 'cellos are beside th … o the right.
The brass sec … exception of the horns, is … in brilliance.
Since there a … es of Boston concerts, an a … given on five Tuesday afte … ogrammes of the new serie … development of symphonic … of our own day. Below … Koussevitzky, leader of the … (Garo)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Bklyn Life + Activities of Long Is. Society

OCT 31 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY INCREASES BOSTON CONCERTS TO 73—The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1,000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 73 against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York, where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian Conductor of the Orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this same orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, in this vast country, and thus taking Symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky," which have come to be an annual institution and which still from that time to this attract as much attention in Paris as any Symphony concerts. In London every season Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted operas with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous Orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the Orchestra visits, and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Wilhelm Gericke, the Second Conductor of Boston Symphony

Death in Vienna of the Man Long Associated With the Early Progress of a Great Musical Organization

Transcript Oct 29

WILHELM GERICKE is dead Today a cablegram came from Vienna telling of the death of the man who perhaps as much as any one else made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is today. H died on Tuesday. He had been ill for a long time and so the end was not unexpected. But with the coming of the cablegram gloom was spread throughout Symphony Hall where the strains of Stravinsky's Song of the Nightingale were filling the vast empty spaces of the auditorium as the orchestra was practicing under the magic wand of Koussevitsky. Only a few men are left in the orchestra now who once bent their bows at the direction of the great Gericke but those who knew him played their parts a little more gently, a little more sadly, for the spirit of Gericke still hovers about the building. And in a busy banking house there was cast a veil of silence for a moment when the word came while in a little room at the New England Conservatory tears came to the eyes of a man who was teaching pupils the way to become—perhaps second Gerickes. William C. Endicott was the man in the bank to whom the cablegram came; Timothy Adamowsky the teacher who could not go on with his class, for he was the man whom Gericke brought from abroad to be, a part of the orchestra which he conducted in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. In the first years of its existence George Henschel led its difficult way. When the end of his leadership came, Wilhelm Gericke stood at the front of the platform to lead the men through the delightful intricacies of Brahms's waltzes which he played for the audiences of Boston for the first time. Three years ago when they gave a testimonial and benefit concert for the great conductor who was then in exile in Austria and in dire need of funds they played again Gericke's own arrangements of these waltzes. Boston has never regretted this gift which Gericke gave to its vast music loving population.

Early Promise

Wilhelm Gericke was born in Schwanberg, Styria, on the fourteenth of April, 1845. He was not forty years of age when he came to Boston. It was when he was fifteen years old that he first showed signs of having talent for music. His education was almost solely received at the Vienna Conservatory. Here his progress was so complete that upon his graduation he was offered and accepted the position of one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. His training had been of the most exact type. His temperament was such that he loved the classics. To the detail and mastery of technique he devoted much of his attention and when he came to Boston for the first time, the growing orchestra was made to pay strict attention to the mastery of this and the mastery of finesse. After his second concert he remarked to Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra." When, after five years of leading, he left the Boston Symphony it might well have been said: "These are musicians and this is an orchestra."

It was on the evening of Oct. 20, 1884, that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, was in Vienna and heard Gericke conduct. Mr. Higginson attended a concert at the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and so favorable was the impression which the handling of the score in the hands of Gericke made upon Mr. Higginson that immediately negotiations were under way to bring the Austrian to Boston. Two days later arrangements had been made and Gericke was ready to start to America.

Gericke took the men he had when he arrived and did with them the best that he could. A year or more after he first stood at the conductor's desk he reorganized the orchestra. He sent to Vienna, where he found many new and younger men. These he had come to sit on the platform with him. Whether any of those now playing under Koussevitsky are men whom Gericke found could not be learned today.

It has been said that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effect that the composers originally intended for their works. Whether it was Beethoven or Brahms, his beloved Brahms, Mozart or Schumann, he always seemed to give it the interpretation which its composer meant it to have, never intruding sensational effects of his own, never interpreting it in his own individual light.

Gericke was a strong disciplinarian, but as Mr. Timothy Adamowsky today pointed out, there never was a more likable personality at the head of a Boston orchestra. "He was very severe but, oh, he was very kind. Very just and very kind. He really made the Boston Symphony. He brought it to perfection of roundness in sound, he made it mellow, not an assemblage of individualists." But he let such men as Listeman and Leopold Lichtenberg go, whether for disciplinary reasons or for musical reasons it has never been told. The public only knew that they were gone. But in their place came such men as the Messrs. Adamowski and Charles M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel.

Prophets Confounded

When Gericke reorganized his orchestra the musical critics of the city declared that they played well together, but also objected because there was "more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director. They prophesied that the enterprise would die a natural death at the end of the season. This, of course, was all before the present Symphony Hall was built, that edifice being opened in 1900. It might be noted that Gericke was one of the first to introduce Richard Straus—and that the audience walked out on the performance.

But under Mr. Gericke's guidance the fame of the orchestra grew and in the year 1888-89, as M. A. Wolfe Howe's book points out, 112 concerts were given before audiences averaging 2500. In January, 1889, it was publicly announced that the conductor's health was undermined by the New England climate and that he would not return the next season. The choice of his successor was announced. Following a tour in the West as far as St. Louis, he was given a farewell testimonial concert in Boston in May, 1889.

Au Revoir

Of this concert, Louis Elson, the music critic, wrote:

"The enthusiasm which had ben bubbling up all through the evening, found its full vent at the end of the concert. Then the audience rose (as they had done at the beginning of the concert also) and shouted themselves hoarse, while waving of hats and handkerchiefs was carried on even by the most sedate of individuals. Why in the world did not the trumpeters add the climax by blowing a 'Tusch' just here? But everyone was hushed in agreeable surprise when Mr. Gericke squared himself for a struggle with our language, and gave [illegible] a charming little speech, all the mo- [illegible] tful because of its naive senten- [illegible] of Boston how much he appreciated their recognition; he thanked the orchestra for their faithful work, the public for their steady attention; he thanked the Cecilia for assisting at his last concert, and he thanked Mr. Higginson (all Boston, and in some degree all America, may join in this) for the munificence which had made the orchestra what it was, and then he added the single work of parting, 'Farewell.' We can all hope that the last word is premature. Let us compromise the parting, oh, most popular and deserving conductor, on the basis of 'Au revoir.'"

A private farewell took place later at the home of Mrs. Ole Bull at Cambridge. On this memorable occasion an album containing verses by Holmes, Aldrich and others was presented to Mr. Gericke. On the fly-leaf, over the signature of John S. Dwight, appeared these words:

TO THE MAKER OF THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Later Mr. Gericke came back to Boston. In the interim the conductors were Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The former acted in this capacity for four years and the latter was the leader for five.

with a wonderful enthusiasm and devotion. During this second term two important events took place. One was the opening of the new Symphony Hall and the other was the establishment of the pension fund It was in the winter of 1906 that a misunderstanding arose. There was a failure to agree upon terms by which his contract was to be renewed and in February of that year his resignation was announced. Dr. Karl Muck was his successor.

William Endicott, in the busy offices of Kidder, Peabody & Co., had this to say of Gericke: "He was a charming man. He knew of little but music, but that he knew to his finger tips. I was very fond of him and knew him well. The war hurt Gericke, and, of course, with all the bitterness which attended it, it made of him almost an exile from this land where for thirteen years he had done so much for us. He was very fond of America, too, and had many warm friends here that will miss him more than I can tell."

Proof of the sincerity of Mr. Endicott's statement was the benefit concert which was given him on Dec. 5, 1922 at Symphony Hall. At this concert Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, his own arangements of Brahm's waltzs, Straus's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," all favorites of Gericke, were played to a packed house. A fund was raised an sent to him to help in the difficult year in Vienna. Gericke wrote back a letter of appreciation that is one of the most prized possessions in the archives at Symphony Hall.

Arthur Foote, at Jordan Hall, today summed up the characteristics of the man when he said, "He had the utmost feeling for beauty of tone in an orchestra. His was the fullest artistic conscience. Whether he cared for it or not he would afford one piece of music the same sympathetic treatment that he poured forth into the music which he loved. He was a splendid conductor; whether better than later ones it is not for me to say. He was very uncompromising in his ideals, very quiet by nature, deeply loved by all who knew him."

From Emil Mollenhauer come words that are fitting to end this summary of the great Gericke: "Words cannot express the regret I feel for his passing. Gericke was not only one of the world's great conductors, he was one of the world's great men, in spirit as in deed. I refer especially to the noble quality of his personal honor, the breadth and kindness of his human sympathy. In his leadership he was never the autocrat. He was so sincere a musician, and so able in his profession, that these qualities were always enough to command the respect and close following of his men, without other need of discipline. A musician who did credit to the beauty of music is gone. He will be long admired and long mourned."

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN SIXTH

Post — Oct 24

"Pathetic" Engrossing Under Koussevitzky's Baton

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Outshining even his memorable version of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, at the concert of yesterday afternoon, proved the emotional and musical climax, thus far, of the present Symphony season. And a wildly applauding audience seemed so to regard it.

SERVICE TO COMPOSER

Let those who choose protest the filtration of certain German classics through the conductor's Slavic temperament. There is room here for two opinions. But beyond disputing, Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky, as revealed to us more than once last season, and again yesterday, is the true, the quintessential Tchaikovsky.

To have sat through this extraordinary performance of the "Pathetic" with score in hand would have been here and there to find Mr. Koussevitzky Gildoue-Tchaikovskying Tchaikovsky. Gilding the lily, the cynical might call it. Yet, surely for such service, the composer, had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday, would have returned devout thanks.

Eloquence Is Sound

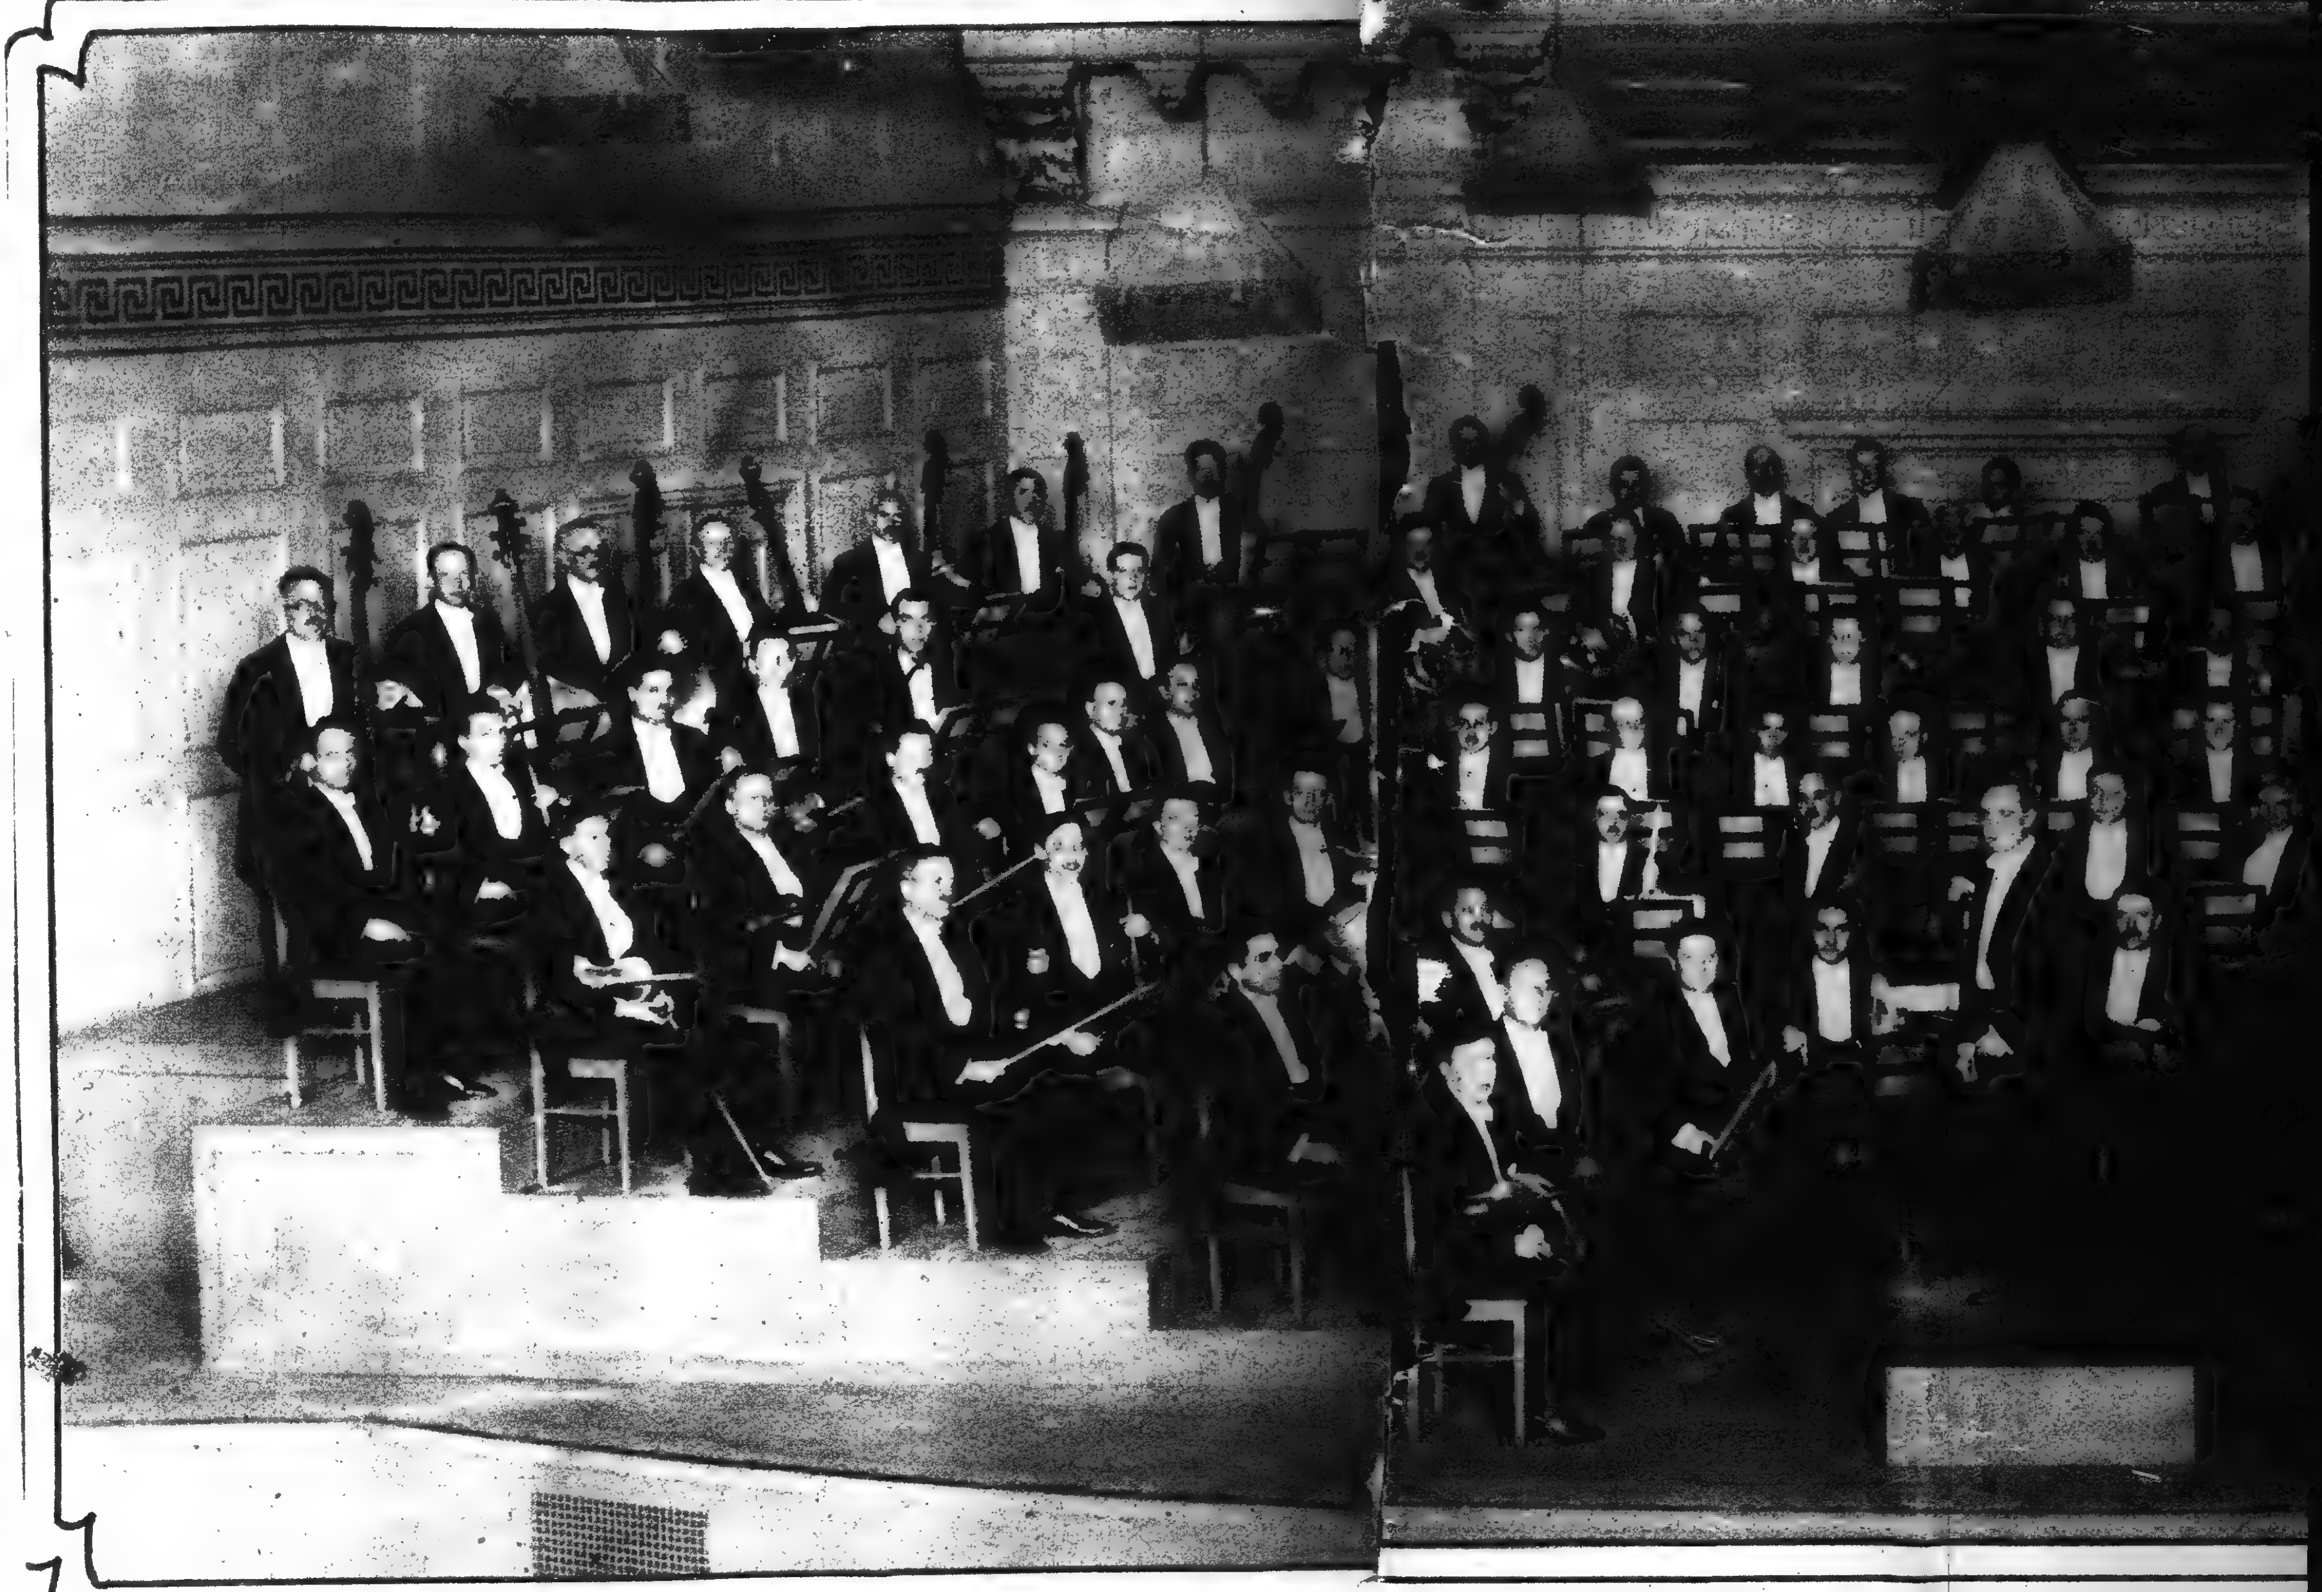
Would he paint the blackness and bleakness of desolation and despair, would he cry out in protest against our common fate, would he interrupt the music of wordly pleasure with the reminder that Death lurks ever near, or would he seek release in frenzied gaiety?—then and there did Mr. Koussevitzky, and his seconding thrice eloquent orchestra, sharpen and intensify Tchaikovsky's meaning until the listener was racked or exhilarated, calmed or saddened far beyond the usual experience of hearing music.

And in passing, let it be noted that the sentimental Tchaikovsky was not underscored. Here Koussevitzky the musician of taste and feeling joined [illegible]

THE BOSTON HE

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION,

THE BOSTON SY Y ORCHESTRA LE



The Boston Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky, after the opening Saturday evening concert of the 1925-26 season, on the stage of Symphony hall. With each string section increased, the personnel this season is larger than ever before. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. The brass section, formerly at the right rear with the exception of the horns, is now at the centre rear, thereby gaining in brilliance. Since there are waiting lists for each of the three series of Boston concerts, an additional series is now announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning December 1. The programmes of the new series will be in historical order to show the development of symphonic music from its earliest stages to the style of our own day. Below is shown a recent photograph of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. (Garo)

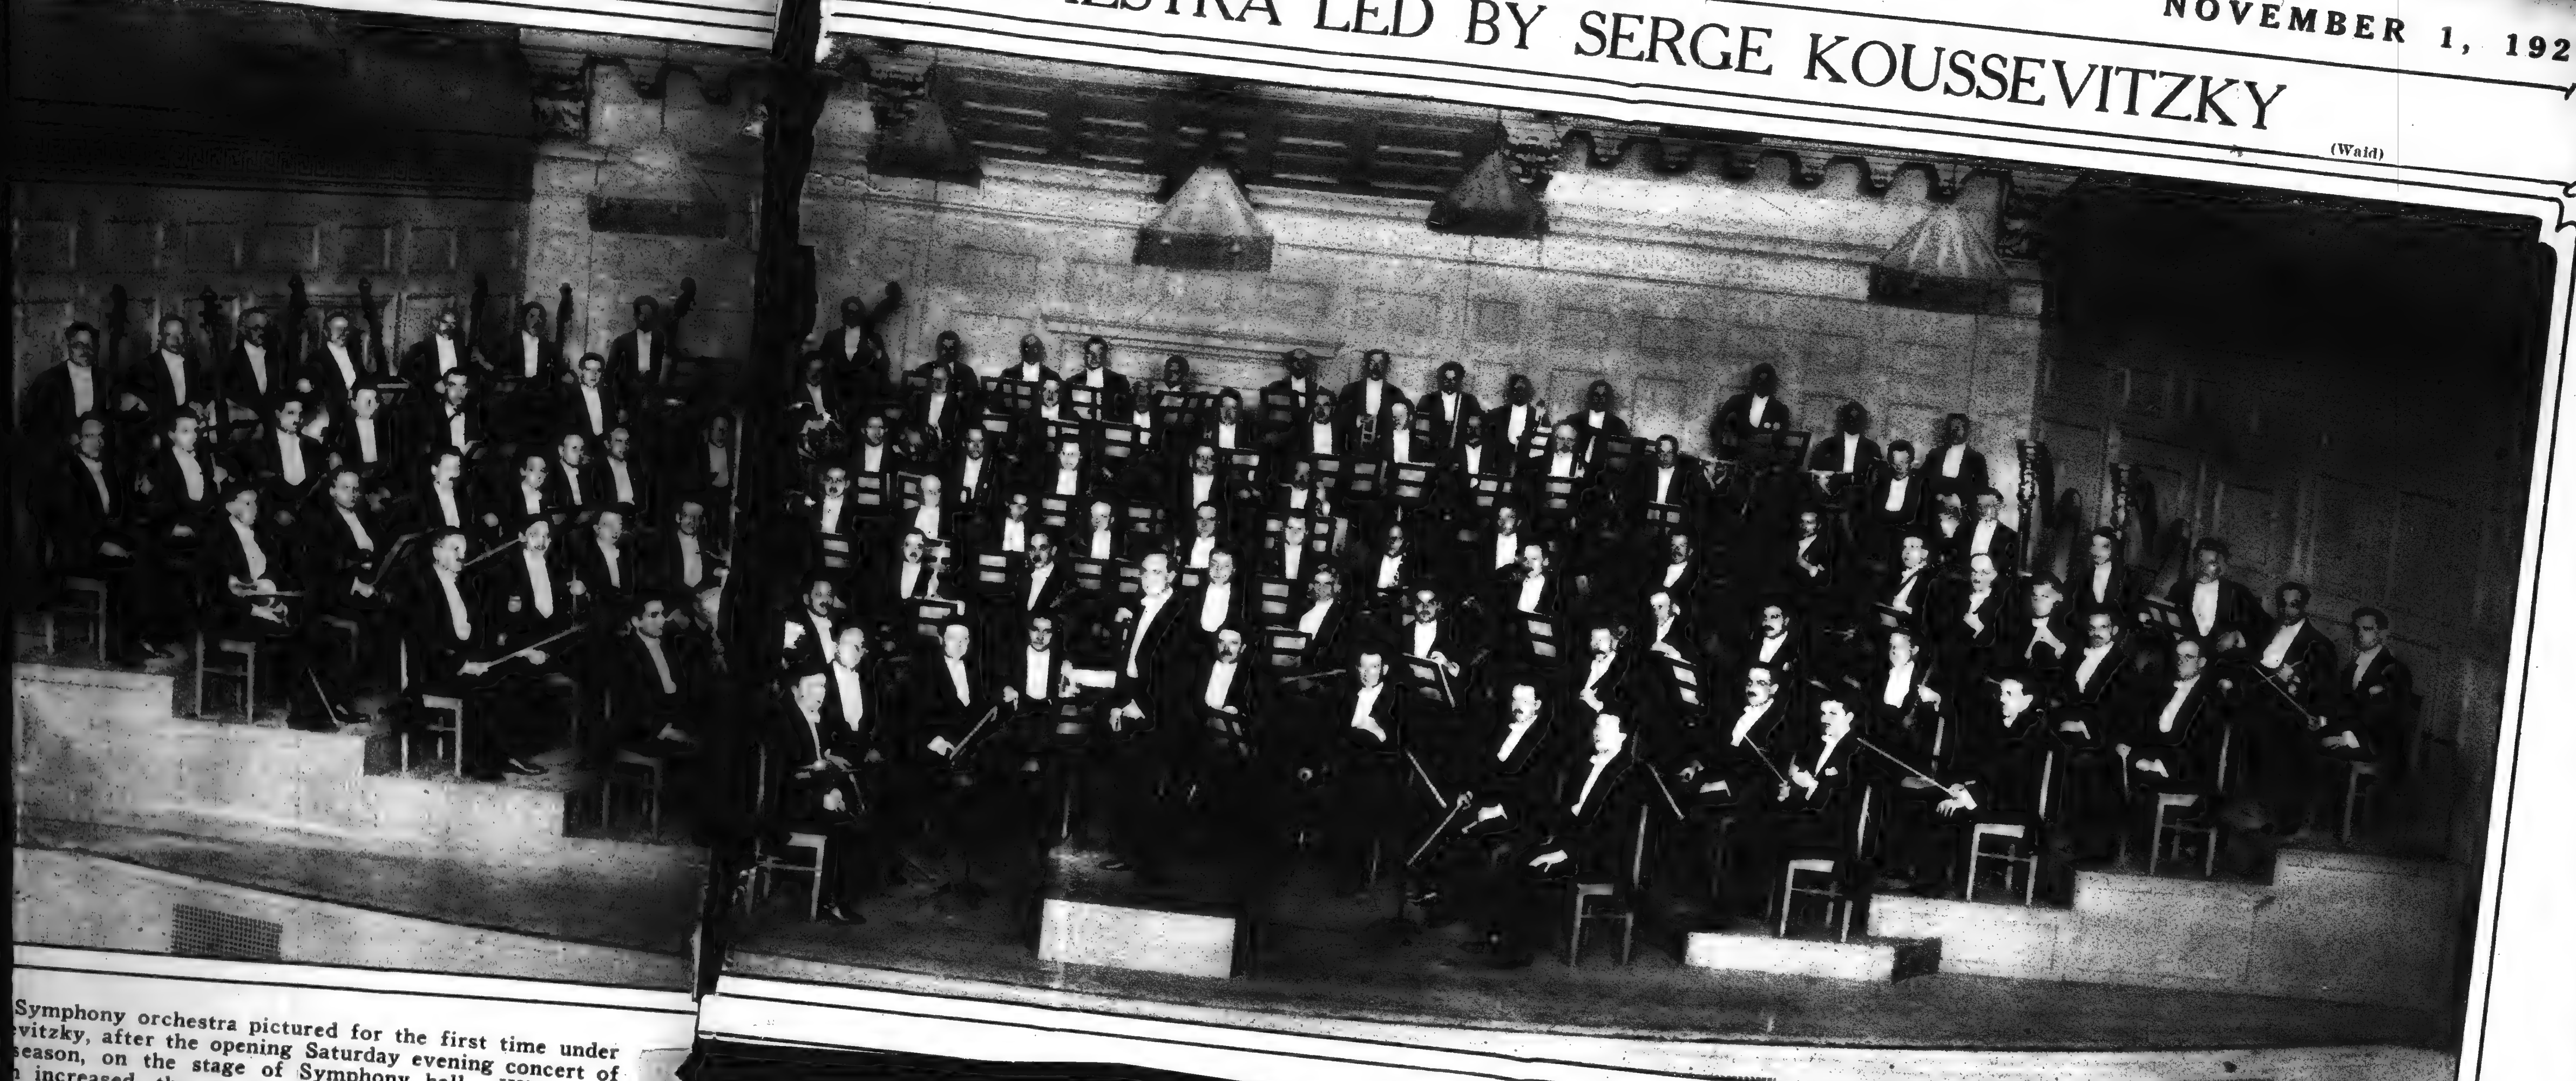
FOR those who wish to enjoy music in its finest form. Who wish to be known as musically cultured; who wish their home to be known as a place of deli atmosphere and ment.

Established 1857
JOHN FEITNER
Designers and Builders
Monuments & Mausoleums
Work Done in All Cemeteries
24th & 25th Street Near 5th Ave., Brooklyn, N.Y.
Tel. South 0534

FRANK M. McCURDY CO.
INCORPORATED
Real Estate Sold Quickly
21 Years' Experience
158 REMSEN STREET
Phones: Main 5906, 5907, 1695

Butler's
2-4 Degraw Street
BROOKLYN
BONDED—FREE—WATERFRONT—STORES

THE BOSTON SYM Y ORCHESTRA LED BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY



(Wald)

Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under vitzky, after the opening Saturday evening concert of season, on the stage of Symphony hall. With each increased, the personnel this season is larger than Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating of the orchestra. The first violins are still at the left second violin section is beside them, so that the con-of the violins massed at his left. The violas are at
, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos
e violas. The harps are now shifted to the right.
ion, formerly at the right rear with the exception of ow at the centre rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.
waiting lists for each of the three series of Boston ditional series is now announced to be given on five noons, beginning December 1. The programmes of will be in historical order to show the development music from its earliest stages to the style of our own shown a recent photograph of Serge Koussevitzky, oston Symphony orchestra.

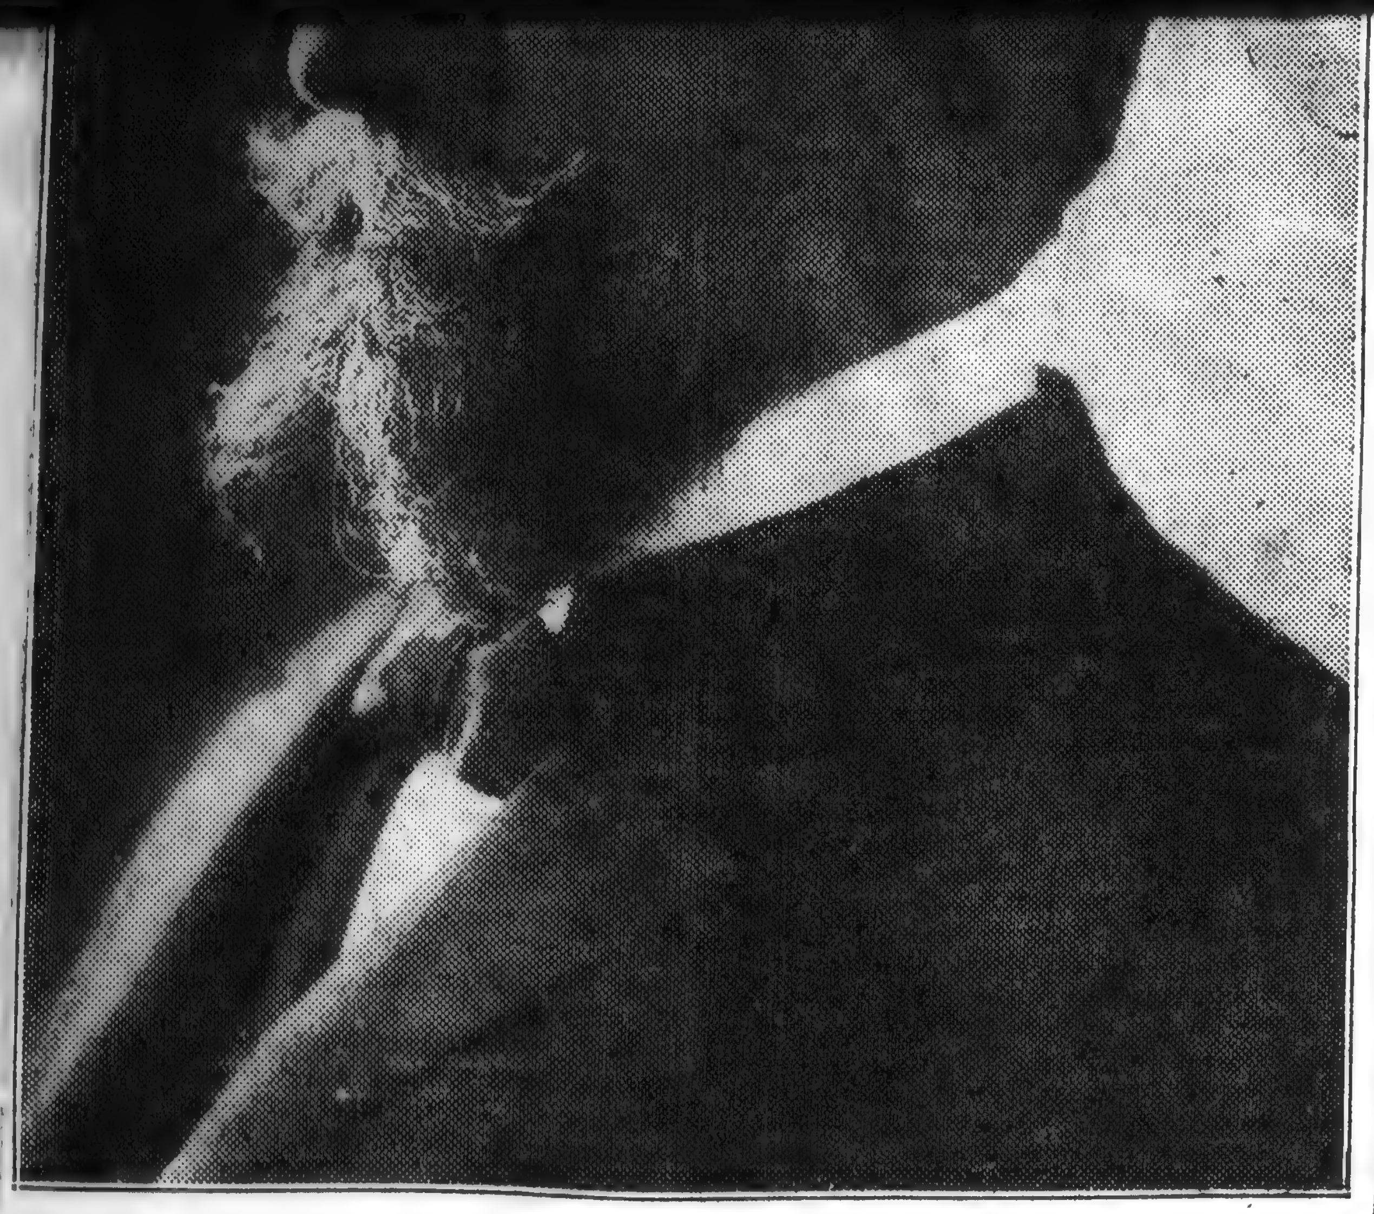
(Garo)



WILHELM GERICKE is dead Today a cablegram came from Vienna telling of the death of the man who perhaps as much as any one else made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is today. He died on Tuesday. He had been ill for a long time and so the end was not unexpected. But with the coming of the cablegram gloom was spread throughout Symphony Hall where the strains of Stravinsky's Song of the Nightingale were filling the vast empty spaces of the auditorium as the orchestra was practicing under the magic wand of Koussevitsky. Only a few men are left in the orchestra now who once bent their bows at the direction of the great Gericke but those who knew him played their parts a little more gently, a little more sadly, for the spirit of Gericke still hovers about the building. And in a busy banking house there was cast a veil of silence for a moment when the word came while in a little room at the New England Conservatory tears came to the eyes of a man who was teaching pupils the way to become—perhaps second Gerickes. William C. Endicott was the man in the bank to whom the cablegram came; Timothy Adamowsky the teacher who could not go on with his class, for he was the man whom Gericke brought from abroad to be, a part of the orchestra which he conducted in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. In the first years of its existence George Henschel led its difficult way. When the end of his leadership came, Wilhelm Gericke stood at the front of the platform to lead the men through the delightful intricacies of Brahms's waltzes which he played for the audiences of Boston for the first time. Three years ago when they gave a testimonial and benefit concert for the great conductor who was then in exile in Austria and in dire need of funds they played again Gericke's own arrangements of these waltzes. Boston has never regretted this gift which Gericke gave to its vast music loving population.

Early Promise

Wilhelm Gericke was born in Schwanberg, Styria, on the fourteenth of April, 1845. He was not forty years of age when he came to Boston. It was when he was fifteen years old that he first showed signs of having talent for music. His education was almost solely received at the Vienna Conservatory. Here his progress was so complete that upon his graduation he was offered and accepted the position of one of the three leaders of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. His training had been of the most exact type. His temperament was such that he loved the classics. To the detail and mastery of technique he devoted much of his attention and when he came to Boston for the first time, the growing orchestra was made to pay strict attention to the mastery of this and the mastery of finesse. After his second concert he remarked to Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra." When, after five years of leading, he left the Boston Symphony it might well have been said: "These are musicians and this is an orchestra."

It was on the evening of Oct. 20, 1884, that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, was in Vienna and heard Gericke conduct. Mr. Higginson attended a concert at the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and so favorable was the impression which the handling of the score in the hands of Gericke made upon Mr. Higginson that immediately negotiations were under way to bring the Austrian to Boston. Two days later arrangements had been made and Gericke was ready to start to America.

Gericke took the men he had when he arrived and did with them the best that he could. A year or more after he first stood at the conductor's desk he reorganized the orchestra. He sent to Vienna, where he found many new and younger men. These he had come to sit on the platform with him. Whether any of those now playing under Koussevitsky are men whom Gericke found could not be learned today. Timothy and Josef Adamowsky of the New England Conservatory of Music were two of those whom Gericke imported, and two who will mourn the most at his passing.

Not a Nationalist

During his first stay in Boston Gericke proved himself an eclectic, selecting whenever it was possible, the music which at the time was generally considered the best. He was not an explorer into strange musical domains, preferring to choose music that time had proved worthy of the name classic. But he was not a nationalist, Italian, German, English, Russian, it made little difference to him. His one object was to choose worthy composers.

It has been said that few conductors anywhere were better able to produce the effect that the composers originally intended for their works. Whether it was Beethoven or Brahms, his beloved Brahms, Mozart or Schumann, he always seemed to give it the interpretation which its composer meant it to have, never intruding sensational effects of his own, never interpreting it in his own individual light.

Gericke was a strong disciplinarian, but as Mr. Timothy Adamowsky today pointed out, there never was a more likable personality at the head of a Boston orchestra. "He was very severe but, oh, he was very kind. Very just and very kind. He really made the Boston Symphony. He brought it to perfection of roundness in sound, he made it mellow, not an assemblage of individualists." But he let such men as Liszteman and Leopold Lichtenberg go, whether for disciplinary reasons or for musical reasons it has never been told. The public only knew that they were gone. But in their place came such men as the Messrs. Adamowski and Charles M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel.

Prophets Confounded

When Gericke reorganized his orchestra the musical critics of the city declared that they played well together, but also objected because there was "more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director. They prophesied that the enterprise would die a natural death at the end of the season. This, of course, was all before the present Symphony Hall was built, that edifice being opened in 1900. It might be noted that Gericke was one of the first to introduce Richard Straus—and that the audience walked out on the performance.

But under Mr. Gericke's guidance the fame of the orchestra grew and in the year 1888-89, as M. A. Wolfe Howe's book points out, 112 concerts were given before audiences averaging 2500. In January, 1889, it was publicly announced that the conductor's health was undermined by the New England climate and that he would not return the next season. The choice of his successor was announced. Following a tour in the West as far as St. Louis, he was given a farewell testimonial concert in Boston in May, 1889.

Au Revoir

Of this concert, Louis Elson, the music critic, wrote:

"The enthusiasm which had ben bubbling up all through the evening, found its full vent at the end of the concert. Then the audience rose (as they had done at the beginning of the concert also) and shouted themselves hoarse, while waving of hats and handkerchiefs was carried on even by the most sedate of individuals. Why in the world did not the trumpeters add the climax by blowing a 'Tusch' just here? But everyone was hushed in agreeable surprise when Mr. Gericke squared himself for a struggle with our language, and gave forth a charming little speech, all the more [illegible]tful because of its naive senten[illegible] and evident sincerity. He told the people of Boston how much he appreciated their recognition; he thanked the orchestra for their faithful work, the public for their steady attention; he thanked the Cecilia for assisting at his last concert, and he thanked Mr. Higginson (all Boston, and in some degree all America, may join in this) for the munificence which had made the orchestra what it was, and then he added the single work of parting, 'Farewell.' We can all hope that the last word is premature. Let us compromise the parting, oh, most popular and deserving conductor, on the basis of 'Au revoir.'"

A private farewell took place later at the home of Mrs. Ole Bull at Cambridge. On this memorable occasion an album containing verses by Holmes, Aldrich and others was presented to Mr. Gericke. On the fly-leaf, over the signature of John S. Dwight, appeared these words:

To THE MAKER OF THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Later Mr. Gericke came back to Boston. In the interim the conductors were Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The former acted in this capacity for four years and the latter was the leader for five.

Start All Over Again

Mr. Gericke found new conditions when he returned. Players had come and gone in the nine-year interim and new human material for Gericke to mould to his whims confronted him. The world of music had, too, undergone changes and, as Mr. Howe points out, the conductorship of Nikisch and Baur had done much to broaden the outlook of American audiences.

Many objected to Gericke's choice of music and felt that he too often gave them the familiar, the classic. But he heeded these complaints and near the end of his second term more and more showed sympathy with the moderns and played them was the fullest artistic conscience. Whether he cared for it or not he would afford one piece of music the same sympathetic treatment that he poured forth into the music which he loved. He was a splendid conductor; whether better than later ones it is not for me to say. He was very uncompromising in his ideals, very quiet by nature, deeply loved by all who knew him."

From Emil Mollenhauer come words that are fitting to end this summary of the great Gericke: "Words cannot express the regret I feel for his passing. Gericke was not only one of the world's great conductors, he was one of the world's great men, in spirit as in deed. I refer especially to the noble quality of his personal honor, the breadth and kindness of his human sympathy. In his leadership he was never the autocrat. He was so sincere a musician, and so able in his profession, that these qualities were always enough to command the respect and close following of his men, without other need of discipline. A musician who did credit to the beauty of music is gone. He will be long admired and long mourned."

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN SIXTH

Post — Oct 24

"Pathetic" Engrossing Under Koussevitzky's Baton

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Outshining even his memorable version of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, at the concert of yesterday afternoon, proved the emotional and musical climax, thus far, of the present Symphony season. And a wildly applauding audience seemed so to regard it.

SERVICE TO COMPOSER

Let those who choose protest the filtration of certain German classics through the conductor's Slavic temperament. There is room here for two opinions. But beyond disputing, Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky, as revealed to us more than once last season, and again yesterday, is the true, the quintessential Tchaikovsky.

To have sat through this extraordinary performance of the "Pathetic" with score in hand would have been here and there to find Mr. Koussevitzky oue-Tchaikovskying Tchaikovsky. Gilding the lily, the cynical might call it. Yet, surely for such service, the composer, had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday, would have returned devout thanks.

Eloquence Is Sound

Would he paint the blackness and bleakness of desolation and despair, would he cry out in protest against our common fate, would he interrupt the music of wordly pleasure with the reminder that Death lurks ever near, or would he seek release in frenzied gaiety?—then and there did Mr. Koussevitzky, and his seconding thrice eloquent orchestra, sharpen and intensify Tchaikovsky's meaning until the listener was racked or exhilarated, calmed or saddened far beyond the usual experience of hearing music.

And in passing, let it be noted that the sentimental Tchaikovsky was not underscored. Here Koussevitzky the musician of taste and feeling joined hands with Koussevitzky the dra[illegible]

The Boston Symphony orchestra pictured for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky, after the opening Saturday evening concert of the 1925-26 season, on the stage of Symphony hall. With each string section increased, the personnel this season is larger than ever before. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. The brass section, formerly at the right rear with the exception of the horns, is now at the centre rear, thereby gaining in brilliance. Since there are waiting lists for each of the three series of Boston concerts, an additional series is now announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning December 1. The programmes of the new series will be in historical order to show the development of symphonic music from its earliest stages to the style of our own day. Below is shown a recent photograph of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra.
(Garo)

25 Broadway, New York City

HENRY 3038
Butler's Warehouses Inc.
2-4 Degraw Street
BROOKLYN
BONDED—FREE—WATERFRONT—STORES

FRANK M. McCURDY CO.
INCORPORATED
Real Estate Sold Quickly
21 Years' Experience
158 REMSEN STREET
Phones: Main 5906, 5907, 1695

Established 1857 Tel. South 0534
JOHN FEITNER
Designers and Builders
Monuments & Mausoleums
Work Done in All Cemeteries
24th & 25th Street Near 5th Ave., Brooklyn, N.Y.

FOR those who wish to enjoy music in its finest form.
Who wish to be known as musically cultured; who wish their home to be known as a place of deli[illegible] atmosphere and [illegible]inment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

NOV 1 1925 138

ANALYSIS OF ORCHESTRATIONS

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, as well as a work to be heard here for the first time in Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). Illustrations will be played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This talk is free to the public and all interested persons are invited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH

NOV 2 - 1925

AMUSEMENTS

The Boston Symphony.

The concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of that organization of 101 musicians, and the waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets in its own city has reached 1,000 for the first time. In order to take care of the people another series has been formed, making seventy-five concerts by the orchestra in Boston alone. This fact shows how fortunate Richmond is to be included in the short list of cities visited by Serge Koussevitzky and his players this season. In the same series here will be the Cincinnati and the popular New York Symphony orchestras, all of which will be presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who is also managing Elman, Jeritza and Chaliapin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 1925

Student tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in this city are now available and are being distributed, as in former years, under the direction of the State Federation of Rhode Island Music Clubs. The committee in charge is Virginia Boyd Anderson and Evangeline Larry. Tickets may be obtained by Rhode Island music students under 25 years of age upon recommendation of their teacher. This is the only city where the orchestra management makes a concession to pupils.

As the four series of concerts by the orchestra in Boston were fully subscribed last spring, a new series has just been announced. This was done to accommodate the waiting list which had reached the unprecedented number of 967. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons, and will bring the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 76.

Similar interest is being shown in the Providence concerts, it is reported, the subscription sale being far in advance of last year. The public sale will open tomorrow morning. The orchestra has departed on its first tour which includes concerts this week in Montreal, Toronto, Ithaca and Pittsburgh.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

NOV 1 1925

Boston Symphony To Have Full Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard here during the winter under the leadership of its new director, Serge Koussevitzky, will give seventy-three concerts in its home city this season and ten in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~POST~~
WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram

NOV 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FIVE EXTRA CONCERTS

Now in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Worcester this season.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York where 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average symphony program lasts about one hour and three quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters, and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this same orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga river, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, in this vast country and thus taking symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in European Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which still, from that time to this, attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concerts. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra. He has conducted opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the fa-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

NOV 1 1925

Koussevitzky Increases Orchstra's Popularity

The Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been anonunced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 37 as against 39 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York, where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous.

Coming to America a year ago, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra, which he still commands, more than fulfiled the highest expectations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 1 1925

Wednesday evening brings to Buffalo the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its internationally famed conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, for the opening programme of the Orchestra series under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The programme is as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora, A Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63 .... Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt from the Opera Kitej Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms

There will be an intermission before the symphony. In response to a special request, the programme has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced.

The string section of the Orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensembles now numbers 108. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the Orchestra it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the orchestral manager during a recent visit in Buffalo. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, thirty-four of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violin used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

This is the second season of Mr. Koussevitzky's conductorship of the Boston Symphony forces.

This summer an indication of his distinction among his European colleagues was given when the foremost composers of France gathered to do him honor in celebration of his recent decoration by the French government with the emblem of the Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

NOV 1 1925

The tenth season of Symphony Orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association will open next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, at Syria Mosque, by a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky. Other orchestras to be heard during the season include the Cleveland, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor, on November 20 and 21, and on January 22 and 23. For the November concert a Brahms program will be given, and the Mendelssohn Choir of Pittsburgh, Ernest Lunt, conductor, will render Brahms' "Requiem." At the second Cleveland concert Josef Lhevinne will appear as pianist solo-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE TWO CONCERTS HERE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevetzky condubting, will give two programs, Friday night and Saturday matinee, in Syria mosque this week. The orchestra numbers 107 musicians, and is the first attraction in the orchestra association series.

The following programs will be given:

Friday Program.
Overture to "Euryanthe" .... Weber
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74 .... Tchaikovsky
"Escales" ("Ports-of-Call") .... Ibert
I. Palermo. Calme: Assez anime: Calme.
II. Tunis-Nefta. Modere, tres rythme.
III. Valencia. Anime: modere.
Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps: Ballet of the Sylphs: and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24 .... Berlioz
Saturday Program.
Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" .... Glinka
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 .... Schumann
Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" .... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 1 1925

Orchestra Concerts Lead Week's Events.

Three events of importance are listed on the music calendar during the next six days, paramount being the annual engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 107 musicians strong, which comes to Syria mosque for two concerts, Saturday matinee and Friday night.

The Boston symphony, other than the Philadelphia organization is the finest of the orchestras that visit Pittsburgh yearly. Under the direction of Pierre Monteaux it was always a pleasure to sit through a concert by the Boston group, and last year, with the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky at the helm, two admirable concerts were heard. Koussevitzky impressed as a forceful conductor, giving readings of the utmost intelligence, and though not dominating as the "master conductor" he had been touted as being, at least sufficing as a man head and shoulders above the average director of today. An enviable reputation preceeded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name stood for the finest in orchestral conducting.

The Boston orchestra might have given programs less familiar than those announced, the major numbers being the same box-office sureties employed over and over, namely Tchaikowsky and a deal of Wagner. The Friday night concert has the "Pathetique" symphony as the basis, with but one novelty, Ibert's "Escales" announced. The Saturday playing will have Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Wagner's familiar Valkyries' Ride, Lohengrin Prelude and Tannhauser Overture.

Thursday night in Carnegie Music hall Serge Rachmaninoff, master pianist, will be heard in recital. One of the most satisfying of pianists, this artist through his abilities as a composer and the intelligence and technical brilliance of his artistry has built a following of tremendous dimensions.

The Dayton Westminster choir whose slogan is "Better Church Music for America," will be heard in the music hall on Tuesday night. The

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 1925

Musicl Notes

ORCHESTRA SEASON SALE TO-MORROW.

The Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, New York, Providence and elsewhere have never been in so great demand as in this season, and there is every indication that the season sale for the Infantry Hall series of five concerts to be given on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16 and March 16 will be fully subscribed in a few days.

In Boston there has been such a great demand, the four series having been fully subscribed last spring, that a new series has just been announced. This has been done to accommodate the waiting list for these concerts which has reached the unprecedented number of 967, and for the others who would otherwise be unable to hear the orchestra. These concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons at 3:15. This will bring the total number of concerts to be given in greater Boston this season to 76.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. And in America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed, and seats for the concerts are at a premium. Naturally much was expected of him. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New Yorkq, each city he has visited, the effect has been electric. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra he now commands.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 1 1925

Wednesday evening brings to Buffalo the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its internationally famed conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, for the opening program of the orchestra series under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The program is as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora, A Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63 .... Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt from the Opera Kitej .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
I. Calme; Assez anime; Calme
II. Modere, tres rythme
III. Anime; modere
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegrette e grazioso
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

There will be an intermission before the symphony.

In response to a special request, the program has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced.

The string section of the orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensemble now numbers 108. Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the orchestra, it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the orchestral manager, during a recent visit in Buffalo.

The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, 34 of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violin used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

This is the second season of Mr. Koussevitzky's conductorship of the Boston Symphony forces. Many reports of the striking ability of his magnetic figure preceded his arrival in this country. Buffalonians on their return from Paris have marveled that Mr. Koussevitzky who is a dominating figure in music throughout Europe could be content to stay in Boston.

This summer an indication of his distinction among his European colleagues was given when the foremost composers of France gathered to do him honor in celebration of his recent decoration by the French government with the emblem of the Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Russia claimed the larger part of his early career and his first conspicious achievements as a conductor was the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, drilled them into a splendid organization and traveled all over Russia with his orchestra playing symphonic music in sections of the country where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town. He championed music of genius among living composers, and in furtherance of his project founded what has come to be one of the most important music publishing firms in Russia. His Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris and his appearances as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra are annual summer engagements, at which the important musicians and the smart concert going public of both cities are always present.

Tomorrow morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels' box office, the public sale opens for the concert, which is the first in the series of six. The series tickets are still selling for all six of the concerts by the Boston, Detroit, Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 2 1925

BEGIN SALE THIS MORNING FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels the public seat sale will open for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Elmwood music hall.

The Brahms First Symphony will form the concluding number on the program and will be preceded by an intermission. The novelty of the concert will be the Ports of Call by Jacques Ibert, a picturing in of the different Mediterranean The second movement consists of an oboe solo of much charm, while the last abounds in the rhythms of Spain. of this

Serg
beginn ductor his se conce

Thi of a seas datio

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

NOV 2 1925

Wilhelm Gericke.

In the list of conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the name of Wilhelm Gericke, who died on Thursday in Vienna, will always stand high, not because he was the most eminent of those who held its baton but because he came at a point in the history of the noted organization when his abilities made their deepest impression. The orchestra was formed in 1881 by Major Henry L. Higginson and placed for three years under the direction of George Henschel. Musician as he was, it became evident to the founder of the symphony orchestra that Henschel was not the man to bring it to the highest point of efficiency. The instrument existed but its final qualities had not been developed. In Vienna Major Higginson heard Wilhelm Gericke conduct a performance of "Aida" at the Imperial Opera House of that day.

He seemed to be the ideal drillmaster that the Boston players needed, and he came to train them to the point of excellence they seemed able to reach. Conductor Gericke turned out to be the man for the post. Under his guidance the orchestra developed the virtuosity that its final individual members were known to be capable of. So fine was their skill that some of the New York audiences who were wont to admire what they called the greater vigor and force of their own Philharmonic called the orchestra in amiable derision "Professor Gericke's Damenkapelle aus Boston." No ridicule, however, could diminish public delight in the polished performances which the orchestra gave during the first term of Gericke's activity as conductor, from 1884 to 1889. He returned to Austria at this term to make place for Arthur Nikisch, who in turn surrendered the baton to Emil Paur. In 1898 Wilhelm Gericke came back to take charge again of the Boston Symphony and remained until his final return to Vienna in 1906.

It was to the unceasing labor and meticulous attention of this drillmaster and to his high musical ideals that the Boston Symphony Orchestra owed within a few years its reputation as a virtuoso orchestra. Eminent French and German conductors succeeded him, and the high repute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra kept it for years out of all rivalry with other organizations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 1 1925 138

ANALYSIS OF ORCHESTRATIONS

The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed Thursday night in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the works to be given, including Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, as well as a work to be heard here for the first time in Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). Illustrations will be played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This talk is free to the public and all interested persons are invited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
NOV 2 - 1925

AMUSEMENTS

The Boston Symphony.

The concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of that organization of 101 musicians, and the waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets in its own city has reached 1,000 for the first time. In order to take care of the people another series has been formed, making seventy-five concerts by the orchestra in Boston alone. This fact shows how fortunate Richmond is to be included in the short list of cities visited by Serge Koussevitzky and his players this season. In the same series here will be the Cincinnati and the popular New York Symphony orchestras, all of which will be presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who is also managing Elman, Jeritza and Chaliapin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 1 1925

Student tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in this city are now available and are being distributed, as in former years, under the direction of the State Federation of Rhode Island Music Clubs. The committee in charge is Virginia Boyd Anderson and Evangeline Larry. Tickets may be obtained by Rhode Island music students under 25 years of age upon recommendation of their teacher. This is the only city where the orchestra management makes a concession to pupils.

As the four series of concerts by the orchestra in Boston were fully subscribed last spring, a new series has just been announced. This was done to accommodate the waiting list which had reached the unprecedented number of 967. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons, and will bring the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 76.

Similar interest is being shown in the Providence concerts, it is reported, the subscription sale being far in advance of last year. The public sale will open tomorrow morning. The orchestra has departed on its first tour which includes concerts this week in Montreal, Toronto, Ithaca and Pittsburgh.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
NOV 1 1925

Boston Symphony To ~~Have~~ Full Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard here during the winter under the leadership of its new director, Serge Koussevitzky, will give seventy-three concerts in its home city this season and ten in New York.

which
contend

greater demand than they have ever been and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been anonunced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 37 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York, where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous.

Coming to America a year ago, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra, which he still commands, more than fulfiled the highest expectations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~POST~~
WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
NOV 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FIVE EXTRA CONCERTS

Now in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Worcester this season.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York where 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average symphony program lasts about one hour and three quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters, and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this same orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga river, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, in this vast country and thus taking symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in European Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which still, from that time to this, attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concerts. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra. He has conducted opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 1 1925

Wednesday evening brings to Buffalo the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its internationally famed conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, for the opening programme of the Orchestra series under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The programme is as follows:

Overture to Euryanthe .... Weber
Kikimora, A Folk Fairy-tale, Op. 63.. .... Liadov
The Battle at Kerjenetzt from the Opera Kitej Rimsky-Korsakov
Escales .... Ibert
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms

There will be an intermission before the symphony. In response to a special request, the programme has been changed to include the Rimsky-Korsakov number instead of the Debussy, which was previously announced.

The string section of the Orchestra has been increased, and the entire personnel of this great and distinguished ensembles now numbers 108. Mr. Koussevitsky has radically changed the seating arrangement of the Orchestra it was stated by W. H. Brennan, the orchestral manager during a recent visit in Buffalo. The first violins are still at the left front, but the second violin section is beside them, so that the conductor has all of the violins, thirty-four of them, massed at his left. The violas are at the right front, where the second violin used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. Whereas the brass players, excepting the horns, were formerly at the right rear, the entire brass section is now at the center rear, thereby gaining in brilliance.

This is the second season of Mr. Koussevitzky's conductorship of the Boston Symphony forces.

This summer an indication of his distinction among his European colleagues was given when the foremost composers of France gathered to do him honor in celebration of his recent decoration by the French government with the emblem of the Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
NOV 1 1925

The tenth season of Symphony Orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association will open next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 7, at Syria Mosque, by a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky. Other orchestras to be heard during the season include the Cleveland, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor, on November 20 and 21, and on January 22 and 23. For the November concert a Brahms program will be given, and the Mendelssohn Choir of Pittsburgh, Ernest Lunt, conductor, will render Brahms' "Requiem." At the second Cleveland concert Josef Lhevinne will appear as pianist soloist. The Cincinnati Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner, will come on December 11 and 12, bringing Kathryn Meisle as contralto soloist. The New York Philharmonic, under Willem Mengelberg, will give the fourth pair on January 8 and 9, and the closing pair on March 12 and 13, with Wilhelm Furtwaengler, conducting. The Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor, will give one evening concert on Monday, February 22.

Radio Station WLWL—288.3
8 p. m.—Paulist choristers; sermon
Rev. J. M. Gillis; benediction.
WTAG, Worcester, Mass.—268.
3:45-5:30 p. m.—Men's conference. in th

BEAUTIFUL

.........Ibert
I. Palermo. Calme; Assez anime; Calme.
II. Tunis-Nefta. Modere, tres rythme.
III. Valencia. Anime; modere.
Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps; Ballet of the Sylphs; and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24 ....Berlio

Saturday Program.

Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"... ....Glink
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.... ....Schuma Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie" ....Wagn
Prelude to "Lohengrin"...........Wagn
Overture to "Tannhauser".........Wagn

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
NOV 1 1925

Orchestra Concerts Lead Week's Events.

Three events of importance are listed on the music calendar during the next six days, paramount being the annual engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 107 musicians strong, which comes to Syria mosque for two concerts, Saturday matinee and Friday night.

The Boston symphony, other than the Philadelphia organization is the finest of the orchestras that visit Pittsburgh yearly. Under the direction of Pierre Monteaux it was always a pleasure to sit through a concert by the Boston group, and last year, with the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky at the helm, two admirable concerts were heard. Koussevitzky impressed as a forceful conductor, giving readings of the utmost intelligence, and though not dominating as the "master conductor" he had been touted as being, at least sufficing as a man head and shoulders above the average director of today. An enviable reputation preceeded his first coming to America. In London and Paris for the last five years his name stood for the finest in orchestral conducting.

The Boston orchestra might have given programs less familiar than those announced, the major numbers being the same box-office sureties employed over and over, namely Tchaikowsky and a deal of Wagner. The Friday night concert has the "Pathetique" symphony as the basis, with but one novelty, Ibert's "Escales" announced. The Saturday playing will have Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Wagner's familiar Valkyries' Ride, Lohengrin Prelude and Tannhauser Overture.

Thursday night in Carnegie Music hall Serge Rachmaninoff, master pianist, will be heard in recital. One of the most satisfying of pianists, this artist through his abilities as a composer and the intelligence and technical brilliance of his artistry has built a following of tremendous dimensions.

The Dayton Westminster choir whose slogan is "Better Church Music for America," will be heard in the music hall on Tuesday night. The choir is composed of 60 men and women, who sing a cappella and from memory under the direction of John Finley Williamson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
NOV 1 - 1925

All seats for the Boston Symphony concerts in Manhattan, as well as in the orchestra's home town and Cambridge, have been sold for the season, and indications are that a Brooklyn series will be oversubscribed.

---

plete.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed, and seats for the concerts are at a premium. Naturally much was expected of him. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New Yorkq, each city he has visited, the effect has been electric. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra he now commands.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 1 1925

with the emblem of the French govhevalier of the Legion of Honor.
Russia claimed the larger part of is early career and his first conpicious achievements as a conduc-or was the famous orchestra which e organized in Moscow. He asembled his country's best musicians, rilled them into a splendid organzation and traveled all over Russia vith his orchestra playing symphonic music in sections of the country where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town. He championed music of genius among living composers, and in furtherance of his project founded what has come to be one of the most important music publishing firms in Russia. His Concerts Koussevitsky in Paris and his appearances as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra are annual summer engagements, at which the important musicians and the smart concert gong public of both cities are always resent.

Tomorrow morning at Denton, ottier & Daniels' box office, the ublic sale opens for the concert, hich is the first in the series of
. The series tickets are still sell-for all six of the concerts by the ton, Detroit, Cleveland and Cinati orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 2 1925

BEGIN SALE THIS MORNING FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels the public seat sale will open for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert on Wednesday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Elmwood music hall.

The Brahms First Symphony will form the concluding number on the program and will be preceded by an intermission. The novelty of the concert will be the Ports of Call by Jacques Ibert, a picturing in music of the different Mediterranean port. The second movement consists of an oboe solo of much charm, while the last abounds in the rhythms of Spain. This is the first performance of this composition in Buffalo.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is just beginning his second year as conductor of the orchestra, is making his second local appearance at this concert.

This is the first orchestral concert of a series of six arranged for this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

---

highest po of efficiency. The instrument existed but its finest qualities had not been developed. In Vienna Major HIGGINSON heard WILHELM GERICKE conduct a performance of "Aida" at the Imperial Opera House of that day.

He seemed to be the ideal drillmaster that the Boston players needed, and he came to train them o the point of excellence they eemed able to reach. Conductor ERICKE turned out to be the man or the post. Under his guidance the orchestra developed the virtuosity that its final individual members were known to be capable of. So fine was their skill that some of the New York audiences who were wont to admire what they called the greater vigor and force of their own Philharmonic called the orchestra in amiable derision "Professor GERICKE's Damenkapelle aus Boston." No ridicule, however, could diminish public delight in the polished performances which the orchestra gave during the first term of GERICKE's activity as conductor, from 1884 to 1889. He returned to Austria at the end of his term to make place fo ARTHUR NIKISCH, who in turn surrendered the baton to EMIL PAUR. In 1898 WILHELM GERICKE came back to take charge again of the Boston Symphony and remained until his final return to Vienna in 1906.

It was to the unceasing labor and meticulous attention of this drillmaster and to his high musical ideals that the Boston Symphony Orchestra owed within a few years its reputation as a virtuoso orchestra. Eminent French and German conductors succeeded him, and the high repute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra kept it for years out of all rivalry with other organizations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 4 1925

Music and the Drama

By Lawrence Mason

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Koussevitzky ~~and Superb~~ Orchestra Win Ovation in Massey Hall.

One of the greatest events of any season in any music centre the world over has come and gone, and upward of two thousand Torontonians are the richer by imperishable memories of a truly soul-stirring experience. That there were any empty seats at all in the fairly well-filled house can be explained only on the supposition of deplorable breakdowns in the usually efficient local management, and the thousand or more might-have-been hearers who were thereby kept from attending have grounds for very serious complaint. Normally, such an attraction as two-thirds filled Massey Hall last night should crowd the Arena or the Coliseum, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have a few rivals but no generally recognized superiors.

The Philadelphias might be said to excel in finish and the minutiae, while the Bostons excel in vitality and splendor. Certainly the organ-tone of full, rich, velvety volume which was so conspicuous in the National Anthem and the Brahms Symphony has not been equalled within this hearer's memory. To secure his thrilling effects of brilliancy, Mr. Koussevitzky might almost seem to have raised the pitch of the instruments, but other secrets of his success must also be taken into account, such as each player's absolute purity of intonation, the absolute homogeneity of tonal quality throughout, so that one could hardly tell just where the strings relinquished a given chord and the brass or wood took it over, and the absolute genius of the interpretation.

For Mr. Koussevitzky last night lived up to his great reputation for extracting new and striking values from even the most familiar works. He framed three novelties between a hackneyed overture and a standard symphony, and made each of the five as fresh and arresting as a sunrise in May.

Weber's much-played overture to "Euryanthe," 102 years old, was given a reading that was a tremendous tour de force and called forth immense applause. Purists might object to the exaggerated pianissimo and ritardando in the middle section and the excessive pace of the close, but the thrilling and glorious effect abundantly justified these departures from routine methods. Here and throughout the program, the last ounce of expressiveness was extracted from each composition, the conductor systematically going to the very opposite extreme from metronomic academicism.

Liadov's 'Kikinora," a recent folk fairy tale for orchestra describing the most evil disposition and habits of an eldritch witch, began almost inaudibly and ended in a gorgeous climax, meanwhile illustrating all imaginable stops and starts, colors and shadings, rhythms and tempi, estintos and sforzandos. Again the utterly delighted applause was overwhelming.

Rimsky-Korsakov's operatic battle-piece, an entr'acte from one of his last works for the stage, was tantalizingly brief, but afforded ample opportunities for vivid and varied expression. "Ports of Call," by Jacques Ibert, had its European premiere last year and its American premiere only last month. It is modern, but not futuristic, in inspiration, and plainly shows the influence of Ravel. Immensely difficult in its subtle and complex orchestration, it was given a glowingly beautiful performance.

—BOSton Symphony (City Edn only

And then came the symphony! Doubters might have been saying, "Of course, a young Russian can play modern Russian music, but can he play Brahms? And, in particular, can he play the C minor, perhaps the greatest of all symphonies?" Well, after hearing him play it those present might rather feel inclined to ask: "Can any one else play it?" For Mr. Koussevitzky made this mighty masterpiece a new testimony to the Eternal Verities, a new revelation of spiritual grandeur, and a new enfranchisement in higher worlds of beauty and power.

One could not choose among the massive breadth and solemn exaltation of the Allegro, with its singing close; the heavenly sweetness of the Andante, with its exquisite duet between the concertmaster, Mr. Burgin, and the first hornist, Mr. Wendler; the graciously appealing but unfailingly lofty Scherzo; and the overwhelming finale, a whole symphony in itself, with the allegro non troppo taken at a furious presto, and the whole closing in a stupendous climax.

No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. One seldom hears cheering and stamping in Massey Hall, least of all for a symphony, and probably never before for a Brahms symphony! And this reviewer has heard this same symphony played by reputable orchestras and conductors in such a way that it seemed a lifeless ceremony to be gone through with only for respectability's sake.

Mr. Koussevitzky arranges his players in an unconventional way, with all the violins on one side and the violas and 'cellos opposite, but he gets his results through his personal magnetism and leadership, in the last analysis. He seems a somewhat austere and angular figure at first, dominating and imperious: but there are no airs or affectations about him. He evidently puts tremendous effort and vital force into his work, and believes in making the players feel the music as deeply as he does himself. The result is a superb demonstration of the possibilities of inspired orchestral conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 9 1925

A Symphony Pioneer

Wilhelm Gericke, who has just died in Vienna at the age of eighty, was perhaps more responsible than any other one man for the technical excellence and high reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was discovered in Vienna by Colonel Higginson in the eighties and was brought to Boston, where he succeeded George Henschel, the original conductor. The organization had been given a good start, but it was still in a somewhat experimental stage when Gericke assumed its leadership.

He remained in Boston five years, during which the orchestra became the country's most distinguished body of instrumental artists. Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur followed him in the conductor's chair, and after some years he was brought back to resume his constructive work. In all he spent thirteen years in guiding the destinies of the Boston organization, finally retiring and returning to his native city in 1906. He had acquired a comfortable fortune in his American experience but his investments were swept away by the war and it was his tragic and undeserved fate to meet an impoverished old age. The Boston Symphony has had other great conductors, but none who has done as much as Gericke to develop it to an approximate perfection in performance. Of him Walter Damrosch has said: "He was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

[illegible] 1925

Concert seat sale.

This morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the public seat sale opens for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert on Wednesday evening at Elmwood Music hall. The Brahms First Symphony will be the concluding number. The novelty of the concert will be the Ports of Call by Jacques Ibert, a picturing in music of the different Mediterranean ports. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is making his second local appearance. This is the first of a series of six orchestral concerts arranged for this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NOV 3 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, who after completing his second term as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Vienna to live, was among the many retired musicians in Europe who suffered heavily from the war, but after a period of privation his affairs took a turn for the better, and his friends in Boston were glad to know that his last years were spent in comfort and contentment. Until his final illness he seemed to be hale and hearty for a man of his years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 3 1925

SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN HERE NOV. 17

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, New York, Providence and elsewhere have never been in so great demand as in this season, and there is every indication that the season sale for the Infantry Hall series of five concerts to be given on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, will be fully subscribed in a few days.

In Boston there has been such a great demand, the four series having been fully subscribed last spring, that a ne series have just been announced. This has been done to accommodate the waiting list for these concerts which has reached the unprecedented number of 967, and for the others who would otherwise be unable to hear the orchestra. These concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons at 3:15. This will bring the total number of concerts to be given in greater Boston this season to 76.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. And in America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed, and seats for the concerts are at a premium. Naturally much was expected of him. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, each city he has visited, the effect has been electric. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consensus of opinion been so high and so unqualified.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Concert at Elmwood Music hall tonight.

From Toronto, where it played last evening before a capacity house, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to Buffalo this morning for the concert tonight in Elmwood Music hall under the direction of the Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, said to be one of the most remarkable conductors in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE THIS EVENING

From Toronto, where it played in Massey hall last evening before a capacity house, the Boston Symphony orchestra will come to Buffalo this morning for the concert which they will give tonight in Elmwood Music hall under the direction of the Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, said to be one of the most remarkable conductors in the world.

Mr. Koussevitzky radically has changed his seating arrangements of the orchestra. Tonight the audience will note that all the violins, thirty-four of them, are massed at his left hand. The violins are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violins. The harps are now shifted to the right. The entire brass section will be seen at the center rear, as Mr. Koussevitzky believes this will emphasize the brilliance of orchestra tones.

Seats will be on sale all day until 5 o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, at Elmwood Music hall, the [illegible] opening at 7 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 4 1925

Boston Symphony Popular.

The years bring increased fame and popularity to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a merited recognition of the splendid work done in the world of music by that organization. The plans for the present season include 48 concerts in the regular course, five in a special Monday course, one for the pension fund and nine in the city of Cambridge, but the demand for tickets was far from supplied when all seats had been sold for that list of concerts. Five more have been added, a Tuesday afternoon course being provided to care for the eager ticket buyers. The regular concerts and a number of special events total 70 concerts in and near Boston by that organization in one season, the best record made by the orchestra thus far, a number without equal in the country, being well ahead of the number at Chicago or Philadelphia.

It is 41 years since Wilhelm Gericke was brought from Germany as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. His task was to develop that organization, then well organized, and put it in high place. He spent five years doing his work and placed it at the top, a position it has held during the years that have come. He had unlimited funds with which to secure musicians, had entire control while there, he left a world monument to his skill as a musician and director, the proudest monument that bore his name when death claimed him a few days ago at his home in Vienna. He returned to the post in 1898 and spent a number of years directing the orchestra, pushing it even higher than it had been before. Others have held the baton, others have retained all he had developed, and Boston people have come to know and understand the world importance of their orchestra. The larger measure of public favor shown the orchestra this season is fully merited, a recognition of the greatest musical organization of which this country boasts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 4 1925

BIG MUSICAL NIGHT HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Brilliant Program for Buffalo Engagement.

This morning the 108 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrived in Buffalo from Toronto, where they played last evening to a capacity house in Massey hall. The program which this most distinguished of American orchestras will play this evening in Elmwood Music hall, has brilliance, variety and musical interest. It includes two numbers performed at the opening Boston Symphony concerts this season in the Hub city this fall. These are the first symphony of Brahms and Ibert's "Ports of Call," the latter being a picture in music of the various ports along the Mediterranean.

Also on the program for Buffalo are Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" and Liadov's "Kikimora," a musical characterization of the witch by that name who appears [illegible] frequently in Russian fairy
nur fro in ce
c'
M

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 3 1925

Noted Orchestra Conductor Will Appear Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Toronto this morning, preparatory to its concert in Massey Hall tonight, when, under the leadership of the renowned Koussevitzky, an attractive program will be given. This is Koussevitzky's first appearance in Toronto as a conductor, and the concert will likely be the only one to be given by a large visiting orchestra this season. The musical world is well acquainted with the achievements of Koussevitzky. His fame as a musician has spread far and wide. Under his baton, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, no doubt, thrill an assuredly great audience. A number of good seats are still available, but should be secured at once.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 4 1925

Koussevitzky Coming Here

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater deman dthan they have ever been in the history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached 1,000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York, where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double bass.

In was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was lrst head in Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which still from that time to this attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concerts. In London every season Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor f Sir Henry W… Symphony. He h… operas with a simil… the Old World.

Coming to Americ… with this reputation … Koussevitzky, appea… famous orchestra w… commands, more tha… highest expectation… quickly become the … ing figure in the … of those vities which … visits, and his repu… the length and br… country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE TOMORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with their Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and 100 virtuosi players, will arrive in the city tomorrow morning for the opening of the Symphony Orchestra season at Syria Mosque tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon. The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony will be analyzed in an informal talk tonight in the Recital Room at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. This talk will be given by Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting and all interested persons

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 3 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERTS.

The foremost composers of France gathered together in a notable assemblage last June in Paris to honor Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had just been decorated by the French government with the emblem of a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Speeches of praise were made by the musicians, Charpentier and Messager. Music composed especially for the occasion was also performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the basoon and double-bass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpentier, for four harps with percussion; and M. Paul Le Flem, for doublebass and flute.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, with M. Koussevitsky at its head, will be heard here at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. It is a companion recital to the appearance here January 24 of Giovanni Martinelli, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are known as the Sedgwick concerts. The subscription sale is now open and seats may be obtained at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

NOV 5 1925

Boston Symphony, 108 Strong, Reaches Ithaca For Concert Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its annual visit to Ithaca this evening with an increased personnel including 108 musicians under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Always an event of primary importance in the musical life of the community, this opening concert of the season's University Series will once more fill Bailey Hall with an audience eager to take advantage of this opportunity for hearing one of the best orchestras in the country. The entire house has been sold out, it was announced this morning by the Department of Music.

The program will be of unusual interest, including Tchaikosky's 6th Symphony (the Pathetic), and Weber's Overture to "Suryanthe" as the first two numbers, followed by a modern novelty—Ibert's "Escales," which was first played in America by the Boston Symphony on October 9. The music is said to be of the descriptive variety, and attempts to picture in music the atmosphere of several famous Mediterranean ports. Three numbers from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" will conclude the program.

The usual traffic rules will be in effect this evening, and no one will be allowed to enter the auditorium during the playing of a number. The concert begins at 8:15 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 5 1925

Orchestra Season Opens Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orches… with their Russian conductor, S… Koussevitzky, and 100 virtuosi … ers, will arrive in the city tomor… morning for the opening of the symphony orchestra season at Syri… Mosque tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon. The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony will be analyzed in an informal talk tonight in the recital room at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. This talk will be given by Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The symphony to be played at th… Friday night concert is the "Pathetic… Tschaikowsky's most popular sy… phony. The Schumann Symphony … 4 in D minor will be given Satu… afternoon, as well as a group of … nerian numbers. A work to be … for the first time in Pittsbu… Friday night is Ibert's … (Ports of Call), which met … success recently in Bosto…

139

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 9 1925

A Symphony Pioneer

Wilhelm Gericke, who has just died in Vienna at the age of eighty, was perhaps more responsible than any other one man for the technical excellence and high reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was discovered in Vienna by Colonel Higginson in the eighties and was brought to Boston, where he succeeded George Henschel, the original conductor. The organization had been given a good start, but it was still in a somewhat experimental stage when Gericke assumed its leadership.

He remained in Boston five years, during which the orchestra became the country's most distinguished body of instrumental artists. Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur followed him in the conductor's chair, and after some years he was brought back to resume his constructive work. In all he spent thirteen years in guiding the destinies of the Boston organization, finally retiring and returning to his native city in 1906. He had acquired a comfortable fortune in his American experience but his investments were swept away by the war and it was his tragic and undeserved fate to meet an impoverished old age. The Boston Symphony has had other great conductors, but none who has done as much as Gericke to develop it to an approximate perfection in performance. Of him Walter Damrosch has said: "He was the first conductor to develop a permanent orchestra to the highest technical standard."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 1925

Concert seat sale.

This morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the public seat sale opens for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert on Wednesday evening at Elmwood Music hall. The Brahms First Symphony will be the concluding number. The novelty of the concert will be the Ports of Call by Jacques Ibert, a picturing in music of the different Mediterranean ports. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is making his second local appearance. This is the first of a series of six orchestral concerts arranged for this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NOV 3 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, who after completing his second term as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Vienna to live, was among the many retired musicians in Europe who suffered heavily from the war, but after a period of privation his affairs took a turn for the better, and his friends in Boston were glad to know that his last years were spent in comfort and contentment. Until his final illness he seemed to be hale and hearty for a man of his years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 3 1925

SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN HERE NOV. 17

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, New York, Providence and elsewhere have never been in so great demand as in this season, and there is every indication that the season sale for the Infantry Hall series of five concerts to be given on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 16, and March 16, will be fully subscribed in a few days.

In Boston there has been such a great demand, the four series having been fully subscribed last spring, that a ne series have just been announced. This has been done to accommodate the waiting list for these concerts which has reached the unprecedented number of 967, and for the others who would otherwise be unable to hear the orchestra. These concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on five Tuesday afternoons at 3:15. This will bring the total number of concerts to be given in greater Boston this season to 76.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra. Many reports of the striking abilities of Serge Koussevitzky preceded his arrival in this country last autumn. He was called the dominating figure in the concerts of London, the concerts and opera of Paris, and previously in Russia, where he had traveled far and wide with the orchestra that bore his name. And in America Serge Koussevitzky has made another conquest, both sudden and complete. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor is talked about the country over—every series is subscribed, and seats for the concerts are at a premium. Naturally much was expected of him. His qualities have exceeded all expectations. In Boston, New York, each city he has visited, the effect has been electric. There is but one opinion of his personal magnetism, his fresh sincerity and vividness as an interpretative artist, his rare and absolute control, manifest in the perfect response of the famous orchestra he now commands.

About no other conductor (and America has in the last few seasons heard all of the "great" ones) has the consensus of opinion been so high and so unqualified.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 4 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Concert at Elmwood Music hall tonight.

From Toronto, where it played last evening before a capacity house, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to Buffalo this morning for the concert tonight in Elmwood Music hall under the direction of the Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, said to be one of the most remarkable conductors in the world.

Mr. Koussevitzky has radically changed his seating arrangement of the orchestra. Tonight the audience will note that all the violins, 34 of them, are massed at his left hand. The violas are at the right front, where the second violins used to be, and the 'cellos are beside the violas. The harps are now shifted to the right. The entire brass section will be seen at the center rear, as Mr. Koussevitzky believes this to emphasize the brilliance of orchestra tones.

Seats will be on sale all day today until five o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the sale reopening at 7 o'clock at Elmwood Music hall box office.

Guelph Aggies and St. Michael's College of Toronto are finalists in the intermediate intercollegiate series, the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 4 1925

Boston Symphony Popular.

The years bring increased fame and popularity to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a merited recognition of the splendid work done in the world of music by that organization. The plans for the present season include 48 concerts in the regular course, five in a special Monday course, one for the pension fund and nine in the city of Cambridge, but the demand for tickets was far from supplied when all seats had been sold for that list of concerts. Five more have been added, a Tuesday afternoon course being provided to care for the eager ticket buyers. The regular concerts and a number of special events total 70 concerts in and near Boston by that organization in one season, the best record made by the orchestra thus far, a number without equal in the country, being well ahead of the number at Chicago or Philadelphia.

It is 41 years since Wilhelm Gericke was brought from Germany as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. His task was to develop that organization, then well organized, and put it in high place. He spent five years doing his work and placed it at the top, a position it has held during the years that have come. He had unlimited funds with which to secure musicians, had entire control while there, he left a world monument to his skill as a musician and director, the proudest monument that bore his name when death claimed him a few days ago at his home in Vienna. He returned to the post in 1898 and spent a number of years directing the orchestra, pushing it even higher than it had been before. Others have held the baton, others have retained all he had developed, and Boston people have come to know and understand the world importance of their orchestra. The larger measure of public favor shown the orchestra this season is fully merited, a recognition of the greatest musical organization of which this country boasts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 4 1925

BIG MUSICAL NIGHT HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Brilliant Program for Buffalo Engagement.

This morning the 108 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrived in Buffalo from Toronto, where they played last evening to a capacity house in Massey hall. The program which this most distinguished of American orchestras will play this evening in Elmwood Music hall, has brilliance, variety and musical interest. It includes two numbers performed at the opening Boston Symphony concerts this season in the Hub city this fall. These are the first symphony of Brahms and Ibert's "Ports of Call," the latter being a picture in music of the various ports along the Mediterranean.

Also on the program for Buffalo are Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe" and Liadov's "Kikimora," a musical characterization of the witch by that name who appears so frequently in Russian fairy tales. A Rimsky-Korsakov number, "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" from the opera "Kitej," will be played instead of the Debussy number recently announced.

This concert is the first in the orchestra series arranged by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 4 1925

Koussevitzky Coming Here

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are in greater deman dthan they have ever been in the history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached 1,000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York, where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double bass.

In was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was lrst head in Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which still from that time to this attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concerts. In London every season Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor f Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony. He has conducted operas with a similar distinct in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those vities which the orchestra visits, and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 5 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE TOMORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with their Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and 100 virtuosi players, will arrive in the city tomorrow morning for the opening of the Symphony Orchestra season at Syria Mosque tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon. The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony will be analyzed in an informal talk tonight in the Recital Room at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. This talk will be given by Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting and all interested persons are invited to attend free of charge. The symphony to be played at the Friday night concert is the "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky's most popular symphony. The Schumann Symphony No. 4 in D Minor will be given Saturday afternoon, as well as a group of Wagnerian numbers. A work to be heard for the first time in Pittsburgh on Friday night is Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), which met with success recently in Boston.

---

performed. These were as follows: A piece by Paul Dukas, for piano solo; a piece by Albert Roussel, given to the basoon and doublebass; by M. Honegger, for the trombone; Mr. Prokofieff, for the harp; Mr. Alexandre Tansman, for the piano; M. Salzedo, for the harp; M. Roland-Manuel, for four harps; M. Charpentier, for four harps with percussion; and M. Paul Le Flem, for doublebass and flute.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, with M. Koussevitsky at its head, will be heard here at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. It is a companion recital to the appearance here January 24 of Giovanni Martinelli, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are known as the Sedgwick concerts. The subscription sale is now open and seats may be obtained at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

---

the atmosphere of several famous Mediterranean ports. Three numbers from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" will conclude the program.

The usual traffic rules will be in effect this evening, and no one will be allowed to enter the auditorium during the playing of a number. The concert begins at 8:15 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 5 1925

Orchestra Season Opens Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orches with their Russian conductor, Se Koussevitzky, and 100 virtuosi pl ers, will arrive in the city tomor morning for the opening of the sym phony orchestra season at Syri Mosque tomorrow night and Saturda afternoon. The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony will be analyzed in an informal talk tonight in the recital room at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. This talk will be given by Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dalmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The symphony to be played at th Friday night concert is the "Pathetic" Tschaikowsky's most popular sy phony. The Schumann Symphony 4 in D minor will be given Satu afternoon, as well as a group of nerian numbers. A work to be given for the first time in Pittsbu Friday night is Ibert's (Ports of Call), which met success recently in Bost

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 6 1925

The symphony orchestra season will have a brilliant opening tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria mosque, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, with the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be welcomed. The box holders for the opening concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, J. J. Turner, Mrs. W. J. Hollard, Mrs. George Tener, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. E. J. House, Mrs. F. C. Irish, Mrs. J. V. Scaife, Mrs. Grant McCargo, Mrs T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. George E. Klingelhofer, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Dr. Ellen Patterson, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. L. Smith, Mrs. J. N. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron of Monongahela, Judge J. H. Brennan of Wheeling, Dr. and Mrs. Van Kirk of Wheeling, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg of Sewickley, Mrs. Paul B. Straub, of Thornburg, Mrs. S. J. Podlewski and party of Steubenville.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

140

NOV 6 1925

Boxholders Named.

Boxholders for the concerts to be given tonight and tomorrow afternoon in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, J. J. Turner, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. George Tener, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. E. J. House, Mrs. F. C. Irish, Mrs. J. V. Scaife, Mrs. Grant McCargo, Mrs. T. J Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. George E. Klingelhofer, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Dr. Ellen Patterson, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. L. Smith, Mrs. J. N. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, of Monongahela; Judge J. H. Brennan, of Wheeling; Dr. and Mrs. Van Kirk, of Wheeling; Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, of Sewickley; Mrs. Paul B. Straub and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 5 1925

Boston Symphony.

Probably no orchestra concert of the present local musical season will surpass that of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, which opened the symphonic series of the Buffalo Musical foundation in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening.

The Boston orchestra long has occupied a place among the foremost orchestras of the world, thus, the present conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, assuming his place at the beginning of last season, found himself in possession of a rare instrument upon which to play. And the Boston orchestra's experience of the year has provided eloquent testimony to the fitness of the Russian for his distinguished post. Koussevitzky has infused into his body of players quickening life, and by his wizardry has drawn from them unfailing response. And now, the fine Boston Symphony orchestra, under the Russian's leadership, seems actually to be excelling its estimable self.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program was of ideal makeup. Sustenance for the musically hungry, delight for the lover of novelty, it was a felicitous dispensation of musical fare. The first half included the "Euryanthe" overture, Weber; "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, from the pen of the Russian, Liadov; "The Battle at Kerjenetzt," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Kitesch," and the suite "Escales," of the modern Frenchman, Ibert. The symphony of the evening, the Brahams No. 1, C. minor, made up the second portion of the program.

The brilliant, colorful performance of the Weber, the superb finish of its detail, and its stirring, dynamic upbuilding, gave significant indication of the evening's delights.

The works of the two Russians and the Frenchman provided a kaleidoscopic play of color and the clarity of Mr. Koussevitzky's readings shed light even into the darkest recesses of modern dissonance. The Liadov composition is convincingly descriptive, weird, elusive as suits its subject. Clever scoring adds to its realism. "The Battle" of Rimsky-Korsakoff is an entr'acte from the opera, is likewise descriptive in character, and throughout its measures gives evidence of the composer's mastery of colorful scoring.

The Ibert "Escales" (Ports of Call) three contrasted numbers, proved a complete novelty. The composer has expressed himself in distinctly modern idiom, quite religiously avoiding consonance, yet employing his technical skill in the creation of faithful, impressionistic pictures. The Ibert music is by no means formless, nor does it lack originality. The first of the set, "Palermo," is of serene mood, beguiling in its atmospheric charm. The second, "Tunis," is purely oriental, effective in its employment of a seven-beat rhythm and containing a hauntingly lovely solo for oboe. The third number, "Valencia," follows the style of the Spanish Rhapsody.

The Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Ibert works were performed with superb finish by the Boston players, and the listeners applauded conductor and men enthusiastically.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Brahms First symphony was one of utmost artistry. This great work by the "classic of the Classicists" probably never has been given a finer presentation here. The conductor gave rein to the music's dramatic and emotional force, yet with invariable artistic restraint; he divined its subtleties, sensed its [illegible] its beauty, all with a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 6 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky wielding the baton, gave a most satisfying concert in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday night, under auspices of Buffalo Musical Foundation. The foundation did well in opening the orchestra series with Koussevitzky and his superior musicians, for in this orchestra we have perhaps the very best in America. A number of new faces appear in the personnel this year, and their presence evidently inspired the director with even greater fire than last November when he gave a wonderful interpretation of Beethoven's Ninth symphony. Considering the mental force and vigor of gesture which Koussevitzky puts into his directing, it is a wonder that he does not lose himself at times. But no, at no place does there appear even the slightest inconsistency in his interpretation; all is smooth, well rounded and the most gigantic fortissimo is handled with the same deftness, the same studied precision as the calmer parts.

The feature of the evening, Brahms' Symphony Number One in C Minor, was awaited with great expectancy after numbers by Weber, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and the modern Parisian composer, Jacques Ibert. Certain passages of this mighty symphony, particularly in the third (un-poco allegretto e grazioso) movement, and the adagio of the last, one was strongly reminded of Beethoven's Ninth, played and sung here in honor of the memory of Mae Davis Smith two seasons back. The grand opening movement with its sweeping gesture of despair, and its mad persual of fleeing hope, brought the large audience to the feet of Koussevitzky. His directing was perfect. There was not a single flaw. Then the soft, sweet melody of the theme appeared in the opening bars of the second movement, "andante sostenuto," gradually rounding into adagio and the final "allegro non troppo, ma con brio" wherein the picture was finished with a broad sweep of brush and the audience sat wide-eyed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph
NOV 7 1925

Boston Symphony Given Welcome at Mosque

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Brilliant Program Opening Local Season.

UNUSUAL NUMBER OFFERED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra received a fine welcome last night at Syria Mosque where it gave the first concert of the season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The body of 107 musicians is undoubtedly a great organization, ably conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, a comparatively new comer in American musical circles, for he has but just commenced his second season at the head of the Boston orchestra.

The opinion of the audience last night, as exemplified by insistent applause, coincides with that of other American and of European audiences, that he is a brilliant leader. His great visualizing power was apparent in the first number on the program, which was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," played with rare delicacy. The symphony was the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic," often heard but never played with greater emotional sympathy. The response of the men to the conductor's direction was instantaneous and emphatic. The finale especially was remarkably well performed.

An unusual number on orchestra programs was "The Escales," (Port of Call), and it met with emphatic approval. Its author, Ibert, is a Parisian, but evidently very familiar with sea scenes and maritime incidents, which are depicted in the composition. "Minuet of The Will-o'-The Wisps," by Berlioz, came later, and was followed by the "Ballet of the Sylphs," and the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE AT MOSQUE TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh with concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria mosque. The following programs will be given in Pittsburgh:

TONIGHT.

Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
Ibert—Escales (Ports of Call).
Berlioz—Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps; Ballet of the Sylphs: and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Glinka—Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."
Schumann—Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.
Wagner—Prelude to the Meistersingers.
Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries.
Wagner—Prelude to Lohengrin.
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

KOUSSEWITSKY WINNING YANKS

Popularity of Conductor Shown at Boston Symphony Concert Here.

Opening the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, a purely symphonic program was presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, augmented and improved since last season, with the internationally famed Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.

Much beloved in Europe, Mr. Koussevitzky is rapidly winning America to him which is not surprising for he is a leader of rare magnetism, creative ability and interpretative powers. He and his orchestra, enthusiastically received by the large audience, gave a splendid performance.

The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, a composer not frequently heard, was a charming and melodious selection and especially noteworthy in it was the work of the first violins. A fantastic bit was the Folk Fairy Tale, "Kikimora" by Liadow; full of wierd and strange sunds truly delineating at times, as was intended, a veritable nightmare. One f the newer composers, Jacques Ibert, was represented by his unusual and modern "Escales" or "Ports-of-Call" in three movements, which it is believed were inspired by impressions received of the cities of Palmera, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia in the Mediterranean. They were colorful and original impressions, played without intermission, and distinctly effective was the oboe solo in the Tunis-Nefta.

zBrahm's Symphony in C Minor, four movements, brought the concert to a brilliant close. To this beautiful composition was given an artistic and wholly satisfying execution. It abounds in wondrous harmonies and melodies and of these melodies, none was so uplifting as the final joyous hymn, which rose and swelled into a mightly outburst of rapture. Loud and long was the applauses which followed; Mr. Koussevitsky being recalled several times, but the audience was not appeased until the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER

NOV 5 1925

Koussevitzky Triumphs With Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra—but particularly Serge Koussevitzky—scored a great success in the concerts in the Elmwood Music hall last night under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

It was the second time the great conductor has played here and he again brought the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

In the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C he arrived at the peak of his skill and wrought into the Russian music a loveliness like tinsle embroidery in a rainbow. It was not a dull Brahms, but a glittering, delicate Brahms.

The Escales, by Jaques Ibert, was Serge Koussevitzky's tribute to the modernists, and it was quite enchanting with its vivid pictures of changing, Oriental life. An escales is a port of call where vessels take on fuel and food.

Another number, Kikimora, a weird, fairy tale by Liadov, and the overture to Euryanthe by Webster, were among the favorites of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 7 1925

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Serge Koussevitzky Will Open Providence Season.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Pathetique Symphony of Tchaikowsky as the principal number. The reading by Mr. Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Likewise at this concert which is to be given at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 17, he will perform Weber's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

7

CONCERT TO BE MUSICAL TREAT

Koussevitzky to Feature Brahms' Symphony on Program Here

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the same symphony which figured upon his opening Boston program—the First Symphony of Brahms, in C-minor. Likewise at this concert, which is to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday night, Nov. 17, there will be two Russian scores of interest, Liadov's "Kikimora," in which the witch of Russian fairy tales is humorously described in music, and the Persian dances from Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina." The program will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and likewise include Dukas' fantastical scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after the ballad of Goethe.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of this week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 6 1925

ORCHESTRA HERE TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Opening Local Season With Two Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria Mosque. Koussevitzky played to an audience of 7,000 people in Toronto this week, and reports are he has been received with like enthusiasm everywhere on the present tour. The following programs will be given in Pittsburgh. Tonight:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" ..Tschaikowsky
Escales (Ports of Call)..................Ibert
Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24 ....Berlioz

Saturday afternoon:

Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," .Glinka
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120.... ....Schumann
Prelude to "The Meistersingers"....Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.................Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 7 1925

* * *

Symphony Concerts in Montclair.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, will give the second concert in the series of Symphony Concerts for Young People in the assembly hall of the Montclair High School, Tuesday, November 24, at 4 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzki, conductor, will give the second concert in the Unity course in the Montclair High School Wednesday night, November 25.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 7 - 1925

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Toronto has been rather definitely told that if it wants to keep its orchestra 1,200 or 1,500 of its citizens must join the association at the cost of $10 each, for which they will receive ten $1 tickets for ten Symphony Concerts—that is, they can maintain the orchestra at the cost of nothing at all. So far, despite heroic effort and considerable advertising, only 450 have joined the association. It has been thought that Toronto should know how Boston and Philadelphia, two of the fourteen cities of the United States which maintain orchestras of the first rank, maintain theirs.

The Boston Symphony was financed for many years by Colonel Higginson at the personal cost of $1,000,000. The Philadelphia Orchestra is supported by the citizens of Philadelphia. They support it very well, for when, in 1921, there seemed to be some danger of that orchestra going under for want of funds, Mr. Stokowski, fine conductor and astute business man, asked for $1,000,000. He got it, and $50,000 over. A Symphony Orchestra is a fine thing—one of the finest things that man has so far created. The two examples above show that it is usually an expensive thing. Is it because Toronto—unique among cities in this respect—has its orchestra for nothing that there is still wanting 800 of its citizens to make it possible that it shall keep it?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

NOV 7 - 1925

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony orchestra with the Pathetic Symphony of Tchaikowsky as the principal number. The reading by Mr Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Likewise at this concert which is to be given at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, November 17, he will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fantastical musical setting of Goethe's ballad of the same name.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of the week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 6 1925

The symphony orchestra season will have a brilliant opening tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria mosque, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, with the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be welcomed. The box holders for the opening concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, J. J. Turner, Mrs. W. J. Hollard, Mrs. George Tener, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. E. J. House, Mrs. F. C. Irish, Mrs. J. V. Scaife, Mrs. Grant McCargo, Mrs T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. George E. Klingelhofer, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Dr. Ellen Patterson, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. L. Smith, Mrs. J. N. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron of Monongahela, Judge J. H. Brennan of Wheeling, Dr. and Mrs. Van Kirk of Wheeling, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg of Sewickley, Mrs. Paul B. Straub, of Thornburg, Mrs. S. J. Podlewski and party of Steubenville.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE AT MOSQUE TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh with concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria mosque. The following programs will be given in Pittsburgh:

TONIGHT.
Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
Ibert—Escales (Ports of Call).
Berlioz—Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps; Ballet of the Sylphs; and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.
Glinka—Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."
Schumann—Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.
Wagner—Prelude to the Meistersingers.
Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries.
Wagner—Prelude to Lohengrin.
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 6 1925

ORCHESTRA HERE TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Opening Local Season With Two Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria Mosque. Koussevitzky played to an audience of 7,000 people in Toronto this week, and reports are he has been received with like enthusiasm everywhere on the present tour. The following programs will be given in Pittsburgh. Tonight:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" ..Tschaikowsky
Escales (Ports of Call)..................Ibert
Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24 ....Berlioz

Saturday afternoon:
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla,".Glinka
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120.... ....Schumann
Prelude to "The Meistersingers"....Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries...................Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

140

NOV 6 1925

Boxholders Named.

Boxholders for the concerts to be given tonight and tomorrow afternoon in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, J. J. Turner, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. George Tener, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. E. J. House, Mrs. F. C. Irish, Mrs. J. V. Scaife, Mrs. Grant McCargo, Mrs. T. J Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. George E. Klingelhofer, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Dr. Ellen Patterson, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. L. Smith, Mrs. J. N. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, of Monongahela; Judge J. H. Brennan, of Wheeling; Dr. and Mrs. Van Kirk, of Wheeling; Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, of Sewickley; Mrs. Paul B. Straub and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

KOUSSEWITSKY WINNING YANKS

Popularity of Conductor Shown at Boston Symphony Concert Here.

Opening the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, a purely symphonic program was presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, augmented and improved since last season, with the internationally famed Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.

Much beloved in Europe, Mr. Koussevitzky is rapidly winning America to him which is not surprising for he is a leader of rare magnetism, creative ability and interpretative powers. He and his orchestra, enthusiastically received by the large audience, gave a splendid performance.

The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, a composer not frequently heard, was a charming and melodious selection and especially noteworthy in it was the work of the first violins. A fantastic bit was the Folk Fairy Tale, "Kikimora" by Liadow; full of wierd and strange sunds truly delineating at times, as was intended, a veritable nightmare. One f the newer composers, Jacques Ibert, was represented by his unusual and modern "Escales" or "Ports-of-Call" in three movements, which it is believed were inspired by impressions received of the cities of Palmera; Tunis-Nefta and Valencia in the Mediterranean. They were colorful and original impressions, played without intermission, and distinctly effective was the oboe solo in the Tunis-Nefta.

zBrahm's Symphony in C Minor, four movements, brought the concert to a brilliant close. To this beautiful composition was given an artistic and wholly satisfying execution. It abounds in wondrous harmonies and melodies and of these melodies, none was so uplifting as the final joyous hymn, which rose and swelled into a mightly outburst of rapture. Loud and long was the applauses which followed; Mr. Koussevitsky being recalled several times, but the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 7 1925

* * *

Symphony Concerts in Montclair

The New York Symphony Orchetra, Walter Damrosch, conduct will give the second concert in series of Symphony Concerts Young People in the assembly of the Montclair High School, Tuday, November 24, at 4 o'clock. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the second concert in the Unity course in the Montclair High School Wednesday night, November 25.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 5 1925

Boston Symphony.

Probably no orchestra concert of the present local musical season will surpass that of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, which opened the symphonic series of the Buffalo Musical foundation in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening.

The Boston orchestra long has occupied a place among the foremost orchestras of the world, thus, the present conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, assuming his place at the beginning of last season, found himself in possession of a rare instrument upon which to play. And the Boston orchestra's experience of the year has provided eloquent testimony to the fitness of the Russian for his distinguished post. Koussevitzky has infused into his body of players quickening life, and by his wizardry has drawn from them unfailing response. And now, the fine Boston Symphony orchestra, under the Russian's leadership, seems actually to be excelling its estimable self.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program was of ideal makeup. Sustenance for the musically hungry, delight for the lover of novelty, it was a felicitous dispensation of musical fare. The first half included the "Euryanthe" overture, Weber; "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, from the pen of the Russian, Liadov; "The Battle at Kerjenetzt," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Kitesch," and the suite "Escales," of the modern Frenchman, Ibert. The symphony of the evening, the Brahams No. 1, C. minor, made up the second portion of the program.

The brilliant, colorful performance of the Weber, the superb finish of its detail, and its stirring, dynamic upbuilding, gave significant indication of the evening's delights.

The works of the two Russians and the Frenchman provided a kaleidoscopic play of color and the clarity of Mr. Koussevitzky's readings shed light even into the darkest recesses of modern dissonance. The Liadov composition is convincingly descriptive, weird, elusive as suits its subject. Clever scoring adds to its realism. "The Battle" of Rimsky-Korsakoff is an entr'acte from the opera, is likewise descriptive in character, and throughout its measures gives evidence of the composer's mastery of colorful scoring.

The Ibert "Escales" (Ports of Call) three contrasted numbers, proved a complete novelty. The composer has expressed himself in distinctly modern idiom, quite religiously avoiding consonance, yet employing his technical skill in the creation of faithful, impressionistic pictures. The Ibert music is by no means formless, nor does it lack originality. The first of the set, "Palermo," is of serene mood, beguiling in its atmospheric charm. The second, "Tunis," is purely oriental, effective in its employment of a seven-beat rhythm and containing a hauntingly lovely solo for oboe. The third number, "Valencia," follows the style of the Spanish Rhapsody.

The Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Ibert works were performed with superb finish by the Boston players, and the listeners applauded conductor and men enthusiastically.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Brahms First symphony was one of utmost artistry. This great work by the "classic of the Classicists" probably never has been given a finer presentation here. The conductor gave rein to the music's dramatic and emotional force, yet with invariable artistic restraint: he divined its subtleties, sensed its grace, pointed its beauty, all with a power tempered by discretion, and in a vital manner which seemed to re-create the measures of the immortal Brahms. It was a performance which moved majestically through the first and final movements, revealed fully the enchanting loveliness of the melodious Andante, and clearly traced the delicate beauty of the Allegretto.

At the release of the final chord of the fourth movement of the symphony the large audience gave vent to outbursts of applause which continued while the distinguished conductor bowed his acknowledgment and gestured appreciatively toward his men. Only after the entire orchestra had risen and received its due meed of recognition did the enthusiastic audience quiet down and [illegible] to leave the hall.

---

weird, [illegible] overture to Euryanthe by Webster, were among the favorites of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

NOV 6 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky wielding the baton, gave a most satisfying concert in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday night, under auspices of Buffalo Musical Foundation. The foundation did well in opening the orchestra series with Koussevitzky and his superior musicians, for in this orchestra we have perhaps the very best in America. A number of new faces appear in the personnel this year, and their presence evidently inspired the director with even greater fire than last November when he gave a wonderful interpretation of Beethoven's Ninth symphony. Considering the mental force and vigor of gesture which Koussevitzky puts into his directing, it is a wonder that he does not lose himself at times. But no, at no place does there appear even the slightest inconsistency in his interpretation; all is smooth, well rounded and the most gigantic fortissimo is handled with the same deftness, the same studied precision as the calmer parts.

The feature of the evening, Brahms' Symphony Number One in C Minor, was awaited with great expectancy after numbers by Weber, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and the modern Parisian composer, Jacques Ibert. Certain passages of this mighty symphony, particularly in the third (unpoco allegretto e grazioso) movement, and the adagio of the last, one was strongly reminded of Beethoven's Ninth, played and sung here in honor of the memory of Mae Davis Smith two seasons back. The grand opening movement with its sweeping gesture of despair, and its mad persual of fleeing hope, brought the large audience to the feet of Koussevitzky. His directing was perfect. There was not a single flaw. Then the soft, sweet melody of the theme appeared in the opening bars of the second movement, "andante sostenuto," gradually rounding into adagio and the final "allegro non troppo, ma con brio" wherein the picture was finished with a broad sweep of brush and the audience sat wide-eyed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 7 1925

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Serge Koussevitzky Will Open Providence Season.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Pathetique Symphony of Tchaikowsky as the principal number. The reading by Mr. Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Likewise at this concert which is to be given at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 17, he will perform Weber's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 7 - 1925

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Toronto has been rather definitely told that if it wants to keep its orchestra 1,200 or 1,500 of its citizens must join the association at the cost of $10 each, for which they will receive ten $1 tickets for ten Symphony Concerts—that is, they can maintain the orchestra at the cost of nothing at all. So far, despite heroic effort and considerable advertising, only 450 have joined the association. It has been thought that Toronto should know how Boston and Philadelphia, two of the fourteen cities of the United States which maintain orchestras of the first rank, maintain theirs.

The Boston Symphony was financed for many years by Colonel Higginson at the personal cost of $1,000,000. The Philadelphia Orchestra is supported by the citizens of Philadelphia. They support it very well, for when, in 1921, there seemed to be some danger of that orchestra going under for want of funds, Mr. Stokowski, fine conductor and astute business man, asked for $1,000,000. He got it, and $50,000 over. A Symphony Orchestra is a fine thing—one of the finest things that man has so far created. The two examples above show that it is usually an expensive thing. Is it because Toronto—unique among cities in this respect—has its orchestra for nothing that there is still wanting 800 of its citizens to make it possible that it shall keep it?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 7 1925

Boston Symphony Given Welcome at Mosque

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Brilliant Program Opening Local Season.

UNUSUAL NUMBER OFFERED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra received a fine welcome last night at Syria Mosque where it gave the first concert of the season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The body of 107 musicians is undoubtedly a great organization, ably conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, a comparatively new comer in American musical circles, for he has but just commenced his second season at the head of the Boston orchestra.

The opinion of the audience last night, as exemplified by insistent applause, coincides with that of other American and of European audiences, that he is a brilliant leader. His great visualizing power was apparent in the first number on the program, which was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," played with rare delicacy. The symphony was the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic," often heard but never played with greater emotional sympathy. The response of the men to the conductor's direction was instantaneous and emphatic. The finale especially was remarkably well performed.

An unusual number on orchestra programs was "The Escales," (Port of Call), and it met with emphatic approval. Its author, Ibert, is a Parisian, but evidently very familiar with sea scenes and maritime incidents, which are depicted in the composition. "Minuet of The Will-o'-The Wisps," by Berlioz, came later, and was followed by the "Ballet of the Sylphs," and the "Rackoczy March" from "The Damnation of Faust."

The same orchestra gives a matinee today, with an entirely different program, including a Schumann symphony and some selections from Wagner.

Koussevitzky to Feature Brahms' Symphony on Program Here

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony orchestra with the same symphony which figured upon his opening Boston program—the First Symphony of Brahms, in C-minor. Likewise at this concert, which is to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday night, Nov. 17, there will be two Russian scores of interest, Liadov's "Kikimora," in which the witch of Russian fairy tales is humorously described in music, and the Persian dances from Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina." The program will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and likewise include Dukas' fantastical scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after the ballad of Goethe.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of this week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

NOV 7 - 1925

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony orchestra with the Pathetic Symphony of Tchaikowsky as the principal number. The reading by Mr. Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Likewise at this concert which is to be given at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, November 17, he will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fantastical musical setting of Goethe's ballad of the same name.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of the week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 6 1925

The symphony orchestra season will have a brilliant opening tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria mosque, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, with the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be welcomed. The box holders for the opening concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, J. J. Turner, Mrs. W. J. Hollard, Mrs. George Tener, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. E. J. House, Mrs. F. C. Irish, Mrs. J. V. Scaife, Mrs. Grant McCargo, Mrs T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. George E. Klingelhofer, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Dr. Ellen Patterson, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. L. Smith, Mrs. J. N. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. Jonn S. Sloan, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron of Monongahela, Judge J. H. Brennan of Wheeling, Dr. and Mrs. Van Kirk of Wheeling, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg of Sewickley, Mrs. Paul B. Straub, of Thornburg, Mrs. S. J. Podlewski and party of Steubenville.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

NOV 6 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE AT MOSQUE TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh with concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria mosque. The following programs will be given in Pittsburgh:

TONIGHT.

Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
Ibert—Escales (Ports of Call).
Berlioz—Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps; Ballet of the Sylphs; and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Glinka—Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."
Schumann—Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.
Wagner—Prelude to the Meistersingers.
Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries.
Wagner—Prelude to Lohengrin.
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 6 1925

ORCHESTRA HERE TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Opening Local Season With Two Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tonight and tomorrow afternoon at Syria Mosque. Koussevitzky played to an audience of 7,000 people in Toronto this week, and reports are he has been received with like enthusiasm everywhere on the present tour. The following programs will be given in Pittsburgh. Tonight:

Overture to "Euryanthe"	Weber
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"	Tschaikowsky
Escales (Ports of Call)	Ibert
Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24	Berlioz

Saturday afternoon:

Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla,"	Glinka
Symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120	Schumann
Prelude to "The Meistersingers"	Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

140

NOV 6 1925

Boxholders Named.

Boxholders for the concerts to be given tonight and tomorrow afternoon in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, J. J. Turner, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. George Tener, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. E. J. House, Mrs. F. C. Irish, Mrs. J. V. Scaife, Mrs. Grant McCargo, Mrs. T. J Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. George E. Klingelhofer, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Dr. Ellen Patterson, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. L. Smith, Mrs. J. N. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, of Monongahela; Judge J. H. Brennan, of Wheeling; Dr. and Mrs. Van Kirk, of Wheeling; Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, of Sewickley; Mrs. Paul B. Straub and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

KOUSSEWITSKY WINNING YANKS

Popularity of Conductor Shown at Boston Symphony Concert Here.

Opening the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, a purely symphonic program was presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, augmented and improved since last season, with the internationally famed Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.

Much beloved in Europe, Mr. Koussevitzky is rapidly winning America to him which is not surprising for he is a leader of rare magnetism, creative ability and interpretative powers. He and his orchestra, enthusiastically received by the large audience, gave a splendid performance.

The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, a composer not frequently heard, was a charming and melodious selection and especially noteworthy in it was the work of the first violins. A fantastic bit was the Folk Fairy Tale, "Kikimora" by Liadow; full of wierd and strange sunds truly delineating at times, as was intended, a veritable nightmare. One f the newer composers, Jacques Ibert, was represented by his unusual and modern "Escales" or "Ports-of-Call" in three movements, which it is believed were inspired by impressions received of the cities of Palmera; Tunis-Nefta and Valencia in the Mediterranean. They were colorful and original impressions, played without intermission, and distinctly effective was the oboe solo in the Tunis-Nefta.

zBrahm's Symphony in C Minor, four movements, brought the concert to a brilliant close. To this beautiful composition was given an artistic and wholly satisfying execution. It abounds in wondrous harmonies and melodies and of these melodies, none was so uplifting as the final joyous hymn, which rose and swelled into a mightly outburst of rapture. Loud and long was the applauses which followed; Mr. Koussevitsky being recalled several times, but the audience was not appeased until the orchestra was made to stand and share in the approbation.

---

* * *

Symphony Concerts in Montclair.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, will give the second concert in the series of Symphony Concerts for Young People in the assembly hall of the Montclair High School, Tuesday, November 24, at 4 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzki, conductor, will give the second concert in the Unity course in the Montclair High School Wednesday night, November 25.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 5 1925

Boston Symphony.

Probably no orchestra concert of the present local musical season will surpass that of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, which opened the symphonic series of the Buffalo Musical foundation in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday evening.

The Boston orchestra long has occupied a place among the foremost orchestras of the world, thus, the present conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, assuming his place at the beginning of last season, found himself in possession of a rare instrument upon which to play. And the Boston orchestra's experience of the year has provided eloquent testimony to the fitness of the Russian for his distinguished post. Koussevitzky has infused into his body of players quickening life, and by his wizardry has drawn from them unfailing response. And now, the fine Boston Symphony orchestra, under the Russian's leadership, seems actually to be excelling its estimable self.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program was of ideal makeup. Sustenance for the musically hungry, delight for the lover of novelty, it was a felicitous dispensation of musical fare. The first half included the "Euryanthe" overture, Weber; "Kikimora," a folk fairy tale, from the pen of the Russian, Liadov; "The Battle at Kerjenetzt," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Kitesch," and the suite "Escales," of the modern Frenchman, Ibert. The symphony of the evening, the Brahams No. 1, C. minor, made up the second portion of the program.

The brilliant, colorful performance of the Weber, the superb finish of its detail, and its stirring, dynamic upbuilding, gave significant indication of the evening's delights.

The works of the two Russians and the Frenchman provided a kaleidoscopic play of color and the clarity of Mr. Koussevitzky's readings shed light even into the darkest recesses of modern dissonance. The Liadov composition is convincingly descriptive, weird, elusive as suits its subject. Clever scoring adds to its realism. "The Battle" of Rimsky-Korsakoff is an entr'acte from the opera, is likewise descriptive in character, and throughout its measures gives evidence of the composer's mastery of colorful scoring.

The Ibert "Escales" (Ports of Call) three contrasted numbers, proved a complete novelty. The composer has expressed himself in distinctly modern idiom, quite religiously avoiding consonance, yet employing his technical skill in the creation of faithful, impressionistic pictures. The Ibert music is by no means formless, nor does it lack originality. The first of the set, "Palermo," is of serene mood, beguiling in its atmospheric charm. The second, "Tunis," is purely oriental, effective in its employment of a seven-beat rhythm and containing a hauntingly lovely solo for oboe. The third number, "Valencia," follows the style of the Spanish Rhapsody.

The Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Ibert works were performed with superb finish by the Boston players, and the listeners applauded conductor and men enthusiastically.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Brahms First symphony was one of utmost artistry. This great work by the "classic of the Classicists" probably never has been given a finer presentation here. The conductor gave rein to the music's dramatic and emotional force, yet with invariable artistic restraint; he divined its subtleties, sensed its [illegible] its beauty, all with a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER

NOV 5 1925

Koussevitzky Triumphs With Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra—but particularly Serge Koussevitzky—scored a great success in the concerts in the Elmwood Music hall last night under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

It was the second time the great conductor has played here and he again brought the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

In the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C he arrived at the peak of his skill and wrought into the Russian music a loveliness like tinsle embroidery in a rainbow. It was not a dull Brahms, but a glittering, delicate Brahms.

The Escales, by Jaques Ibert, was Serge Koussevitzky's tribute to the modernists, and it was quite enchanting with its vivid pictures of changing, Oriental life. An escales is a port of call where vessels take on fuel and food.

Another number, Kikimora, a weird, fairy tale by Liadov, and the overture to Euryanthe by Webster, were among the favorites of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
POST

6 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky wielding the baton, gave a most satisfying concert in Elmwood Music hall Wednesday night, under auspices of Buffalo Musical Foundation. The foundation did well in opening the orchestra series with Koussevitzky and his superior musicians, for in this orchestra we have perhaps the very best in America. A number of new faces appear in the personnel this year, and their presence evidently inspired the director with even greater fire than last November when he gave a wonderful interpretation of Beethoven's Ninth symphony. Considering the mental force and vigor of gesture which Koussevitzky puts into his directing, it is a wonder that he does not lose himself at times. But no, at no place does there appear even the slightest inconsistency in his interpretation; all is smooth, well rounded and the most gigantic fortissimo is handled with the same deftness, the same studied precision as the calmer parts.

The feature of the evening, Brahms' Symphony Number One in C Minor, was awaited with great expectancy after numbers by Weber, Liadov, Rimsky-Korsakov and the modern Parisian composer, Jacques Ibert. Certain passages of this mighty symphony, particularly in the third (unpoco allegretto e grazioso) movement, and the adagio of the last, one was strongly reminded of Beethoven's Ninth, played and sung here in honor of the memory of Mae Davis Smith two seasons back. The grand opening movement with its sweeping gesture of despair, and its mad persual of fleeing hope, brought the large audience to the feet of Koussevitzky. His directing was perfect. There was not a single flaw. Then the soft, sweet melody of the theme appeared in the opening bars of the second movement, "andante sostenuto," gradually rounding into adagio and the final "allegro non troppo, ma con brio" wherein the picture was finished with a broad sweep of brush and the audience sat wide-eyed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

7 1925

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Serge Koussevitzky Will Open Providence Season.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Pathetique Symphony of Tchaikowsky as the principal number. The reading by Mr. Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Likewise at this concert which is to be given at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 17, he will perform Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fantastical musical setting of Goethe's ballad of the same name.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of this week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

---

heroic effort and [illegible] ing, only 450 have joined the association. It has been thought that Toronto should know how Boston and Philadelphia, two of the fourteen cities of the United States which maintain orchestras of the first rank, maintain theirs.

The Boston Symphony was financed for many years by Colonel Higginson at the personal cost of $1,000,000. The Philadelphia Orchestra is supported by the citizens of Philadelphia. They support it very well, for when, in 1921, there seemed to be some danger of that orchestra going under for want of funds, Mr. Stokowski, fine conductor and astute business man, asked for $1,000,000. He got it, and $50,000 over. A Symphony Orchestra is a fine thing—one of the finest things that man has so far created. The two examples above show that it is usually an expensive thing. Is it because Toronto—unique among cities in this respect—has its orchestra for nothing that there is still wanting 800 of its citizens to make it possible that it shall keep it?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
Chronicle Telegraph

NOV 7 1925

Boston Symphony Given Welcome at Mosque

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Brilliant Program Opening Local Season.

UNUSUAL NUMBER OFFERED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra received a fine welcome last night at Syria Mosque where it gave the first concert of the season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The body of 107 musicians is undoubtedly a great organization, ably conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, a comparatively new comer in American musical circles, for he has but just commenced his second season at the head of the Boston orchestra.

The opinion of the audience last night, as exemplified by insistent applause, coincides with that of other American and of European audiences, that he is a brilliant leader. His great visualizing power was apparent in the first number on the program, which was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," played with rare delicacy. The symphony was the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic," often heard but never played with greater emotional sympathy. The response of the men to the conductor's direction was instantaneous and emphatic. The finale especially was remarkably well performed.

An unusual number on orchestra programs was "The Escales," (Port of Call), and it met with emphatic approval. Its author, Ibert, is a Parisian, but evidently very familiar with sea scenes and maritime incidents, which are depicted in the composition. "Minuet of The Will-o'-The Wisps," by Berlioz, came later, and was followed by the "Ballet of the Sylphs," and the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

7 1925

CONCERT TO BE MUSICAL TREAT

Koussevitzky to Feature Brahms' Symphony on Program Here

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the same symphony which figured upon his opening Boston program—the First Symphony of Brahms, in C-minor. Likewise at this concert, which is to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday night, Nov. 17, there will be two Russian scores of interest, Liadov's "Kikimora," in which the witch of Russian fairy tales is humorously described in music, and the Persian dances from Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina." The program will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and likewise include Dukas' fantastical scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after the ballad of Goethe.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of this week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

NOV 7 1925

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season of the Boston Symphony orchestra with the Pathetic Symphony of Tchaikovsky as the principal number. The reading by Mr. Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Likewise at this concert which is to be given at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, November 17, he will perform Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fantastical musical setting of Goethe's ballad of the same name.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of the week, single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

NOV 6 - 1925

Bostonians In Delightful Concert Here

Audience Which Fills Bailey Hall Acclaims Serge Koussevitzky and His Symphony Orchestra in First of Cornell University Concert Series

Serge Koussevitzky appeared for the second time in Bailey Hall last evening as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led through a long and exacting program, though one of popular appeal, to the evident delight of an audience which filled eery seat in the auditorium, overflowed into the corridors, and encored relentlessly.

The mainstay of the concert was Tchaikovsky's Symphony "Pathetic," No. 6, in B minor, which was given a highly colored and impressive reading, particularly notable in the second movement with its persistent drum beat, giving a foretaste of the final tragedy. As in O'Neil's drama of fear in the setting of the forest, so in this trio, "death beats the drum," and the emotional effect is instantaneous.

The novelty of the evening was a short sketch, or rather a series of sketches, by the modernist, Ibert, called "Escales," (Ports of Call)—a number which was recently given its first American hearing by the Boston Symphony, and which elicited much enthusiasm. The music is of the descriptive variety with a more or less clearly marked motif for each of the three Mediterranean ports as represented in the three movements—Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. The first is much broken and varied, highly exotic and strange, but somehow suggestive of the tumult of a southern port. The second presents a slow weird phrase, unmistakably oriental in tone, and the last is as obviously Spanish, though the dance is frequently interrupted by the noises of the harbor. Repeated and prolonged applause, the most persistent of the evening, followed this number.

Less notable, but entirely enjoyable, were the first and last numbers—Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and three selections from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz.

The conductor has rearranged his orchestra with all the violins massed to his left, the violas on his right, and the two harps on the right instead of the left, as they have usually been placed. This, however, is only one indication of his originality and willingness to try experiments, and no one will deny that the effects which he achieves are remarkable and stirring.

Leader of Mannerisms

Mr. Koussevitsky also showed himself last evening to be a leader of many mannerisms, whether consciously or otherwise, but his idiosyncracies lie rather in the direction of unexpected calm in a moment of stress, or immobility during a forte passage than in the opposite way of violent exertion.

The printed program with its comprehensive notes on the composers and the compositions was arranged with the usual care given to these resumes by the Boston Symphony, and the unexpected was amusingly introduced in the form of a short reprint from the Manchester Guardian (England) entitled "Another Heresy Hunt" and concerned with instructions said to have been recently issued to the police of Washington to suppress the playing of "indecent music."

As usual a considerable number of the audience arrived after the concert was half over but their absence was not missed as the hall seemed crowded from the beginning.

The always notable concert of the Boston Symphony was last evening perhaps more enjoyable than any which have been given in this city in recent years. Certainly it was received with unbounded enthusiasm. The program was the first of the University concert series which this year offers unusually attractive variety. The second will be given on December 11 by Percy Grainger, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 7 1925

Big Ovation Given Boston Orchestra

Program at Mosque Is One of Familiar Numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, opened the orchestral season last night at the Mosque. A more auspicious beginning cannot be remembered, the orchestra somewhat changed and rejuvenated, played better than it has at any previous concert. There was the customary finish and fire, plus the utmost delicacy and finesse. Koussevitzky has worked wonders with these men; his style is the direct antithesis of Pierre Monteux, and he builds a mighty climax without losing instrumental timbres.

The program presented by Koussevitzky contained one novelty; the rest being familiar numbers to symphony audiences. In the Von Weber overture to "Euryanthe" there was a magnificent glowing tone and a faithful regard for French horns and woodwinds.

In the Tschaikowsky "sixth" symphony Koussevitzky and the orchestra seemed to rise to its greatest heights. It was a marvelous reading of this famous work. The strings were particularly glowing in the opening movement and the "Allegro" was a happy reading of this perplexing rhythm. The "Allegro vivace" was given a terriffic tempo and finished with a mighty fostissmo. In the finale or "Adagio Lamentoso" there was the conventional sombre and sinister effects plus a gorgeous piece of phrasing. It would be hard to say when Pittsburgh has heard a more impressive reading of this symphony.

Ibert's "Escales" or "Ports-of-Call" was characteristically modern; short themes, unsustained movements, clashing tints and lovely nuances. It is orchestrated a la mode, from xlyophone to celesta, and much is made of those instruments. The three movements are supposed to be Mediterranean impressions. The first being Palermo, the second Tunis and the third Valencia. In the Palermo episode there was a riot of color, the Tunis-Nefta was an oboe wailing and whining after the manner of the Tunisians, and the third was delightfully Spanish with castanets and figures. Koussevitzky made much of his solo material and color-qualities.

The program closed with Berlioz Damnation of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 7 1925

SEDGWICK COURSE OPENS JANUARY 24

Giovanni Martinelli and Serge Koussevitsky Comng.

Giovanni Martinelli, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company and Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, both started their musical careers as instrumentalists, in contrast to their present method of expression. Martinelli began by playing the clarinet and Koussevitsky the double bass.

Giovanni Martinelli is a good clarinet player. In fact he played this instrument in his regimental band when he was doing his military service in Italy, and it was only by chance that his marvelously pure and powerful voice was discovered.

Serge Koussevitsky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. To-day sees Martinelli, one of the world's greatest tenors, and Koussevitsky, the foremost conductor of the world and one of the most impressive figures in the music world.

Frank A. Sedgwick, manager of the Sedgwick Concerts, will bring these outstanding events to Hartford this season, two Sunday afternoons at the Capitol theater. The Martinelli recital is scheduled for January 24 and the Boston Symphony orchestra on February 7. The subscription sale is now open and seats may be obtained at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager. Detailed information may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 7 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
Conductor of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Coming to the Capitol Theater, February 7, in the Sedgwick Concert Coorse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 8 1925

Because its home-town concerts are all fully subscribed, a new "historical" series on five Tuesday afternoons has just been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will increase the number of Koussevitzky's concerts in Greater Boston to seventy-three, as against fifty-nine five years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 8 1925

Koussewitsky Leads First League Concert

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY will open the League of Composers series of three evening concerts devoted to new music at Town Hall on Saturday night, Nov. 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for Dec. 29, with Willem Mengelberg conducting De Falla's marionette opera, "El Retablo."

The opening program includes new works of modern Americans and Europeans, in whom both the league and Mr. Koussewitsky have shown their interest by previous performances. The composers are Arthur Honegger, Alexander Tansman, Maurice Ravel, Serge Prokofieff and Aaron Copland. The league presented chamber music by Honegger and a quartet by Tansman last year, and songs of Ravel in 1923.

The concert will mark the first

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 8 1925

A number of Rochester music lovers chose the opportunity of the appearance Wednesday night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to go to Buffalo that day for the purpose of attending the concert in the evening. In many cases informal dinner parties at hotels and clubs preceeded the performance. Among those who were present were Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Kunz, Mrs. Edward W. Mulligan, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Carnahan and Mrs. Jennie Beach Mumford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 8 1925

WILHELM GERICKE, WHO MADE THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

New York Telegram.

The death of Wilhelm Gericke in his eighty-first year should remind all musical Americans of the debt they owe this extraordinary orchestral drill master and conductor. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1905. In his first period of service he gathered together elements over which George Henschel had presided with an enthusiasm that lacked experience and wrought them into a symphonic orchestra of the first class. It was still the orchestra of Gericke's creation to which he returned nine years later in succession to Emil Paur, who himself had succeeded Arthur Nikisch. During his second incumbency there was never any question of the Boston band's being unsurpassed in the whole world, if, indeed, it had an equal.

Nor was Gericke only a great drill master. He possessed a fine sense of program-making, and in an absolutely non-spectacular way he was an admirable interpreter. A musician of classical tradition, he doubtless believed that every subscriber to his Boston concerts should hear each symphony of Beethoven at least once in the course of two years, and he made his programs accordingly. But he was conscientious in the introduction of new music. Nobody who heard the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss as led by him is likely to forget it, and few subsequent conductors have given so eloquent an account of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Wilhelm Gericke were the orchestral standard setters for all Americans in those days. Many who went

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 8 1925

Guest conductors are to assist the League of Composers in celebrating the third year of its existence with three evening concerts in the Town Hall, New York city, each presenting music for chamber orchestra led by a conductor of international distinction. Serge Koussevitsky and Willem Mengelberg will conduct, respectively, the first and second evening concerts, Nov. 28 and Dec. 29.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who had accepted by permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in this country outside the concerts of that organiation. He will conduct a programme of new works recently completed by young men in Europe as well as America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

141

NOV 8 1925

Koussevitsky to Play New Works for League

Serge Koussevitsky will open the League of Composers' series of three evening concerts devoted to new music, at Town Hall on Saturday night, November 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for December 29, with William Mengelberg conducting "El Establo," de Falla's opera with marionettes.

The opening program presents new works of modern Americans and Europeans in whom both the league and Mr. Koussevitsky have demonstrated their interest by previous performances. The composers are Arthur Honeggar, Alexander Tansman, Maurice Ravel, Serge Prokofieff and Aaron Copland. The league presented chamber music by Honagger and a quartet by Tansman last year and songs of Ravel in 1923. At a lecture recital last season it introduced the young American Copland to his own country with two of his piano pieces.

The concert will mark the first American appearance of Mr. Koussevitsky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization and his soloists will be Jesus Samroma at the piano and Maria Doment, singer.

With Mr. Koussevitsky is associated the renown of introducing pioneer works both in Europe and America. His name has been coupled with every name on this program as a persistent advocate for the early and frequent performance of their works. Several of these new compositions are dedicated to him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
DETROIT, MICH.

NOV 8 - 1925

"Maker of Boston Symphony" Dead

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who received the appellation of "The Maker of the Boston Symphony orchestra" died recently in Vienna at the age of 80.

Commenting on the event the Boston Transcript states editorially:

"To him the debt of American music is heavy, by reason of the stamp of precision, of technical perfectness, of lucidity, which he put upon the work of our country's greatest orchestra. Personally he will be remembered as an artist and a gentleman of the highest quality."

Gericke first came to Boston from Vienna in 1884 and immediately took steps to build the orchestra into the notable organization it was before the war. He introduced standards of discipline and musicianship previously unknown and caused violent criticism through his radical changes. "We are thankful," exclaimed one critic of his course, "that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson," humorously referring to Major Henry L. Hig-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 8 1925

The Pathetic Symphony of Tchaikovsky will be the principal number on the opening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence to take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 17th. The reading by Mr. Koussevitsky of this music of his own people is considered one of the most striking and altogether remarkable things he has done in his American career, to date.

Other numbers will be Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun"; and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fantastical musical setting of Goethe's ballad of the same name.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of this week single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

NOV 6 - 1925

Bostonians In Delightful Concert Here

Audience Which Fills Bailey Hall Acclaims Serge Koussevitzky and His Symphony Orchestra in First of Cornell University Concert Series

Serge Koussevitzky appeared for the second time in Bailey Hall last evening as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led through a long and exacting program, though one of popular appeal, to the evident delight of an audience which filled eery seat in the auditorium, overflowed into the corridors, and encored relentlessly.

The mainstay of the concert was Tchaikovsky's Symphony "Pathetic," No. 6, in B minor, which was given a highly colored and impressive reading, particularly notable in the second movement with its persistent drum beat, giving a foretaste of the final tragedy. As in O'Neil's drama of fear in the setting of the forest, so in this trio, "death beats the drum," and the emotional effect is instantaneous.

The novelty of the evening was a short sketch, or rather a series of sketches, by the modernist, Ibert, called "Escales," (Ports of Call)—a number which was recently given its first American hearing by the Boston Symphony, and which elicited much enthusiasm. The music is of the descriptive variety with a more or less clearly marked motif for each of the three Mediterranean ports as represented in the three movements—Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. The first is much broken and varied, highly exotic and strange, but somehow suggestive of the tumult of a southern port. The second presents a slow weird phrase, unmistakably oriental in tone, and the last is as obviously Spanish, though the dance is frequently interrupted by the noises of the harbor. Repeated and prolonged applause, the most persistent of the evening, followed this number.

Less notable, but entirely enjoyable, were the first and last numbers—Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and three selections from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz.

The conductor has rearranged his orchestra with all the violins massed to his left, the violas on his right, and the two harps on the right instead of the left, as they have usually been placed. This, however, is only one indication of his originality and willingness to try experiments, and no one will deny that the effects which he achieves are remarkable and stirring.

Leader of Mannerisms

Mr. Koussevitsky also showed himself last evening to be a leader of many mannerisms, whether consciously or otherwise, but his idiosyncracies lie rather in the direction of unexpected calm in a moment of stress, or immobility during a forte passage than in the opposite way of violent exertion.

The printed program with its comprehensive notes on the composers and the compositions was arranged with the usual care given to these resumes by the Boston Symphony, and the unexpected was amusingly introduced in the form of a short reprint from the Manchester Guardian (England) entitled "Another Heresy Hunt" and concerned with instructions said to have been recently issued to the police of Washington to suppress the playing of "indecent music."

As usual a considerable number of the audience arrived after the concert was half over but their absence was not missed as the hall seemed crowded from the beginning.

The always notable concert of the Boston Symphony was last evening perhaps more enjoyable than any which have been given in this city in recent years. Certainly it was received with unbounded enthusiasm. The program was the first of the University concert series which this year offers unusually attractive variety. The second will be given on December 11 by Percy Grainger, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 7 1925

Big Ovation Given Boston Orchestra

Program at Mosque Is One of Familiar Numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, opened the orchestral season last night at the Mosque. A more auspicious beginning cannot be remembered, the orchestra somewhat changed and rejuvenated, played better than it has at any previous concert. There was the customary finish and fire, plus the utmost delicacy and finesse. Koussevitzky has worked wonders with these men; his style is the direct antithesis of Pierre Monteux, and he builds a mighty climax without losing instrumental timbres.

The program presented by Koussevitzky contained one novelty; the rest being familiar numbers to symphony audiences. In the Von Weber overture to "Euryanthe" there was a magnificent glowing tone and a faithful regard for French horns and woodwinds.

In the Tschaikowsky "sixth" symphony Koussevitzky and the orchestra seemed to rise to its greatest heights. It was a marvelous reading of this famous work. The strings were particularly glowing in the opening movement and the "Allegro" was a happy reading of this perplexing ghythm. The "Allegro vivace" was given a terriffic tempo and finished with a mighty fostissmo. In the finale or "Adagio Lamentoso" there was the conventional sombre and sinister effects plus a gorgeous piece of phrasing. It would be hard to say when Pittsburgh has heard a more impressive reading of this symphony.

Ibert's "Escales" or "Ports-of-Call" was characteristically modern: short themes, unsustained movements, clashing tints and lovely nuances. It is orchestrated a la mode, from xlyophone to celesta, and much is made of those instruments. The three movements are supposed to be Mediterranean impressions. The first being Palermo, the second Tunis and the third Valencia. In the Palermo episode there was a riot of color, the Tunis-Nefta was an oboe wailing and whining after the manner of the Tunisians, and the third was delightfully Spanish with castanets and figures. Koussevitzky made much of his solo material and color-qualities.

The program closed with Berlioz scenes from "The Damnation of Faust." In the minuet there was the customary flute duo phrases. The "Ballet of the Sylphs" was a charming piece of consordino playing. The "Rakoczky March" was given a valiant and somewhat blaring interpretation. The audience was large and gave Koussevitzky and the orchestra an ovation.

HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 7 1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
Conductor of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Coming to the Capitol Theater, February 7, in the Sedgwick Concert Coorse.

Koussevitsky Comng.

Giovanni Martinelli, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company and Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, both started their musical careers as instrumentalists, in contrast to their present method of expression. Martinelli began by playing the clarinet and Koussevitsky the double bass.

Giovanni Martinelli is a good clarinet player. In fact he played this instrument in his regimental band when he was doing his military service in Italy, and it was only by chance that his marvelously pure and powerful voice was discovered.

Serge Koussevitsky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. To-day sees Martinelli, one of the world's greatest tenors, and Koussevitsky, the foremost conductor of the world and one of the most impressive figures in the music world.

Frank A. Sedgwick, manager of the Sedgwick Concerts, will bring these outstanding events to Hartford this season, two Sunday afternoons at the Capitol theater. The Martinelli recital is scheduled for January 24 and the Boston Symphony orchestra on February 7. The subscription sale is now open and seats may be obtained at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager. Detailed information may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 8 1925

Because its home-town concerts are all fully subscribed, a new "historical" series on five Tuesday afternoons has just been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will increase the number of Koussevitzky's concerts in Greater Boston to seventy-three, as against fifty-nine five years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 8 1925

Koussewitsky Leads First League Concert

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY will open the League of Composers series of three evening concerts devoted to new music at Town Hall on Saturday night, Nov. 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for Dec. 29, with Willem Mengelberg conducting De Falla's marionette opera, "El Retablo."

The opening program includes new works of modern Americans and Europeans, in whom both the league and Mr. Koussewitsky have shown their interest by previous performances. The composers are Arthur Honegger, Alexander Tansman, Maurice Ravel, Serge Prokofieff and Aaron Copland. The league presented chamber music by Honegger and a quartet by Tansman last year, and songs of Ravel in 1923.

The concert will mark the first American appearance of Mr. Koussewitsky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. This arrangement is made by kind permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization, and his soloist will be Jesus Sanroma at the piano and Maria Dormont, singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 8 1925

WILHELM GERICKE, WHO MADE THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

New York Telegram.

The death of Wilhelm Gericke in his eighty-first year should remind all musical Americans of the debt they owe this extraordinary orchestral drill master and conductor. Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1905. In his first period of service he gathered together elements over which George Henschel had presided with an enthusiasm that lacked experience and wrought them into a symphonic orchestra of the first class. It was still the orchestra of Gericke's creation to which he returned nine years later in succession to Emil Paur, who himself had succeeded Arthur Nikisch. During his second incumbency there was never any question of the Boston band's being unsurpassed in the whole world, if, indeed, it had an equal.

Nor was Gericke only a great drill master. He possessed a fine sense of program-making, and in an absolutely non-spectacular way he was an admirable interpreter. A musician of classical tradition, he doubtless believed that every subscriber to his Boston concerts should hear each symphony of Beethoven at least once in the course of two years, and he made his programs accordingly. But he was conscientious in the introduction of new music. Nobody who heard the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss as led by him is likely to forget it, and few subsequent conductors have given so eloquent an account of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Wilhelm Gericke were the orchestral standard setters for all America in those days. Many who went to their first symphonic concerts at that time—and they were by no means limited to residents of Boston and Cambridge—gained a conception of what concerts may be that nothing heard since, however fine, can dispel.

Wilhelm Gericke, a sincere artist and an unsparing workman, deserves to rank as one of the pre-eminent educators in the artistic history of America.

---

present were Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Goossens, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Kunz, Mrs. Edward W. Mulligan, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Carnahan and Mrs. Jennie Beach Mumford.

---

evening concerts, Nov. 28 and Dec. 29.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who had accepted by permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in this country outside the concerts of that organiation. He will conduct a programme of new works recently completed by young men in Europe as well as America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

141

NOV 8 1925

Koussevitsky to Play New Works for League

Serge Koussevitsky will open the League of Composers' series of three evening concerts devoted to new music, at Town Hall on Saturday night, November 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for December 29, with William Mengelberg conducting "El Establo," de Falla's opera with marionettes.

The opening program presents new works of modern Americans and Europeans in whom both the league and Mr. Koussevitsky have demonstrated their interest by previous performances. The composers are Arthur Honeggar, Alexander Tansman, Maurice Ravel, Serge Prokofieff and Aaron Copland. The league presented chamber music by Honagger and a quartet by Tansman last year and songs of Ravel in 1923. At a lecture recital last season it introduced the young American Copland to his own country with two of his piano pieces.

The concert will mark the first American appearance of Mr. Koussevitsky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization and his soloists will be Jesus Samroma at the piano and Maria Doment, singer.

With Mr. Koussevitsky is associated the renown of introducing pioneer works both in Europe and America. His name has been coupled with every name on this program as a persistent advocate for the early and frequent performance of their works. Several of these new compositions are dedicated to him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
DETROIT, MICH.

NOV 8 - 1925

"Maker of Boston Symphony" Dead

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who received the appellation of "The Maker of the Boston Symphony orchestra" died recently in Vienna at the age of 80.

Commenting on the event the Boston Transcript states editorially:

"To him the debt of American music is heavy, by reason of the stamp of precision, of technical perfectness, of lucidity, which he put upon the work of our country's greatest orchestra. Personally he will be remembered as an artist and a gentleman of the highest quality."

Gericke first came to Boston from Vienna in 1884 and immediately took steps to build the orchestra into the notable organization it was before the war. He introduced standards of discipline and musicianship previously unknown and caused violent criticism through his radical changes. "We are thankful," exclaimed one critic of his course, "that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson," humorously referring to Major Henry L. Higginson, financial supporter of the orchestra for many years.

The result of his new methods, however, caused the orchestra to become recognized in Boston and throughout this country. Gericke remained at the head for five years and then was succeeded by Nikisch, who was followed by Paur. Then for a second term of eight years, from 1898 to 1905, Gericke again directed. His declining years were spent in Vienna, substantial proceeds from a benefit concert in Boston providing him with requisite comforts.

---

numbers will be Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun"; and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fantastical musical setting of Goethe's ballad of the same name.

Season tickets for the series of five concerts are still being sold at Steinert's. If any remain at the end of this week single tickets will be sold for the opening concert beginning Saturday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

142

NOV 9 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT.

The real musical treat of the season comes to the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 7, at which time Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the superb direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The occasion marks the second local appearance of this distinguished Russian. Mr. Koussevitsky has enlarged the orchestra to 108 players and reports from Boston indicate that orchestra is at the height of its powers as a symphonic organization. Mr. Koussevitsky has lately returned from France where he has been conducting his own orchestra. He was the recipient of the highest praise from the press, and was honored by the French government and the leading French composers. His coming to Hartford may be regarded as one of the outstanding musical events of the season. The Sedgwick concerts also offer Giovanni Martinelli, the leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He will be heard at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail may be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager. Prospectus with full details will be mailed upon request.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

V 9 1925

Sedgewick Concert Course

The real musical treat of the season comes to the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, at which time Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the superb direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The occasion marks the second local appearance of this distinguished Russian and his coming is eagerly awaited by all classes of music lovers. Mr. Koussevitsky has enlarged the orchestra to the number of 108 players and reports from Boston indicate that the orchestra is at the height of its powers as a symphonic organization. In fact there are those who hail it as the world's greatest orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitsky has lately returned from France, where he has been conducting his own orchestra. He was the recipent of the highest praise from the press, and was signally honored by the French government and the leading French composers. His coming to Hartford may be regarded as one of the outstanding musical events of the season and a soldout house will no doubt greet the great conductor.

The Sedgwick concerts also offer Giovanni Martinelli, the leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company. He will be heard at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager. Prospectus with full details will be mailed upon request.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1 8 1925

At the Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Sunday afternoon next the Ninth Symphony

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

NOV 1 0 1925

PLAN 73 CONCERTS

Because its home-town concerts are all fully subscribed, a new "historical" series on five Tuesday afternoons has just been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will increase the number of Koussevitzky's concerts in Greater Boston to seventy-three, as against fifty-nine five years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 9 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY AS BOSTON LEADER

Boston Symphony Gives Two Concerts Here Under Famous Conductor

The concert season of 1925-26 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in Washington twice this season under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, is brighter than any season that famous organization has faced since the days of Doctor Karl Muck, for once again, seating reservations are proving inadequate to the demand of the public, both in Boston and New York.

The waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets to the Boston concerts has already reached the number of 1,000 names. The total number of concerts to be given in Greater Boston this season has been increased to seventy-three by the addition of a new historical series, as compared with a total of fifty-nine concerts five years ago.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass. As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in western Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concerts. In London, every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as "guest conductor" of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The demand for seats for the Boston Symphony concerts throughout the East is the heaviest in history and Hartford is no exception to this rule, for the local demand is very heavy and music lovers who contemplate hearing this wonderful orchestra at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, will do well to procure seats at once. They will be found on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, under whose management the Boston Symphony concert and Martinelli recital Sunday afternoon, January 24, come to Hartford this season.

This great demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian director of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Coming to this country a year ago, with a wonderful reputation to herald him, Koussevitsky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG,
PA.
PATRIOT

NOV 1 0 1925

HISTORICAL SERIES

Because its home-town concerts are all fully subscribed, a new "historical" series on five Tuesday afternoons has just been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will increase the number of Koussevitzky's concerts in Greater Boston to seventy-three, as against fifty-nine five years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 1 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERTS.

A year ago Serge Koussevitsky was known to the American public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music.

His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus about no other seems to have been so high and so unqualified. His reception here last season was sensational and his reappearance here at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 7, is being eagerly awaited by music lovers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who also will present Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, in a song recital at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24.

The seats are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and mail orders may be directed to Mr. Sedgwick at this address. A prospectus will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 11 1925

noun
dan ha.

Serge Prokofieff returns to America Jan. 1 for a three months visit. According to "Pro Musica," Mr. Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra will introduce his new violin concerto to America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 11 1925

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra for Friday and Saturday this week includes a Sinfonietta of Tansman for small orchestra: Debussy's orchestral arrangement of Satie's "Gymnopedies;" Chabrier's "Bouree Fantasque;" Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Schenerazade."

"Pro Musica," an association formerly known as the Franco-American Musical Society, in the current issue of its magazine, has an appreciative article on Erik Satie, who it will be remembered, died only last June. The "Gymnopedies" is one of the best known of his piano works, and with the "Sarabandes" was orchestrated by Debussy, whose friend he was. One of Satie's musical aims was to encourage a return to the truly French style of Couperin, Chambonnieres and Rameau, thus restoring to French music something

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 1 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The demand for seats for the Boston Symphony concerts throughout the East is the heaviest in history and Hartford is no exception to this rule, for the local demand is very heavy and music lovers who contemplate hearing this wonderful orchestra at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, will do well to procure seats at once. They will be found on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, under whose management the Boston Symphony concert and Martinelli recital Sunday afternoon, January 24, come to Hartford this season.

This great demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian director of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Coming to this country a year ago, with a wonderful reputation to herald him, Koussevitsky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 1 0 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE

Tickets for Concerts On Sale at McCoy's Music Store.

The demand for seats for the Boston Symphony concerts throughout the east is the heaviest in its entire history and Hartford is no exception to this rule, for the local demand is very heavy and music lovers who contemplate hearing this wonderful orchestra at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7, will do well to procure seats at once. They will be found on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick under whose management the Boston Symphony concert and Martinelli recital Sunday afternoon, January 24, comes to Hartford this season.

This great demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian director of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Coming to this country a year ago, with a wonderful reputation to herald him, Koussevitsky, appearing over the famous orchestra, which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 1 1925

Sedgwick Concerts.

A year ago, Serge Koussevitsky was known to our public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and on striking personality in music.

His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europes foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems to have been so high and so unqualified. His reception here last season was sensational and his reappearance here at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, is being eagerly awaited by music lovers. The Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick who also will present Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, in a song recital at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, January 24.

The seats are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and mail orders may be directed to Mr. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 2 192

to 1

SEDGWICK CONCERTS.

A musical event of compelling charm will take place at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 7, when Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the second time in this city under the distinguished direction of Serge Koussevitsky. In his every appearance in this country he has been acclaimed the peer of all conductors.

In Europe, Koussevitsky likewise remains a dominant figure. Last summer, his "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris and his series of guest appearance over the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. In June, Koussevitsky was decorated by France as Chevallier of the Legion of Honor. The official honor was the moving cause of an artistic one. The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation, for which they wrote and performed special music. Probably no conductor has ever had so remarkable a tribute.

The Sedgwick concerts for this season also offer Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company in a song recital at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon January 24. The seats for both events are now on sale at McCoy's Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and orders by mail may be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus with detailed information will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

1 2 1925

Sedgwick Concert Course.

A musical event of compelling charm will occur in the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7, when Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for the second time in this city under the distinguished direction of Serge Koussevitsky. In his every appearance in this country he has been acclaimed the peer of all conductors.

In Europe, Koussevitsky likewise remains a dominant figure. Last summer, his "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances over the London Symphony orchestra were again the event of the season. In June, Koussevitsky was decorated by France as Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. The official honor was the moving cause of an artistic one. The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation for which they wrote and performed special music. Probably no conductor has ever had so remarkable a tribute.

The Sedgwick concerts for this season also offer Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, in a song recital at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and orders by mail may be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus with detailed information will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OV 1 5 1925

Another week will bring to town the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its New York series on Thanksgiving Day and plays the next night in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

4 1925

HUB SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Boston Orchestra to Give Concert at Infantry Hall

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its season here under Serge Koussevitsky. The great Russian conductor will be heard notably on this occasion in Tachikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No 6, although the masterpiece is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitsky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The program will open with Weber's overtlure to "Eurypanthe," and also include Debussy's master score, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme which describes a faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounter with a group of nymphs. Singularly beautiful flute passages in this music characterize the faun. Another French number of interest will be Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous score setting forth in tones the incidents of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The few seats untaken by supscription are now on sale for this concert at Steinert's. Subscription tickets are also still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 4 19

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play here in a few weeks, will give its first New York concert of the year on November 26. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 9 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT.

The real musical treat of the season comes to the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 7, at which time Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the superb direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The occasion marks the second local appearance of this distinguished Russian. Mr. Koussevitsky has enlarged the orchestra to 108 players and reports from Boston indicate that orchestra is at the height of its powers as a symphonic organization. Mr. Koussevitsky has lately returned from France where he has been conducting his own orchestra. He was the recipient of the highest praise from the press, and was honored by the French government and the leading French composers. His coming to Hartford may be regarded as one of the outstanding musical events of the season. The Sedgwick concerts also offer Giovanni Martinelli, the leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He will be heard at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail may be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager. Prospectus with full details will be mailed upon request.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

V 8 1925

Sedgewick Concert Course

The real musical treat of the season comes to the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, at which time Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the superb direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The occasion marks the second local appearance of this distinguished Rus- ian and his coming is eagerly waited by all classes of music lov- s. Mr. Koussevitsky has enlarged orchestra to the number of 108 yers and reports from Boston in- ate that the orchestra is at the ght of its powers as a symphonic anization. In fact there are those hail it as the world's greatest hestra.

Ir. Koussevitsky has lately re- ed from France, where he has n conducting his own orchestra. was the recipent of the highest ise from the press, and was signally honored by the French government and the leading French composers. His coming to Hartford may be regarded as one of the outstanding musical events of the season and a soldout house will no doubt greet the great conductor.

The Sedgwick concerts also offer Giovanni Martinelli, the leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company. He will be heard at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager. Prospectus with full details will be mailed upon request.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1 [illegible]1925

At the Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Sunday afternoon next the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven will be given, with a chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe assisting, and with Jeanette Vreeland, Mme. van de Veer and Messrs. Straton and Patton for the solo voices. The same program will be repeated on Monday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 9 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY AS BOSTON LEADER

Boston Symphony Gives Two Concerts Here Under Famous Conductor

The concert season of 1925-26 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in Washington twice this season under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, is brighter than any season that famous organization has faced since the days of Doctor Karl Muck, for once again, seating reservations are proving inadequate to the demand of the public, both in Boston and New York.

The waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets to the Boston concerts has already reached the number of 1,000 names. The total number of concerts to be given in Greater Boston this season has been increased to seventy-three by the addition of a new historical series, as compared with a total of fifty-nine concerts five years ago.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass. As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in western Europe in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution and which attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concerts. In London, every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as "guest conductor" of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 0 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The demand for seats for the Boston Symphony concerts throughout the East is the heaviest in history and Hartford is no exception to this rule, for the local demand is very heavy and music lovers who contemplate hearing this wonderful orchestra at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, will do well to procure seats at once. They will be found on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, under whose management the Boston Symphony concert and Martinelli recital Sunday afternoon, January 24, come to Hartford this season.

This great demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian director of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Coming to this country a year ago, with a wonderful reputation to herald him, Koussevitsky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of the country.

B[illegible] own concerts are all [illegible] scribed, a new "historical" series on five Tuesday afternoons has just been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will increase the number of Koussevitzky's concerts in Greater Boston to seventy-three, as against fifty-nine five years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 1 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERTS.

A year ago Serge Koussevitsky was known to the American public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music.

His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europe's foremost conductors, the consensus about no other seems to have been so high and so unqualified. His reception here last season was sensational and his reappearance here at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 7, is being eagerly awaited by music lovers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who also will present Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, in a song recital at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24.

The seats are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and mail orders may be directed to Mr. Sedgwick at this address. A prospectus will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 11 1925

noun
dan ha.

Serge Prokofieff returns to America Jan. 1 for a three months visit. According to "Pro Musica," Mr. Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra will introduce his new violin concerto to America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 11 1925

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra for Friday and Saturday this week includes a Sinfonietta of Tansman for small orchestra: Debussy's orchestral arrangement of Satie's "Gymnopedies;" Chabrier's "Bouree Fantasque;" Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Schenerazade."

"Pro Musica," an association formerly known as the Franco-American Musical Society, in the current issue of its magazine, has an appreciative article on Erik Satie, who it will be remembered, died only last June. The "Gymnopedies" is one of the best known of his piano works, and with the "Sarabandes" was orchestrated by Debussy, whose friend he was. One of Satie's musical aims was to encourage a return to the truly French style of Couperin, Chambonnieres and Rameau, thus restoring to French music something of its former movement, lightness and cheerfulness. These views made a deep impression on the younger French composers.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The demand for seats for the Boston Symphony concerts throughout the East is the heaviest in history and Hartford is no exception to this rule, for the local demand is very heavy and music lovers who contemplate hearing this wonderful orchestra at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, will do well to procure seats at once. They will be found on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, under whose management the Boston Symphony concert and Martinelli recital Sunday afternoon, January 24, come to Hartford this season.

This great demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Kousse[illegible]y, the Russian director of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Coming to this country a year ago, with a wonderful reputation to herald him, Koussevitsky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 1 0 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT COURSE

Tickets for Concerts On Sale at McCoy's Music Store.

The demand for seats for the Boston Symphony concerts throughout the east is the heaviest in its entire history and Hartford is no exception to this rule, for the local demand is very heavy and music lovers who contemplate hearing this wonderful orchestra at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7, will do well to procure seats at once. They will be found on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Orders by mail should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick under whose management the Boston Symphony concert and Martinelli recital Sunday afternoon, January 24, comes to Hartford this season.

This great demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian director of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Coming to this country a year ago, with a wonderful reputation to herald him, Koussevitsky, appearing over the famous orchestra, which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectations. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 1 1925

Sedgwick Concerts.

A year ago, Serge Koussevitsky was known to our public only by hearsay. Now, as he begins his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and on striking personality in music.

His conquest of America has been electric and complete. In a country recently visited by all of Europes foremost conductors, the consensus of opinion about no other seems to have been so high and so unqualified. His reception here last season was sensational and his reappearance here at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, February 7, is being eagerly awaited by music lovers. The Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick who also will present Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, in a song recital at the Capitol theater Sunday afternoon, January 24.

The seats are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and mail orders may be directed to Mr. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 2 19

to 1

SEDGWICK CONCERTS.

A musical event of compelling charm will take place at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 7, when Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the second time in this city under the distinguished direction of Serge Koussevitsky. In his every appearance in this country he has been acclaimed the peer of all conductors.

In Europe, Koussevitsky likewise remains a dominant figure. Last summer, his "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris and his series of guest appearance over the London Symphony Orchestra were again the event of the season. In June, Koussevitsky was decorated by France as Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. The official honor was the moving cause of an artistic one. The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation, for which they wrote and performed special music. Probably no conductor has ever had so remarkable a tribute.

The Sedgwick concerts for this season also offer Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company in a song recital at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon January 24. The seats for both events are now on sale at McCoy's Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and orders by mail may be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus with detailed information will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

V 1 2 1925

Sedgwick Concert Course.

A musical event of compelling charm will occur in the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7, when Frank A. Sedgwick will present the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for the second time in this city under the distinguished direction of Serge Koussevitsky. In his every appearance in this country he has been acclaimed the peer of all conductors.

In Europe, Koussevitsky likewise remains a dominant figure. Last summer, his "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris and his series of guest appearances over the London Symphony orchestra were again the event of the season. In June, Koussevitsky was decorated by France as Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. The official honor was the moving cause of an artistic one. The principal French composers grouped together in a concert of felicitation for which they wrote and performed special music. Probably no conductor has ever had so remarkable a tribute.

The Sedgwick concerts for this season also offer Giovanni Martinelli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera company, in a song recital at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Checks and orders by mail may be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick at this address. Prospectus with detailed information will be mailed upon request. These may be obtained by calling 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OV 1 5 1925

Another week will bring to town the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its New York series on Thanksgiving Day and plays the next night in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

4 1925

HUB SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Boston Orchestra to Give Concert at Infantry Hall

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its season here under Serge Koussevitsky. The great Russian conductor will be heard notably on this occasion in Tachikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No 6, although the masterpiece is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitsky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The program will open with Weber's overture to "Eurypanthe," and also include Debussy's master score, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme which describes a faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounter with a group of nymphs. Singularly beautiful flute passages in this music characterize the faun. Another French number of interest will be Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous score setting forth in tones the incidents of Goethe's poem of the same name.

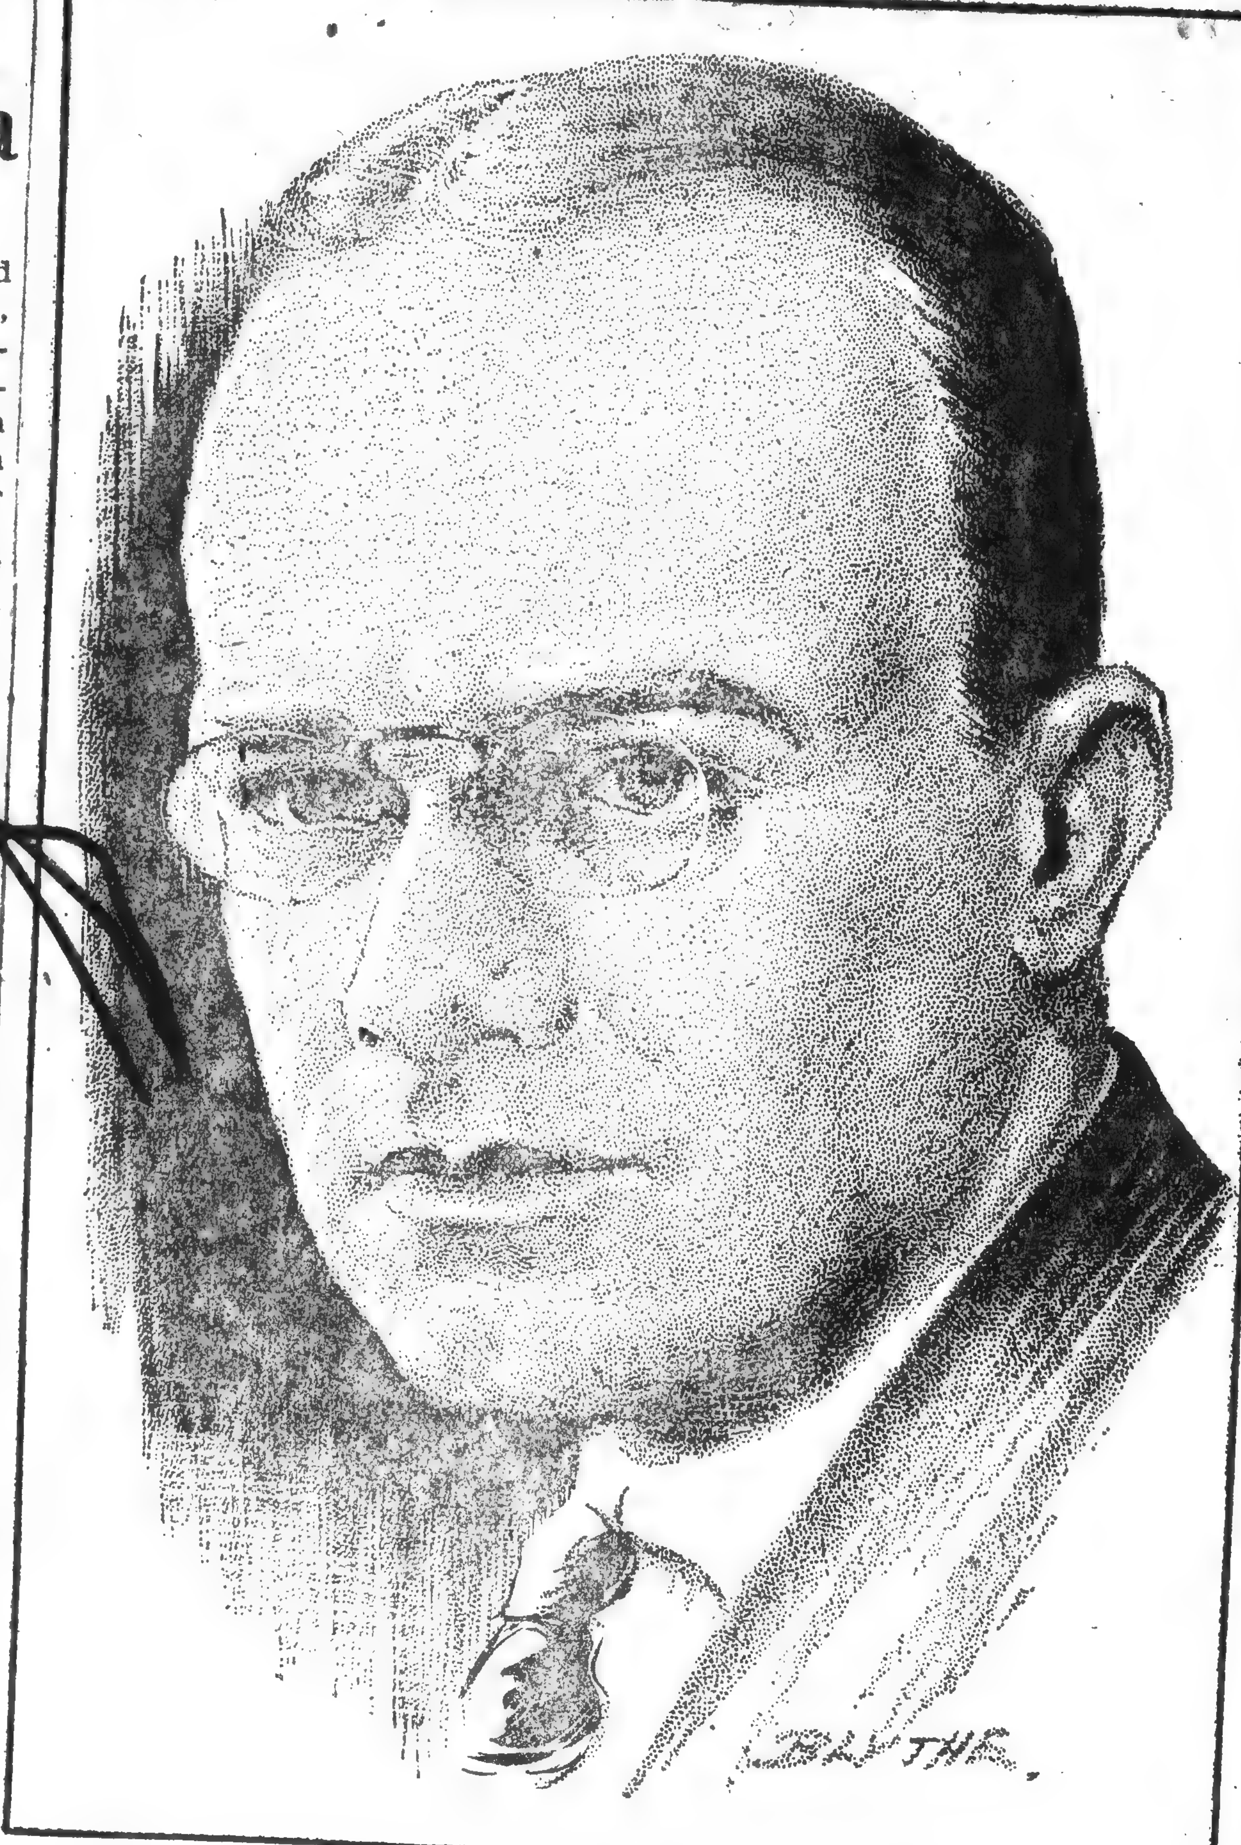
The few seats untaken by supscription are now on sale for this concert at Steinert's. Subscription tickets are also still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 4 192

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play here in a few weeks, will give its first New York concert of the year on November 26. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

N.Y. TIMES NOV 15.



Deems Taylor, Composer of This Week's Novelty, "Jurgen."

vals—
to America

ged the details of the festivals and e minute attention he paid to them, id in caring for the comfort and enoyment of his guests. He was a conpicuous example of the American atron of music of the most unselfish kind. There was no self-seeking or elf-advertisement in anything he did. here was no mention of the name of Stoeckel on or about the "music shed." It was not even inscribed as "founded by Carl Stoeckel." Everything was in the name of the Litchfield County Choral Union. What he did was nobly and unselfishly done; and it will be an everlasting memory in the mind[illegible] those to whom he [illegible] so much.

The death of Wilhelm Gericke in Vienna, 77 years old, will recall many memories and cause regrets in the minds of the elder generation of music lovers. It is probably now only the ageing and infirm who can remember his conducting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the peculiar features of beauty he gave it. And it is presumably only the grayest who can remember the day when he first took charge of the orchestra in 1884. As most know by hearsay, if not by memory, of the fact, he came to Boston to succeed Georg Henschel, the young baritone singer whom Mr. Higginson had put at the head of his newly formed organization three years before. Gericke had much to do to carry on and improve the work of that wholly inexperienced conductor. He brought over some very good players from Europe to strengthen the band; among these were Franz Kneisel, Charles Martin Loeffler, the Adamowski brothers, Otto Roth, Louis Svecenski, Alwin Schroeder and others, to the great rage of resident Boston musicians and their friends. He set to work with a high standard and a very strict method of discipline. He was already a well-known conductor in Vienna when Mr. Higginson brought him to Boston, associated with Hans Richter at the Opera (where among other things he made the first production of Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba") and conducted the concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde and of the Singverein. He thus had a complete mastery and perfect command of the technique of conducting.

He remained in Boston at that time for five years. His health suffered from his strenuous exertions and he returned to Vienna to rest, taking up again there some of the activities he had laid down to accept the place in Boston. In 1898 he came back to Boston to head again the Symphony Orchestra, taking the place that had been filled in his absence by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. He remained this time for eight years, resigning in 1906, to be succeeded by Karl Muck.

Mr. Gericke remained in retirement in Vienna after his final return thither till his death. As a result of the war he was considerably impoverished and his old American friends were glad to make up a fund to ease the last years of his life. His wife and daughter, who have many friends in America, survive him.

Mr. Gericke was one of the most conscientious, self-sacrificing, self-effacing of conductors and one of the severest of disciplinarians. Nobody would ever have thought of calling him a "prima donna" conductor and nothing would have shocked him more than to be so called. There was little that was impressive about his back or about the movements of his arms and hands as he stood before the audience. He was, especially in his later years, tending toward baldness and he wore a beard. He had thus both a lack and a superfluity of the hair proper to the prima donna conductor. He had no mannerisms upon the platform and his thought was only for the music in hand and its "true performance," so as best to represent the composer's ideas. He had little predilection toward "readings." He abhorred anything that bordered on the sensational. His attitude, intellectual and physical, was one of poise. His taste was of the most fastidious. He was, therefore, not a "modern" conductor. He very likely might not have scorned the appellation of "old-fashioned," especially as it would be applied today.

But he was deeply enamored of beauty, of euphony of finish and tonal balance in orchestral performance. He had a "passion for perfection" that he spent on his orchestra in the fullest measure. The tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke reached a quality that no other orchestra I have ever heard possessed in the same degree—a golden beauty, a translucence, a perfect balance and equalization that were built up and achieved by the most painstaking methods, applied strenuously at rehearsals and only audible, not visible, in the performances. The playing of the orchestra was finished and polished to the highest point. Gericke would never present anything to the public till he was completely satisfied with the preparation of it at rehearsal. More than [illegible] he played a piece at the so-called "public rehearsal" on Friday afternoon only to find that the performance did not reach his standard and to withdraw it from the concert on Saturday night till he could make it do so. He counted upon having his forces always completely in hand ready and competent to give the results that he expected.

Some complained of the restraint of his playing in certain pieces. He did not let the brasses go to their limit of tone; he kept them down too much for the taste of some. They never brayed nor blared. No doubt his playing would nowadays seem still more restrained, so used are we to the "modern" methods. He never tore passion to tatters. Some would say that he failed to denote passion at all, save within stern limitations. His taste was catholic and gave his audiences an opportunity to hear things that in his day were "modern"; sometimes, no doubt, beyond the bounds of his own personal liking. But he never failed to seek the most perfect expression of the composer's purposes that was in his power, whether they appealed to him personally or not.

New York had the share in Gericke's work and influence that the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to this city. The playing of the orchestra at its first visit to New York in 1887 was in the nature of a revelation to lovers of orchestral music in this city, and few who were present are likely to forget the enthusiasm aroused at that concert. People stood up and cheered the "Oberon" overture of Weber, waving handkerchiefs. As THE TIMES said after the concert: "If the entrance of a new prophet demolishes some of our old beliefs, unsettles some of our ancient traditions and awakens new longings, let us be thankful wholly for the good the gods provide us."

That was the beginning of a long and affectionate intercourse between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York public. Wilhelm Gericke for long years stood as the representative and creator of its perfections; and in the minds of many who remember them and him his passing will be the occasion of precious memories, now tinged with sorrow.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
Tribune

NOV 13 1925

Former Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in Vienna.

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who put the Boston Symphony in the front rank of the leading orchestras of the world, died on Oct. 27 in Vienna in his 81st year. He was a personal friend of Wagner, Verdi, Rubinstein, Goldmark and many other leading musicians, often assisting them in the preparation of some of their works. According to the report from Vienna by Geoffrey Mott-Smith, and published in last week's issue of Musical America, it was in the fall of 1883 that the late Major Henry L. Higginson heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aida," and he was at once so impressed that he felt that he had found the right leader for the Boston Symphony. The latter organization since its beginning in 1881, had been conducted by George Henschel, an excellent musician, but considered lacking in the experience necessary to raise the orchestra to the rank of the New York Philharmonic and of European orchestras. Major Higginson requested his friends, Epstein and Richter, to broach to Gericke the subject of going to Boston. These musicians retorted that there was "No chance!" but, on complying with his request, they found Gericke in a mood sympathetic to the proposition. A disagreement with the director of the opera, Wilhelm Jahn, had piqued him, and in three days he accompanied Major Higginson to America. Gericke found the Boston Symphony a group of instrumentalists changing from year to year, accustomed to rehearse in easy-going fashion and to playing a large proportion of light music. He at once inaugurated an era of strict adherence to the highest ideals of musicianship. Members were no longer allowed to leave the orchestra before the rehearsal was finished. To assure a permanent body of musicians, Gericke inaugurated a season longer than the customary six months, eking out the year with tours and with popular concerts in the summer. These "pop" concerts also served to allay the dissatisfaction that the early audiences felt on being deprived of the lighter music that customarily had concluded the performances of the early Boston Symphony. It was uphill work, and in his second year Gericke became discouraged and asked to be released. Major Higginson, however, persuaded him to remain. In preparation for the third season Gericke went to Vienna to procure 20 new players. One of the handicaps of the orchestra had been that all the important posts were filled by older men, who found it difficult to adapt themselves to the new regime. Gericke came back from Vienna with a galaxy of young men, such as Franz Kneisel for concertmaster. The disappearance from the orchestral ranks of such accomplished and respected musicians as Listemann and Lichtenburg startled the Bostonians, whose umbrage is reflected in the Transcript's Thanksgiving sentiment: "We are thankful that Mr. Gericke has not discharged Major Higginson."

Gericke's efforts were, however, quickly rewarded. The reputation and success of the Boston Symphony grew apace. After a triumphant tour of the west in 1887, it was invited to New York by Mr. Steinway to play in Steinway hall. After preparations had been made, Gericke pleaded with Major Higginson for a postponement on the grounds that the orchestra was not yet ready to come to New York. The Major pocketed his loss, and not until six months later did the Symphony make its first trip to the scene of Theodore Thomas' triumphs The surprise of the New York critics and public and their unstinted praise vindicated Gericke's conscientiousness. Another change in the programmatic manners of the day due to Gericke was the disappearance of the soloist. Previous to his day the Boston Symphony had never performed without a soloist, the drawing power of whose name was considered essential to the success of the performance. After his sixth program Gericke dropped the customary concerto number. Gericke's great work in the Boston Symphony, aside from his contributions to placing it on a sound business basis, was thus to provide it with a classic repertoire.

In 1889, spurred by throat trouble, Gericke resigned from his position. He returned to Vienna and for the next six years again conducted the Gesellschaft concerts. Illness forced him into retirement. Three years of rest restored his health and he was able to accept an invitation to return t othe Boston Symphony in 1898. Under Nikisch and Pauer the Boston Symphony had continued the high tradition of Gericke. There was some speculation as to whether time had not passed the Viennese by and antiquated his classic loyalties Whereas once they had complained of his "heaviness," the Bostonians now grumbler that he was not receptive to new music! In the face of a liberal outlook that Gericke developed, however, this criticism died. His second term with the Boston orchestra terminated in 1906. He retired to private life in Vienna. His 80th birthday in April of this year was the occasion of a reunion, in which many of his friends from America and Europe gathered to do him honor.

Among the Boston Symphony conductors since Gericke's time were Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud, Monteux, and the present leader, Koussevitsky. While opinion may not be unanimous it is generally conceded that the organization reached the peak of its greatness under Muck, though Koussevitsky, now in his second year, is ranked by some on a par with Gericke and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 14 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NOV 14 1925

SCHEEL was always the follower of the best traditions in his interpretations. He was insistent upon detail and, what was even more important, he had the specialized knowledge of orchestration and of actual performance upon many of the orchestral instruments, to show the players how detail and finesse of execution could best be obtained.

The conduct of the Boston Orchestra at that time was not altogether above reproach. The Philadelphia Orchestra, while far from being a rival of the mighty Boston organization, at that time in the zenith of its powers, nevertheless began to make itself felt, although it must be confessed that the support of Philadelphia was not altogether what it should have been.

Consider for a moment the Boston Orchestra of that time. Franz Kneisel was concertmaster, and with him at the first stand sat Charles Martin Loeffler. Timothee Adamowski, Otto Roth, Jacques Hoffman and others were in the first violins. At the head of the violas was Louis Svecenski, mighty in symphony as in quartet playing, and Alwin Schroeder led the cello section, with Josef Adamowski beside him. Longy, then a recent "first" of the Conservatoire, was conceded to be the best oboeist in the world. Porteau was solo clarinet, and the whole orchestra was a body of virtuosi superior to anything that the world had ever known.

IT WAS against this formidable organization that the youthful forces of the Philadelphia Orchestra were pitted. The giant, however, took measures against the pigmy. First, a second series of concerts on Wednesday evenings was planned by the Bostons and, by a most astoundnig series of "coincidences," the programs of the struggling Philadelphia Orchestra contained a remarkable number of compositions which the Boston Symphony played at its next concert.

But, in the face of this, Mr. Scheel and the Philadelphia Orchestra made progress. It was frequently a task to get a respectable number of persons in the audience at the two weekly concerts, but it was finally accomplished. In those trying days Mr. Van Rensselaer was the saving grace of the orchestra. His enthusiasm, his personality and his sound business sense were all directed to the solution of the many and difficult problems which confronted the organization. Without him the Philadelphia Orchestra must have perished—unheralded and unsung. The organization known today to the musicians of two continents is a monument to Alexander Van Rensselaer. Others have since contributed mightily to the achievements of the orchestra, but Mr. Van Rensselaer was the man who saved it innumerable times when it seemed as though "next week" would be the last.

Carl Pohlig succeeded Mr. Scheel upon the untimely death of the musical founder of the orchestra. His administration of the musical destinies of the organization lasted five years. He was a more than able musician and an unrivaled score reader, but with certain weaknesses, especially in his desire to "cut" every number, which ultimately led to his withdrawal. Even the garden scene from the Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" symphony (about ninety measures long, if I remember correctly) fell a victim to this insatiable desire.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1925

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season here under Serge Koussevitzky. The great Russian conductor will be heard notably on this occasion in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Although this score is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitzky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The program will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and also include Debussy's master score, the "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme which describes a Faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Singularly beautiful flute passages in this music characterize the faun. Another French number of interest will be Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous score setting forth in tones the incidents of Goethe's poemm of the same name.

The few seats untaken by subscription are now on sale for this concert at Steinert's. Subscription tickets are also still available.

VARADY HERE THURSDAY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

143

NOV 14 1925

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra First Concert in Series next Tuesday Eve. at INFANTRY HALL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Serge Koussevitzky Will Give First Concert of Season Here Tuesday Evening.—Recital by Rozsi Varady Thursday.

Outstanding in the music events of the week is the first of the series of five Providence concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Rozsi Varady, noted woman 'cellist, will give a recital at Churchill House Thursday evening, and also of particular interest to local musicians is the first of a series of concerts of chamber music which will take place this evening.

The Boston Symphony includes 108 instruments this season, the largest number in its history, and with the increase in the personnel has come a radical change in the seating arrangement. Mr. Koussevitzky has massed the 34 first and second violins at his left, and the violas are at the right front in the position formerly occu
'celli have to n of t bled rear ing pear
War
prog on t

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER

NOV 15 1925

FIRST LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY DIES IN VIENNA

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who received the appellation of "The Maker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," died recently in Vienna at the age of 80.

Commenting on the event the Boston Transcript states editorially:

"To him the

the war. He introduced standards of discipline and musicianship previously unknown and caused violent criticism through his radical changes.

"We are thankful," exclaimed one critic of his course, "that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson," humorously referring to Major Henry L. Higginson, financial supporter of the orchestra for many years.

The result of his new methods, however, caused the orchestra to become recognized in Boston and throughout this country. Gericke remained at the head for five years and then was succeeded by Nikisch, who was followed by Paur. Then for a second term of eight years, from 1898 to 1905, Gericke again directed. His declining years were spent in Vienna, substantial proceeds from a benefit concert in Boston providing him with requisite comforts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 3 1925

that they had had Harold on the team against Queen's.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Massey Hall To-night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Toronto this morning preparatory to its concert in Massey Hall to-night when, under the leadership of the renowned Koussevitzky, a marvelous program will be given. This is Koussevitzky's first appearance as a conductor in this city, and the concert will be the only one to be given by a large visiting orchestra this season.

The musical world is well acquainted with the achievements of Koussevitzky. His fame as a musician has spread far and wide. Under his baton, the Boston Symphony will, to-night, thrill its listeners as perhaps it has never done before. A number of good seats are still available, but should be secured at once.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 15 1925

Koussevitsky First Virtuoso of Double Bass

MANY a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Frederick Stock, the Chicago Orchestra conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks. Pierre Monteux's instrument as a student was the viola. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard twice in Washington this season, is, however, probably the sole virtuoso of the double bass to attain his present eminence.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Circumstances of his early choice of this instrument are these: When as a boy of 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the double bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first 10 years of his professional career toured Europe, East and West, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a concerto for it, which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy double bass of the modern orchestra, which of course, is built for volume depth of "ground tone." He acquired instrument made by Amati, the il trious Italian and cotemporary Stradivarius, in the seventeenth century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments, considerably smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and infinitely more adaptable for solo purposes. sevitzky's double bass can b ed to an enlarged and deepene retaining all the tonal beaut is more familiar instrument.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

NOV 14 1925

First Symphony Concert

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Providence, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its season there under Serge Koussevitzky. The great Russian conductor will be heard on this occasion in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Although this masterpiece is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitzky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The programme will open with Weber's overture to "uryanthe," and also includes Debussey's master score, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme, which describes a faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Sin-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 14 1925

* * *

Because of the fact that all the home concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been fully subscribed, a new historical series will be given on Tuesday afternoons by this well known organization. This will increase the number of concerts by the orchestra in Boston from fifty-nine five years ago to seventy-three during the present season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 9 1925

New Symphony Orchestra.

Toronto has been rather definitely told that if it wants to keep its orchestra, 1,200 or 1,500 of its citizens must join the Association at the cost of $10 each, for which they will receive ten $1.00 tickets for ten Symphony Concerts—that is, they can maintain the orchestra at the cost of "nothing at all." So far, despite heroic effort and considerable advertising, only 450 have joined the Association. It has been thought that Toronto should know how Boston and Philadelphia, two of the fourteen cities of the United States who maintain orchestras of the first rank, maintain theirs.

The Boston Symphony was financed for many years by Colonel Higginson at the personal cost of one million dollars. The Philadelphia Orchestra is supported by the citizens of Philadelphia. They support it very well, for when, in 1921, there seemed to be some danger of that orchestra going under for want of funds, Mr. Stokowski, fine conductor and astute business man, asked for one million dollars. He got it and $50,000 over. A symphony orchestra is a fine thing—one of the finest things that man has so far created. The two examples above show that it is usually an expensive thing. Is it because Toronto—unique among cities in this respect—has its orchestra for "nothing" that there is still wanting 800 of its citizens to make it possible that it shall keep it?

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
Tribune

NOV 13 1925

Former Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in Vienna.

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who put the Boston Symphony in the front rank of the leading orchestras of the world, died on Oct. 27 in Vienna in his 81st year. He was a personal friend of Wagner, Verdi, Rubinstein Goldmark and many other leading musicians, often assisting them in the preparation of some of their works. According to the report from Vienna by Geoffrey Mott-Smith, and published in last week's issue of Musical America, it was in the fall of 1883 that the late Major Henry L. Higginson heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aida," and he was at once so impressed that he felt that he had found the right leader for the Boston Symphony. The latter organization since its beginning in 1881, had been conducted by George Henschel, an excellent musician, but considered lacking in the experience necessary to raise the orchestra to the rank of the New York Philharmonic and of European orchestras. Major Higginson requested his friends, Epstein and Richter, to broach to Gericke the subject of going to Boston. These musicians retorted that there was "No chance!" but, on complying with his request, they found Gericke in a mood sympathetic to the proposition. A disagreement with the director of the opera, Wilhelm Jahn, had piqued him, and in three days he accompanied Major Higginson to America. Gericke found the Boston Symphony a group of instrumentalists changing from year to year, accustomed to rehearse in easy-going fashion and to playing a large proportion of light music. He at once inaugurated an era of strict adherence to the highest ideals of musicianship. Members were no longer allowed to leave the orchestra before the rehearsal was finished. To assure a permanent body of musicians, Gericke inaugurated a season longer than the customary six months, eking out the year with tours and with popular concerts in the summer. These "pop" concerts also served to allay the dissatisfaction that the early audiences felt on being deprived of the lighter music that customarily had concluded the performances of the early Boston Symphony. It was uphill work, and in his second year Gericke became discouraged and asked to be released. Major Higginson, however, persuaded him to remain. In preparation for the third season Gericke went to Vienna to procure 20 new players. One of the handicaps of the orchestra had been that all the important posts were filled by older men, who found it difficult to adapt themselves to the new regime. Gericke came back from Vienna with a galaxy of young men, such as Franz Kneisel for concertmaster. The disappearance from the orchestral ranks of such accomplished and respected musicians as Listemann and Lichtenburg startled the Bostonians, whose umbrage is reflected in the Transcript's Thanksgiving sentiment: "We are thankful that Mr. Gericke has not discharged Major Higginson."

Gericke's efforts were, however, quickly rewarded. The reputation and success of the Boston Symphony grew apace. After a triumphant tour of the west in 1887, it was invited to New York by Mr. Steinway to play in Steinway hall. After preparations had been made, Gericke pleaded with Major Higginson for a postponement on the grounds that the orchestra was not yet ready to come to New York. The Major pocketed his loss, and not until six months later did the Symphony make its first trip to the scene of Theodore Thomas' triumphs The surprise of the New York critics and public and their unstinted praise vindicated Gericke's conscientiousness. Another change in the programmatic manners of the day due to Gericke was the disappearance of the soloist. Previous to his day the Boston Symphony had never performed without a soloist, the drawing power of whose name was considered essential to the success of the performance. After his sixth program Gericke dropped the customary concerto number. Gericke's great work in the Boston Symphony, aside from his contributions to placing it on a sound business basis, was thus to provide it with a classic repertoire.

In 1889, spurred by throat trouble, Gericke resigned from his position. He returned to Vienna and for the next six years again conducted the Gesellschaft concerts. Illness forced him into retirement. Three years of rest restored his health and he was able to accept an invitation to return t othe Boston Symphony in 1898. Under Nikisch and Pauer the Boston Symphony had continued the high tradition of Gericke. There was some speculation as to whether time had not passed the Viennese by and antiquated his classic loyalties Whereas once they had complained of his "heaviness," the Bostonians now grumbler that he was not receptive to new music! In the face of a liberal outlook that Gericke developed, however, this criticism died. His second term with the Boston orchestra terminated in 1906. He retired to private life in Vienna. His 80th birthday in April of this year was the occasion of a reunion, in which many of his friends from America and Europe gathered to do him honor.

Among the Boston Symphony conductors since Gericke's time were Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud, Monteux, and the present leader, Koussevitsky. While opinion may not be unanimous it is generally conceded that the organization reached the peak of its greatness under Muck, though Koussevitsky, now in his second year, is ranked by some on a par with Gericke and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 1 4 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

NOV 14 1925

First Symphony Concert

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Providence, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its season there under Serge Koussevitzky. The great Russian conductor will be heard on this occasion in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Although this masterpiece is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitzky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The programme will open with Weber's overture to "uryanthe," and also includes Debussey's master score, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme, which describes a faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Sin-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 14 1925

* * *

Because of the fact that all the home concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been fully subscribed, a new historical series will be given on Tuesday afternoons by this well known organization. This will increase the number of concerts by the orchestra in Boston from fifty-nine five years ago to seventy-three during the present season.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 9 1925

New Symphony Orchestra.

Toronto has been rather definitely told that if it wants to keep its orchestra, 1,200 or 1,500 of its citizens must join the Association at the cost of $10 each, for which they will receive ten $1.00 tickets for ten Symphony Concerts—that is, they can maintain the orchestra at the cost of "nothing at all." So far, despite heroic effort and considerable advertising, only 450 have joined the Association. It has been thought that Toronto should know how Boston and Philadelphia, two of the fourteen cities of the United States who maintain orchestras of the first rank, maintain theirs.

The Boston Symphony was financed for many years by Colonel Higginson at the personal cost of one million dollars. The Philadelphia Orchestra is supported by the citizens of Philadelphia. They support it very well, for when, in 1921, there seemed to be some danger of that orchestra going under for want of funds, Mr. Stokowski, fine conductor and astute business man, asked for one million dollars. He got it and $50,000 over. A symphony orchestra is a fine thing—one of the finest things that man has so far created. The two examples above show that it is usually an expensive thing. Is it because Toronto—unique among cities in this respect—has its orchestra for "nothing" that there is still wanting 800 of its citizens to make it possible that it shall keep it?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NOV 1 4 1925

SCHEEL was always the follower of the best traditions in his interpretations. He was insistent upon detail and, what was even more important, he had the specialized knowledge of orchestration and of actual performance upon many of the orchestral instruments, to show the players how detail and finesse of execution could best be obtained.

The conduct of the Boston Orchestra at that time was not altogether above reproach. The Philadelphia Orchestra, while far from being a rival of the mighty Boston organization, at that time in the zenith of its powers, nevertheless began to make itself felt, although it must be confessed that the support of Philadelphia was not altogether what it should have been.

Consider for a moment the Boston Orchestra of that time. Franz Kneisel was concertmaster, and with him at the first stand sat Charles Martin Loeffler. Timothee Adamowski, Otto Roth, Jacques Hoffman and others were in the first violins. At the head of the violas was Louis Svecenski, mighty in symphony as in quartet playing, and Alwin Schroeder led the cello section, with Josef Adamowski beside him. Longy, then a recent "first" of the Conservatoire, was conceded to be the best oboeist in the world. Porteau was solo clarinet, and the whole orchestra was a body of virtuosi superior to anything that the world had ever known.

IT WAS against this formidable organization that the youthful forces of the Philadelphia Orchestra were pitted. The giant, however, took measures against the pigmy. First, a second series of concerts on Wednesday evenings was planned by the Bostons and, by a most astoundnig series of "coincidences," the programs of the struggling Philadelphia Orchestra contained a remarkable number of compositions which the Boston Symphony played at its next concert.

But, in the face of this, Mr. Scheel and the Philadelphia Orchestra made progress. It was frequently a task to get a respectable number of persons in the audience at the two weekly concerts, but it was finally accomplished. In those trying days Mr. Van Rensselaer was the saving grace of the orchestra. His enthusiasm, his personality and his sound business sense were all directed to the solution of the many and difficult problems which confronted the organization. Without him the Philadelphia Orchestra must have perished—unheralded and unsung. The organization known today to the musicians of two continents is a monument to Alexander Van Rensselaer. Others have since contributed mightily to the achievements of the orchestra, but Mr. Van Rensselaer was the man who saved it innumerable times when it seemed as though "next week" would be the last.

Carl Pohlig succeeded Mr. Scheel upon the untimely death of the musical founder of the orchestra. His administration of the musical destinies of the organization lasted five years. He was a more than able musician and an unrivaled score reader, but with certain weaknesses, especially in his desire to "cut" every number, which ultimately led to his withdrawal. Even the garden scene from the Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" symphony (about ninety measures long, if I remember correctly) fell a victim to this insatiable desire.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1925

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season here under Serge Koussevitzky. The great Russian conductor will be heard notably on this occasion in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Although this score is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitzky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The program will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and also include Debussy's master score, the "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme which describes a Faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Singularly beautiful flute passages in this music characterize the faun. Another French number of interest will be Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous score setting forth in tones the incidents of Goethe's poemm of the same name.

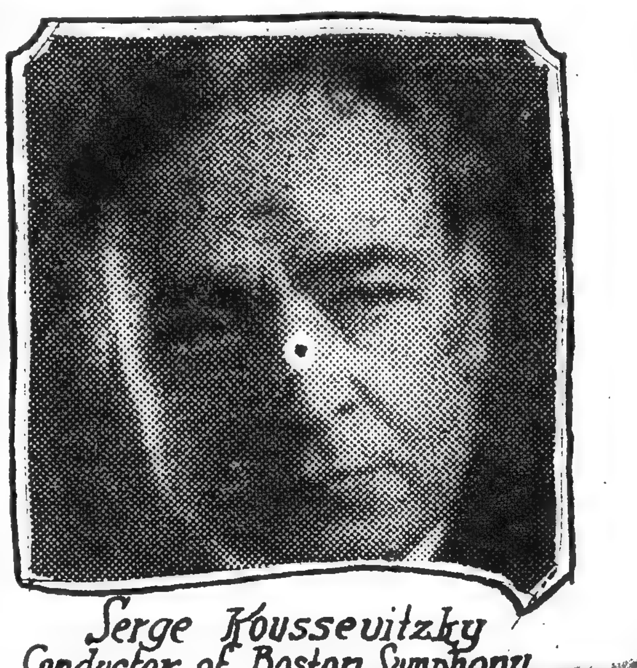
The few seats untaken by subscription are now on sale for this concert at Steinert's. Subscription tickets are also still available.

VARADY HERE THURSDAY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

146

NOV 1 4 1925



Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra First Concert in Series next Tuesday Eve. at INFANTRY HALL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Serge Koussevitzky Will Give First Concert of Season Here Tuesday Evening.—Recital by Rozsi Varady Thursday.

Outstanding in the music events of the week is the first of the series of five Providence concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Rozsi Varady, noted woman 'cellist, will give a recital at Churchill House Thursday evening, and also of particular interest to local musicians is the first of a series of concerts of chamber music which will take place this evening.

The Boston Symphony includes 108 instruments this season, the largest number in its history, and with the increase in the personnel has come a radical change in the seating arrangement. Mr. Koussevitzky has massed the 34 first and second violins at his left, and the violas are at the right front in the position formerly occu
'cell have to m
of t bled
rear. ing
pear
War
prog
on t

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER

NOV 15 1925

FIRST LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY DIES IN VIENNA

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who received the appellation of "The Maker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," died recently in Vienna at the age of 80.

Commenting on the event the Boston Transcript states editorially:

the war. He introduced standards of discipline and musicianship previously unknown and caused violent criticism through his radical changes.

"We are thankful," exclaimed one critic of his course, "that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson," humorously referring to Major Henry L. Higginson, financial supporter of the orchestra for many years.

The result of his new methods, however, caused the orchestra to become recognized in Boston and throughout this country. Gericke remained at the head for five years and then was succeeded by Nikisch, who was followed by Paur. Then for a second term of eight years, from 1898 to 1905, Gericke again directed. His declining years were spent in Vienna, substantial proceeds from a benefit concert in Boston providing him with requisite comforts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 3 1925

that they had had Harold on the team against Queen's.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Massey Hall To-night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in ~~Toronto this~~ morning preparatory to its concert in Massey Hall to-night when, under the leadership of the renowned Koussevitzky, a marvelous program will be given This is Koussevitzky's first appearance as a conductor in this city, and the concert will be the only one to be given by a large visiting orchestra this season.

The musical world is well acquainted with the achievements of Koussevitzky. His fame as a musician has spread far and wide. Under his baton, the Boston Symphony will, to-night, thrill its listeners as perhaps it has never done before. A number of good seats are still available, but should be secured at once.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 15 1925

Koussevitzky First Virtuoso of Double Bass

MANY a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Frederick Stock, the Chicago Orchestra conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks. Pierre Monteux's instrument as a student was the viola. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard twice in Washington this season, is, however, probably the sole virtuoso of the double bass to attain his present eminence.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Circumstances of his early choice of this instrument are these: When as a boy of 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the double bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first 10 years of his professional career toured Europe, East and West, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a concerto for it, which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy double bass of the modern orchestra, which, of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone." He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian and cotemporary of Stradivarius, in the seventeenth century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments, considerably smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and infinitely more adaptable for solo purposes. sevitzky's double bass can be ed to an enlarged and deepened retaining all the tonal beaut is more familiar instrument.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
Tribune

NOV 13 1925

Former Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in Vienna.

Wilhelm Gericke, the man who put the Boston Symphony in the front rank of the leading orchestras of the world, died on Oct. 27 in Vienna in his 81st year. He was a personal friend of Wagner, Verdi, Rubinstein, Goldmark and many other leading musicians, often assisting them in the preparation of some of their works. According to the report from Vienna by Geoffrey Mott-Smith, and published in last week's issue of Musical America, it was in the fall of 1883 that the late Major Henry L. Higginson heard Gericke conduct a performance of "Aida," and he was at once so impressed that he felt that he had found the right leader for the Boston Symphony. The latter organization since its beginning in 1881, had been conducted by George Henschel, an excellent musician, but considered lacking in the experience necessary to raise the orchestra to the rank of the New York Philharmonic and of European orchestras. Major Higginson requested his friends, Epstein and Richter, to broach to Gericke the subject of going to Boston. These musicians retorted that there was "No chance!" but, on complying with his request, they found Gericke in a mood sympathetic to the proposition. A disagreement with the director of the opera, Wilhelm Jahn, had piqued him, and in three days he accompanied Major Higginson to America. Gericke found the Boston Symphony a group of instrumentalists changing from year to year, accustomed to rehearse in easy-going fashion and to playing a large proportion of light music. He at once inaugurated an era of strict adherence to the highest ideals of musicianship. Members were no longer allowed to leave the orchestra before the rehearsal was finished. To assure a permanent body of musicians, Gericke inaugurated a season longer than the customary six months, eking out the year with tours and with popular concerts in the summer. These "pop" concerts also served to allay the dissatisfaction that the early audiences felt on being deprived of the lighter music that customarily had concluded the performances of the early Boston Symphony. It was uphill work, and in his second year Gericke became discouraged and asked to be released. Major Higginson, however, persuaded him to remain. In preparation for the third season Gericke went to Vienna to procure 20 new players. One of the handicaps of the orchestra had been that all the important posts were filled by older men, who found it difficult to adapt themselves to the new regime. Gericke came back from Vienna with a galaxy of young men, such as Franz Kneisel for concertmaster. The disappearance from the orchestral ranks of such accomplished and respected musicians as Listemann and Lichtenburg startled the Bostonians, whose umbrage is reflected in the Transcript's Thanksgiving sentiment: "We are thankful that Mr. Gericke has not discharged Major Higginson."

Gericke's efforts were, however, quickly rewarded. The reputation and success of the Boston Symphony grew apace. After a triumphant tour of the west in 1887, it was invited to New York by Mr. Steinway to play in Steinway hall. After preparations had been made, Gericke pleaded with Major Higginson for a postponement on the grounds that the orchestra was not yet ready to come to New York. The Major pocketed his loss, and not until six months later did the Symphony make its first trip to the scene of Theodore Thomas' triumphs The surprise of the New York critics and public and their unstinted praise vindicated Gericke's conscientiousness. Another change in the programmatic manners of the day due to Gericke was the disappearance of the soloist. Previous to his day the Boston Symphony had never performed without a soloist, the drawing power of whose name was considered essential to the success of the performance. After his sixth program Gericke dropped the customary concerto number. Gericke's great work in the Boston Symphony, aside from his contributions to placing it on a sound business basis, was thus to provide it with a classic repertoire.

In 1889, spurred by throat trouble, Gericke resigned from his position. He returned to Vienna and for the next six years again conducted the Gesellschaft concerts. Illness forced him into retirement. Three years of rest restored his health and he was able to accept an invitation to return t othe Boston Symphony in 1898. Under Nikisch and Pauer the Boston Symphony had continued the high tradition of Gericke. There was some speculation as to whether time had not passed the Viennese by and antiquated his classic loyalties. Whereas once they had complained of his "heaviness," the Bostonians now grumbler that he was not receptive to new music! In the face of a liberal outlook that Gericke developed, however, this criticism died. His second term with the Boston orchestra terminated in 1906. He retired to private life in Vienna. His 80th birthday in April of this year was the occasion of a reunion, in which many of his friends from America and Europe gathered to do him honor.

Among the Boston Symphony conductors since Gericke's time were Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud, Monteux, and the present leader, Koussevitsky. While opinion may not be unanimous it is generally conceded that the organization reached the peak of its greatness under Muck, though Koussevitsky, now in his second year, is ranked by some on a par with Gericke and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

NOV 14 1925

First Symphony Concert

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Providence, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its season there under Serge Koussevitzky. The great Russian conductor will be heard on this occasion in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Although this masterpiece is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitzky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The programme will open with Weber's overture to "uryanthe," and also includes Debussey's master score, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme, which describes a faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Singularly beautiful flute passages in this music characterize the faun. Another French number of interest will be Duke's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous score setting forth in tones the incidents of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The few seats untaken by subscription are now on sale for this concert at Steinert's. Subscription tickets are also still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 14 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE ON TUESDAY

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian Conductor, Will Lead Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season here in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock under Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor. One of the features of the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6.

The programme will open with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," and also will include Debussy's master score, the "Prelude to the afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem by Mallarme, which describes a faun's reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Another French number of interest will be Dukas's Scherzo. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" will also be played. A few seats not taken by subscription are on sale at Steinert's where subscription tickets are also available.

of curled hair and cotton the springs. Marshall Cus comfort and shape for the furniture.
Insist upon seeing the M is the only way to be su lasting comfort!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NOV 14 1925

SCHEEL was always the follower of the best traditions in his interpretations. He was insistent upon detail and, what was even more important, he had the specialized knowledge of orchestration and of actual performance upon many of the orchestral instruments, to show the players how detail and finesse of execution could best be obtained.

The conduct of the Boston Orchestra at that time was not altogether above reproach. The Philadelphia Orchestra, while far from being a rival of the mighty Boston organization, at that time in the zenith of its powers, nevertheless began to make itself felt, although it must be confessed that the support of Philadelphia was not altogether what it should have been.

Consider for a moment the Boston Orchestra of that time. Franz Kneisel was concertmaster, and with him at the first stand sat Charles Martin Loeffler. Timothee Adamowski, Otto Roth, Jacques Hoffman and others were in the first violins. At the head of the violas was Louis Svecenski, mighty in symphony as in quartet playing, and Alwin Schroeder led the cello section, with Josef Adamowski beside him. Longy, then a recent "first" of the Conservatoire, was conceded to be the best oboeist in the world. Porteau was solo clarinet, and the whole orchestra was a body of virtuosi superior to anything that the world had ever known.

* * *

IT WAS against this formidable organization that the youthful forces of the Philadelphia Orchestra were pitted. The giant, however, took measures against the pigmy. First, a second series of concerts on Wednesday evenings was planned by the Bostons and, by a most astoundnig series of "coincidences," the programs of the struggling Philadelphia Orchestra contained a remarkable number of compositions which the Boston Symphony played at its next concert.

But, in the face of this, Mr. Scheel and the Philadelphia Orchestra made progress. It was frequently a task to get a respectable number of persons in the audience at the two weekly concerts, but it was finally accomplished. In those trying days Mr. Van Rensselaer was the saving grace of the orchestra. His enthusiasm, his personality and his sound business sense were all directed to the solution of the many and difficult problems which confronted the organization. Without him the Philadelphia Orchestra must have perished—unheralded and unsung. The organization known today to the musicians of two continents is a monument to Alexander Van Rensselaer. Others have since contributed mightily to the achievements of the orchestra, but Mr. Van Rensselaer was the man who saved it innumerable times when it seemed as though "next week" would be the last.

Carl Pohlig succeeded Mr. Scheel upon the untimely death of the musical founder of the orchestra. His administration of the musical destinies of the organization lasted five years. He was a more than able musician and an unrivaled score reader, but with certain weaknesses, especially in his desire to "cut" every number, which ultimately led to his withdrawal. Even the garden scene from the Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" symphony (about ninety measures long, if I remember correctly) fell a victim to this insatiable desire.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1925

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season here under Serge Koussevitzky. The great Russian conductor will be heard notably on this occasion in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Although this score is well known to audiences in America and the world over, the performance by Tchaikovsky's fellow countryman, Koussevitzky, is said to be nothing less than a revelation.

The program will open with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," and also include Debussy's master score, the "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun," a musical setting of the poem of Mallarme which describes a Faun's dreamy reflections of his recent encounters with a group of nymphs. Singularly beautiful flute passages in this music characterize the faun. Another French number of interest will be Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous score setting forth in tones the incidents of Goethe's poemm of the same name.

The few seats untaken by subscription are now on sale for this concert at Steinert's. Subscription tickets are also still available.

VARADY HERE THURSDAY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
148

NOV 14 1925

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra First Concert in Series next Tuesday Eve. at INFANTRY HALL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Serge Koussevitzky Will Give First Concert of Season Here Tuesday Evening.—Recital by Rozsi Varady Thursday.

Outstanding in the music events of the week is the first of the series of five Providence concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Rozsi Varady, noted woman 'cellist, will give a recital at Churchill House Thursday evening, and also of particular interest to local musicians is the first of a series of concerts of chamber music which will take place this evening.

The Boston Symphony includes 108 instruments this season, the largest number in its history, and with the increase in the personnel has come a radical change in the seating arrangement. Mr. Koussevitzky has massed the 34 first and second violins at his left, and the violas are at the right front in the position formerly occupied by the second violins. The 'cellos are beside the violas and the harps have been shifted to the rignt. In order to make a further gain in the brilliance of the effects, the conductor has assembled the entire brass section in the centre rear. A picture of the orchestra, showing the new seating arrangement, appears in to-day's Artgravure section, and Warren Storey Smith's discussion of the programme is under a separate heading on this page.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 15 1925

Koussevitzky First Virtuoso of Double Bass

MANY a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Frederick Stock, the Chicago Orchestra conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks. Pierre Monteux's instrument as a student was the viola. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard twice in Washington this season, is, however, probably the sole virtuoso of the double bass to attain his present eminence.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Circumstances of his early choice of this instrument are these: When as a boy of 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the double bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first 10 years of his professional career toured Europe, East and West, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a concerto for it, which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy double bass of the modern orchestra, which of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone." He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian and cotemporary of Stradivarius, in the seventeenth century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments, considerably smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and infinitely more adaptable for solo purposes. Koussevitzky's double bass can be likened to an enlarged and deepened cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

W
ceive of th died age of 80.

Commenting on the event the Boston Transcript states editorially:

"To him the debt of American music is heavy, by reason of the stamp of precision, of technical perfectness, of lucidity, which he put upon the work of our country's greatest orchestra. Personally he will be remembered as an artist and a gentleman of the highest quality."

Gericke first came to Boston from Vienna in 1884 and immediately took

He introduced standards of nd musicianship previous-and caused violent critgh his radical changes.

thankful," exclaimed one course, "that Mr. Gericke, oing discharge did not
. Higginson," humorous-
o Major Henry L. Hig-ancial supporter of the orchestra for many years.

The result of his new methods, however, caused the orchestra to become recognized in Boston and throughout this country. Gericke remained at the head for five years and then was succeeded by Nikisch, who was followed by Paur. Then for a second term of eight years, from 1898 to 1905, Gericke again directed. His declining years were spent in Vienna, substantial proceeds from a benefit concert in Boston providing him with requisite comforts.

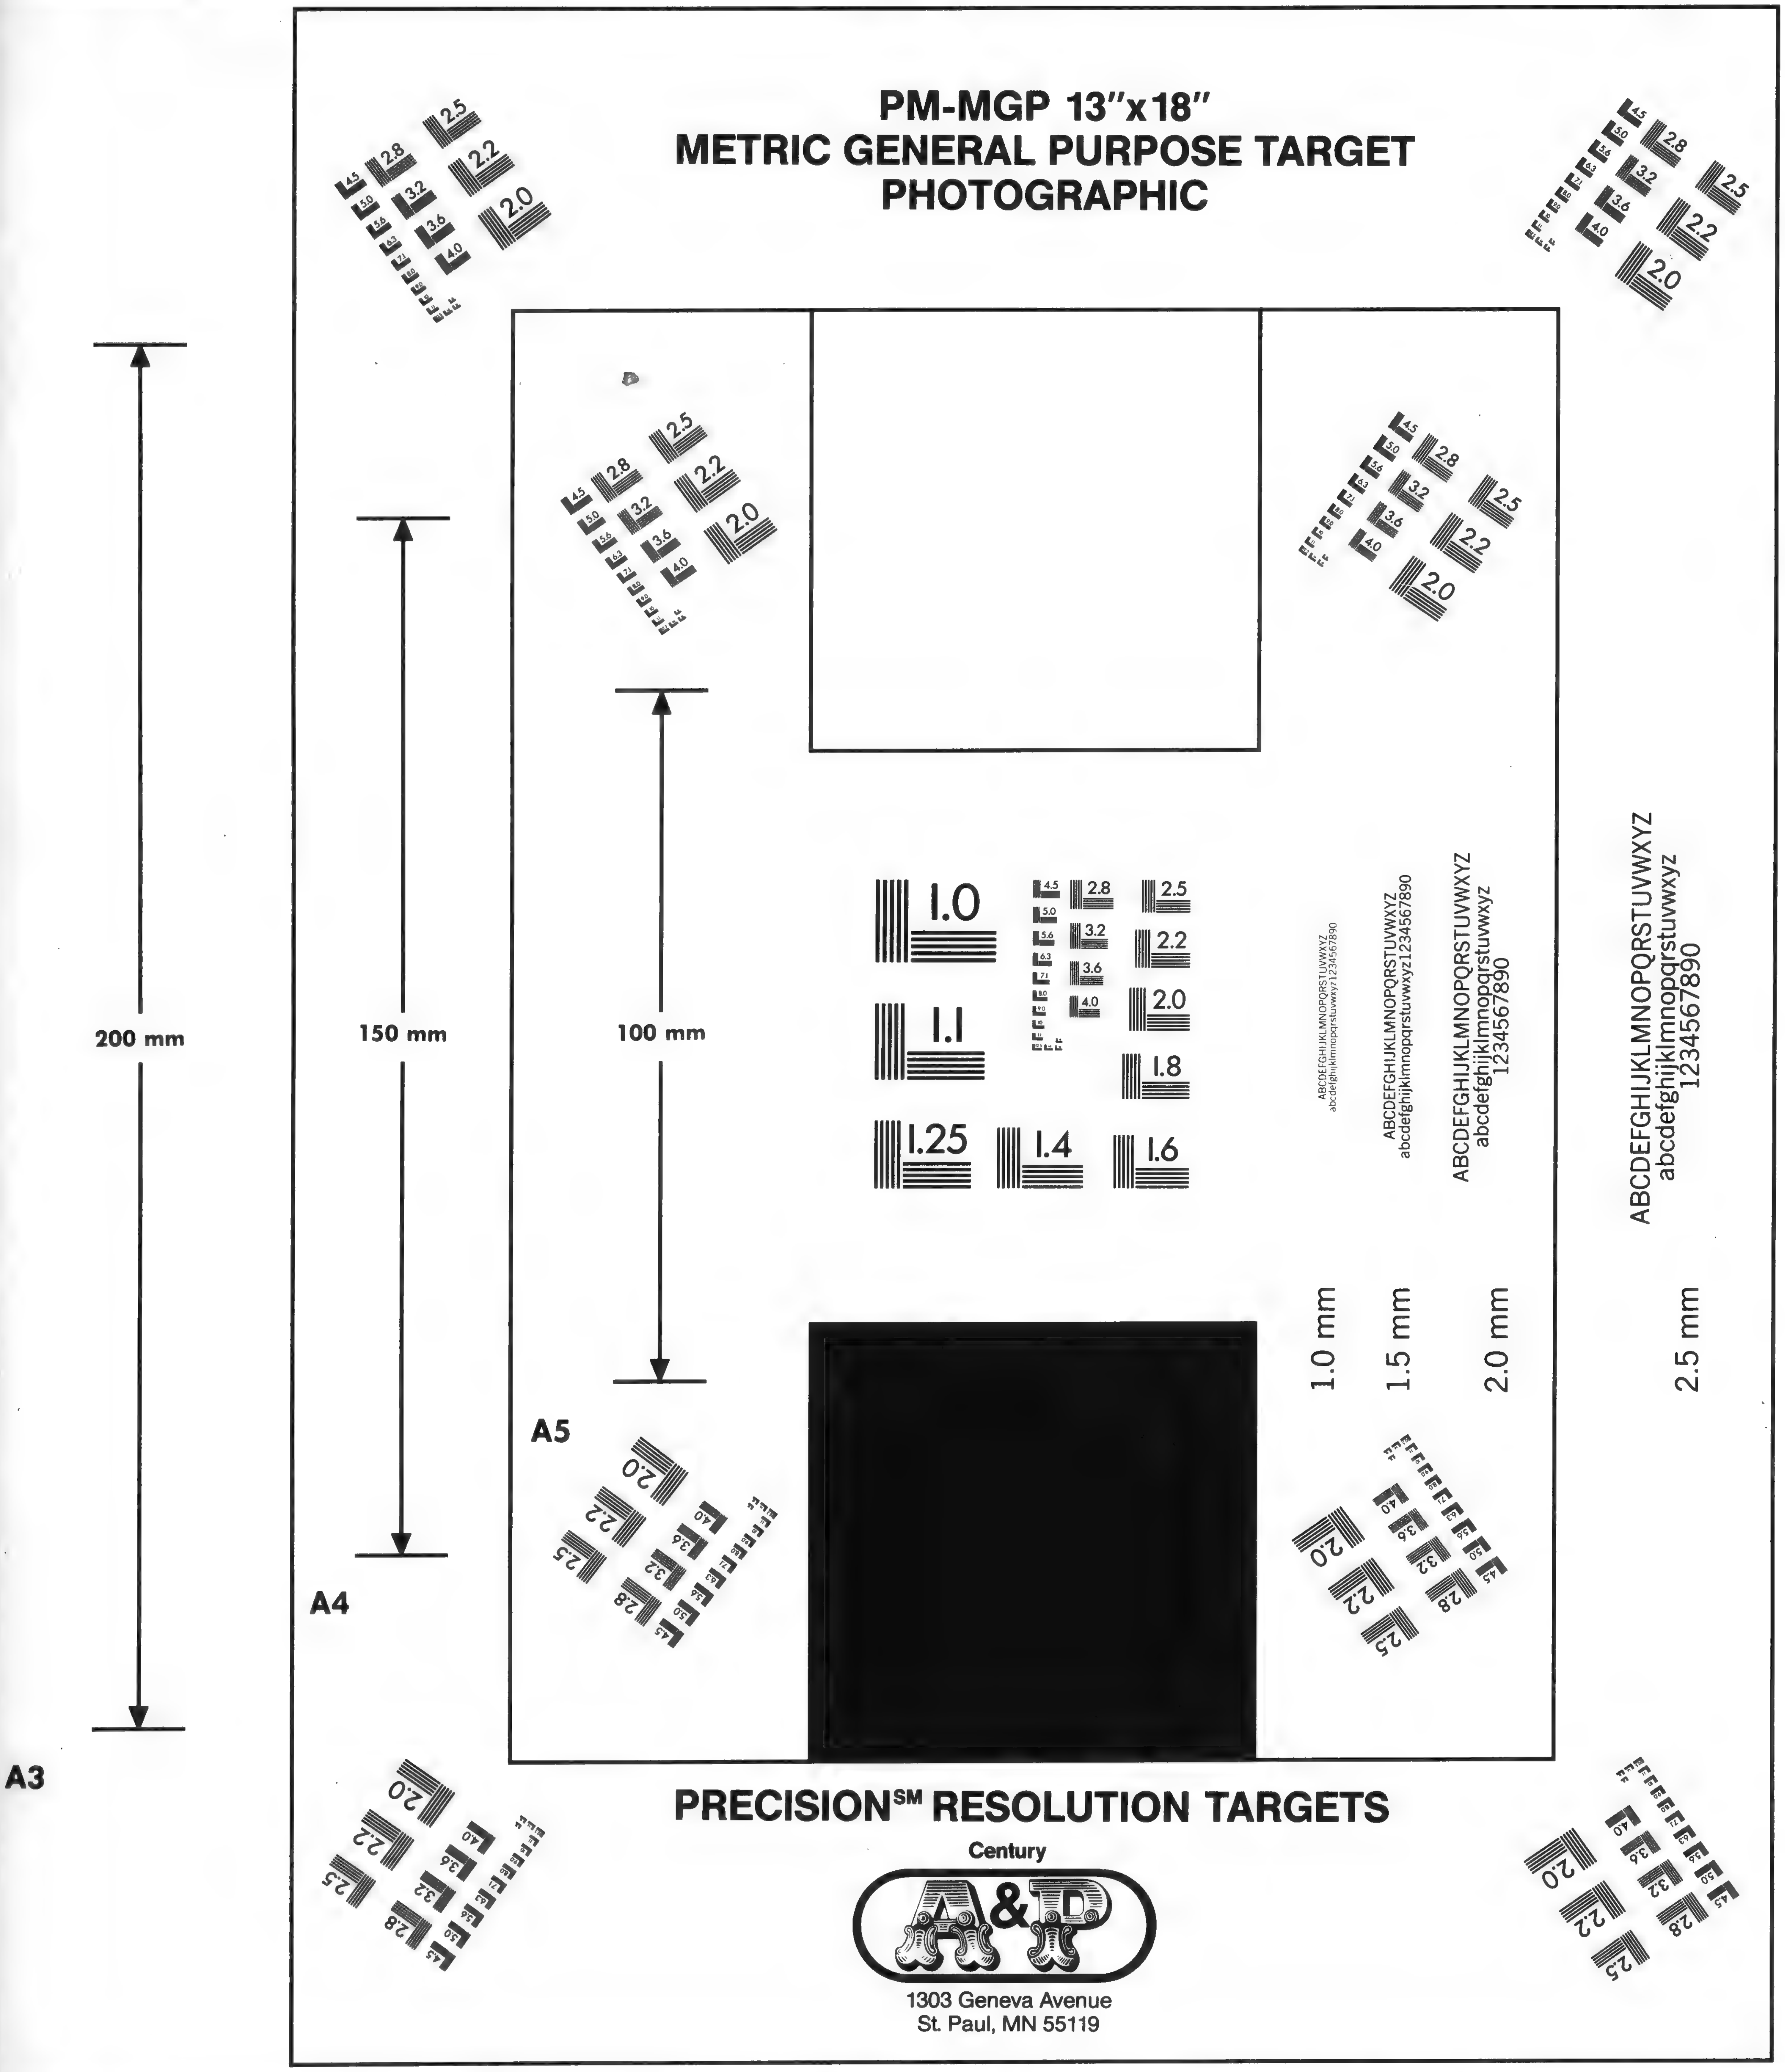
---

will arrive in [illegible]
preparatory to its concert in Massey Hall to-night when, under the leadership of the renowned Koussevitzky, a marvelous program will be given. This is Koussevitzky's first appearance as a conductor in this city, and the concert will be the only one to be given by a large visiting orchestra this season.

The musical world is well acquainted with the achievements of Koussevitzky. His fame as a musician has spread far and wide. Under his baton, the Boston Symphony will, to-night, thrill its listeners as perhaps it has never done before. A number of good seats are still available, but should be secured at once.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
7.1
4.0
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

144

NOV 15 1925

Music at the Library

In memory of Wilhelm Gericke, who died in Vienna on Oct. 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its Boston concert on Oct. 30, paid tribute to its former leader by playing the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The Providence Public Library has this symphony arranged as piano solo, for four hands, and the conductor's orchestral score. Gericke is generally credited with being the pioneer in American orchestral development. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," an historical sketch by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, contains a chapter entitled "The Establishment Under Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889," and a chapter entitled "The Second Term of Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906." The library has a file of the concert programmes given under his leadership, both in Boston and in Providence.

In commemoration of the 150th anniversary of theh birth of Luigi Spontini, an almost forgotten composer, the Metropolitan Opera Company presented "La Vestale," as a feature of its second week. "Musical America," Nov. 7, contains an account of this novelty in an article entitled "Metropolitan to Rekindle Flame of 'La Vestale'." This classic opera with its story of ancient Rome, is in the library's collection of operas. All the other operas given the second week at the Metropolitan, "Tannhauser," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Il Pagliacci," "Madam Butterfly" and "Lohengrin," can be obtained at the library.

Ossip Gabrilowitch, concert pianist and conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, observes the silver anniversary of his coming to America by playing at the opening concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the same concerto which he played 25 years ago, Tschaikovsky's B flat minor concerto. The library has this concerto for piano solo, with the orchestral part arranged for a second piano in the score.

The library has "The Nightingale," found in Brockway's collection of "Lonesome Tunes," folk songs from the Kentucky mountains, one of the numbers on the radio programme given by Eva Gauthier. "A Book of Shakespeare Songs," with musical settings by various composers, edited by Edward Edwards, contains "Hark, Hark the Lark," "Under the Greenwood Tree" and "Who is Sylvia," are also in the library. There are also the Chopin numbers played by John Powell, "Prelude in A-flat," and "Polonaise in A-flat," and Powell's own composition "The Banjo Picker," found in his suite "At the Fair," and David

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Times - Picayune

NOV 17 1925

Wilhelm Gericke

ONE of the few instances of the creation by weight of money and hard work of a true artistic foyer on barren ground was the development of a wide and cultured musical public at Boston through the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Had it been started and then left to its own devices, that enterprise would have met early death and burial like unto most such attempts in America. For years there was a tragic deficit in the budget that was met by the eminent "angel" of the association, and it was only by the slowest and most disappointing progress that a public finally was won to support, from sheer love of fine music, the splendid orchestra. Henry Lee Higginson's was the money and faith that maintained the organization, but one of those who did most in an artistic sense to instruct and win over a musically uneducated public to a recognition and appreciation of the finest in classical music was Wilhelm Gericke, whose death in his native Austria took place during the past week.

Gericke was not the first Boston Symphony leader, that position having been held by Henschel, but he was the orchestra's second leader for whom the ground had been broken by his predecessor. Gericke took the baton in 1884. He led for five years, then gave way for nine years to Nickish and Paur, to return, however, in 1898 to carry through eight years more of triumph.

When Gericke made his concluding bow to the Boston public and returned to Vienna he was fated to see the war's chasm separate his own land from that which he so long had adopted, and there were sad stories of the aged artist's sufferings during the dark days. America had not abandoned him, however, and contributions made by American admirers and by the Boston Symphony itself gave him such comforts as money could buy during the days when there were scant thoughts of music.

And now Gericke is dead, at eighty years. [illegible] did as much as any one man for the cause [illegible] music in the United States, and his memory will be honored.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1925

First Programme of Boston Symphony Concert

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Written Few Days Before He Died, Impressive Feature of Tuesday Evening's Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For many years, in fact from the time when Arthur Nikisch relinquished its conductorship, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra scarcely did full justice to the music of Tchaikovsky.

One could not imagine the precisionist Gericke warming to it. Rather he played it with his customary emphasis upon euphony and finish of detail. Certainly Max Fiedler displayed no special aptitude for the conducting of it, while neither Dr. Muck nor M. Monteux professed any love for it.

And then came M. Koussevitsky to Boston, and once more the fiery Russian had a true champion among us.

Providence as well as Boston and New York heard last season M. Koussevitsky's—and the orchestra's—remarkable performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, and in kind his version of its successor, the so-called "Pathetic" Symphony, which Providence will hear Tuesday evening, is no less impressive.

By now the historical background and the content of the "Pathetic" are so old a story that it should be necessary to recall them only in briefest summary. The prevailing melancholy, the almost-morbidity of the Symphony, coupled with the fact that Tchaikovsky died within a few days after its first performance, gave rise to the legend that in writing it he was haunted by a premonition of his approaching end. But we have it on good authority that during the actual composition of this symphony, Tchaikovsky was in the best of health and spirits, while the attack of cholera which brought about his death was a circumstance wholly accidental. Nor is this the only instance in which the mood of a piece of music has been quite at variance with the composer's own state of mind or body at the time of its composition.

At first Tchaikovsky was minded to call his Sixth Symphony a "Programme Symphony," although he had determined not to make known the programme that had inspired it. The name "Pathetic" was suggested by his brother Modest, and the composer seized upon it with alacrity. Just what the "Pathetic" Symphony did mean to Tchaikovsky as programme music, then, we shall never know. Each hearer must, if he prefers that music have some significance outside itself, interpret it in his own way and to his own satisfaction. The facts of the music are these:

A sombre, almost dismal introduction precedes the first movement, itself predominantly agitated, at times to the point of hysteria, but twice relieved by the songful and sentimental second theme and ending in a mood of resignation. The waltz-like second movement, which is actually in 5-4 time, has an ominous, brooding middle section with a threatening, portentous, reiterated drum-beat that rises and falls. A reminiscence of these menacing strains recurs at the end. Half scherzo, half march, the third movement is one of the most forceful and original in the whole range of symphonic literature. Beginning lightly, almost fancifully, the music gradually rises to a tremendous climax at once frenzied and triumphal. Finally, over the mighty wail that is the last movement much speculative ink has been shed. Music of despair alternates with music of yearning; there is an anguished outburst and at the last a descent into the depths of woe.

In Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and the Fifth we have a recurring theme that suggests relentless fate, but at the end of each comes a note of victory. Not so in the "Pathetic." Here all hope is ultimately vanquished. So much of the composer's programme must be clear to ev the least imaginative hearer.

The remaining numbers on the p gramme M. Koussevitzky has set next Tuesday evening provide abunda contrast, not only to the Symphony b to each other. Weber's overture
"Euryanthe," now in its 103rd year lusty life, is one of the finest flowerin of that epoch in music, which is term the Romantic. Here are the pomps an likewise the fires of chivalry, the accen of heroic love, and, in the celebrated pa sage for muted violins, a suggestion awesome mystery.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon o a Faun," on the other hand, is all half lights and half-shadows. This is music o the pagan world, at once natural and supernatural. Six years before the clos of the last century this prelude came t its first hearing, and for it there was n precedent. At one stroke Debussy has created a new kind of music, the impressionistic. A multitude of composition have since been added unto it, but th
"Afternoon of a Faun" still holds it place.

Born three years later than Debussy his countryman Paul Dukas has already outlived him by nearly a decade. Unlik Debussy, however, Dukas seems destined to be known, as a man of one composition, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," o Tuesday's concert. Based upon the ballad of Goethe, this witty and brilli recount apprent comman then, h word th
so rash the risin music a tive and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 16 1925

Boston Symphony Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky will open the concerts of the Boston Symphony Society the evening of November 26 with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Bruch's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for string orchestra and two new numbers, first time in New York, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales." The second concert, the afternoon of November 28, will consist of Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Tsar Sultan," and Brahms' First Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

NOV 17 1925

Music Jottings

Serge Koussevitzky will open the season of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall ~~on Thanksgiving~~ night and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first he will play Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3, Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, and, as novelties, Henry Fichheim's "Chinese Legend" and "Escales," by Jacques Ibert. On Saturday, Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and "Kikimora"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan" and Brahms's First Symphony.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Unusual Demand Reported This Season for Providence Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will arrive here late this afternoon to open their season in this city with a concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15. The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities, where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following eventful programme for to-night's opening: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE TONIGHT

First Concert of Season to Be Given in Infantry Hall at 8:15 O'Clock

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky were to come to Providence ~~late~~ this afternoon to open their season here with a concert in Infantry hall at 8:15. The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving to be the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following program for tonight's opening: Weber's overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 17 1925

Boston Symphony Season Opens To-night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will journey to Providence ~~late~~ this afternoon to open their season here with a concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

NOV 3 1925

5,000 LISTENED TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

Cheering Followed Rendition of Tchaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetique" at Forum

ONE ENCORE WAS GIVEN

Conductor Was Recalled Four Times After Close of Russian's Composition—Berlioz's March a Favorite

Very seldom in recent years has a musical event drawn such a large gathering as that which last night greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Forum. Nearly every seat in the vast amphitheatre was filled by a brilliant, and at times demonstratively responsive, audience who proved time and time again that Montrealers both understand and appreciate great music played in a noble way.

Fully five thousand persons filled the pit, boxes, and numerous tiers which rise to the high roof on either side of the stage. Added to the imposing sight which the assemblage itself presented, with its animation and brilliant colors, was the truly magnificent spectacle of the orchestra itself, one hundred and ten strong, grouped in a large semicircle on the platform—with massed violins, violas, 'cellos, and double-bass, glittering basses, and tall gilded harps.

RECALLED FOUR TIMES.

In every way, the artists, and especially their conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, fulfilled the most exacting expectations and if anything, enhanced a reputation which was already high in this city. Even in the somewhat arid passages to be found occasionally in a few of the movements of the great Tchaikowsky Symphony, "Pathetique," which was the major work of the evening, the genius of Mr. Koussevitsky was always evident and his great musicianship, seconded by the flawless technique of his artists, threw life and poetry into it all. At the conclusion of this number, the conductor was recalled four times by the applauding multitude and so high did the enthusiasm run that many in the upper tiers of seat broke into cheers. So keen were some to show their enthusiasm that they applauded even at the brief pauses between the movements—a custom, or habit which inevitably proves disconcerting to performers and listeners alike. The leader showed his disapproval by suddenly facing the audience which at once took the cue and hissed down the over-exuberant ones. Though the audience showed plainly that they wanted encores, Mr. Koussevitsky favored them only once, when he repeated the Berlioz Marche Hongroise, the last composition on the programme.

The magnum opus of the evening was the great Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 6, in B minor. The opening adagio movement was delicately rendered, and was finely phrased and shaded throughout. The Allegro non troppo was interpreted in splendid fashion, even though as music it did not prove so interesting as the Allegro con grazia which followed. But it was in the magnificent passage of the Allegro molto vivace, rising at times almost to Wagnerian majesty, that the orchestra touched the summit of its performance. Violins, 'cellos, brasses and percussion wove the weird and powerful harmonies into a picture of crashing armies and things heroic. It was a splendid and awesome achievement, due in great measure to the great generalship of the Koussevitsky baton. In the final movement, the adagio lamentoso, there was some very effective scale work by the violins.

Another composition worthy of particular note was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." The deep mystic quality of the opening measures, rendered mainly by the 'cellos and double-bass, brought to mind nothing so much as the music of a great organ.

The fantastic, at times weirdly grotesque, melodies of "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, also greatly stirred the imagination of the audience. Some very effective pizzicato work by the violins was noticeable, and the brasses and percussion instrumentalists had their opportunity to show that they were not one whit less accomplished than their fellow performers.

Some pleasing effects were obtained in the interpretation of the strange harmonies in Ibert's "Escales." But much greater was the applause which rewarded the performance of Berlioz' Marche Hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust"—a composition which the orchestra played twice, so insistent were the cheers which followed its first rendition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

18 1925

SYMPHONY IS WELL ATTEN

Under Koussevits
Will Write Musica tory in Americ

A crowd which packed Infa to the doors greeted M. Serge vitsky and the Boston Symp chestra in the opening conce
Providence season. Sincere appl given when M. Koussevitsky the stand and he was recalle times at its close for an ovatio he shared most graciously members.

There were several familiar fa
ing in the ensemble last night ral new youthful faces. M. K sky is remaking the orchestra, in new blood, but also in method. The concert last nigh brilliant one, with the hard lustre of a diamond. One felt sentimentalism which used to under M. Monteux has been chased away by the baton o tellectual Russian

This fact was very noticeab bussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-M Faun," the tone poem writ Stephen Mallarme's yet to be eclogue. Under M. Monteux De played with a warmth that almost to lush. Under M. Ko it took on a hard intellectu
There was a firmness in the

The symphony was Tsch sixth, in B-minor, the famil ways magnificent "Pathetic." played last night as it never before in Infantry Hall. Into sevitsky read subtle shades made delicate and touching passages, joyous and gay and like the distant beating made omnious the sombre, d his members the terrible so fate devastating hope an illusion.

The familiar overture to by Weber, was played with
M. Koussevitsky introduced time to a Providence scherzo of the modern Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," setting to music of an old ta retold in a ballad by Goeth sevitsky seems to have a the moderns, their buffooner illusionment, their mocking sacred traditions of conve and reading. The audienc seemed to appreciate wh sevitsky was doing with the ber and applauded him w close.

There is no doubt that un
Russian the Boston Symph tra is increasing in stature
M. Kroussevitsky had the ways under control, co-ord suading, commanding. Th was as responsive as the
of a forceful top sergeant.
Symphony, it is apparent, direction of M. Koussevits write musical history in th

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

144

NOV 15 1925

Music at the Library

In memory of Wilhelm Gericke, who died in Vienna on Oct. 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its Boston concert on Oct. 30, paid tribute to its former leader by playing the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The Providence Public Library has this symphony arranged as piano solo, for four hands, and the conductor's orchestral score. Gericke is generally credited with being the pioneer in American orchestral development. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," an historical sketch by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, contains a chapter entitled "The Establishment Under Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889," and a chapter entitled "The Second Term of Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906." The library has a file of the concert programmes given under his leadership, both in Boston and in Providence.

In commemoration of the 150th anniversary of theh birth of Luigi Spontini, an almost forgotten composer, the Metropolitan Opera Company presented "La Vestale," as a feature of its second week. "Musical America," Nov. 7, contains an account of this novelty in an article entitled "Metropolitan to Rekindle Flame of 'La Vestale'." This classic opera with its story of ancient Rome, is in the library's collection of operas. All the other operas given the second week a the Metropolitan, "Tannhauser," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Il Pagliacci," "Madam Butterfly" and "Lohengrin," car be obtained at the library.

Ossip Gabrilowitch, concert pianist and conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, observes the silver anniversary of his coming to America by playing a the opening concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the same concerto which he played 25 years ago, Tschaikovsky's B flat minor concerto. The library has this concerto for piano solo, with the orchestral part arranged for a second piano in the score.

The library has "The Nightingale," found in Brockway's collection of "Lonesome Tunes," folk songs from the Kentucky mountains, one of the numbers on the radio programme given by Eva Gauthier. "A Book of Shakespeare Songs," with musical settings by various composers, edited by Edward Edwards, contains "Hark, Hark the Lark," "Under the Greenwood Tree" and "Who is Sylvia," are also in the library. There are also the Chopin numbers played by John Powell, "Prelude in A-flat," and "Polonaise in A-flat," and Powell's own composition "The Banjo Picker," found in his suite "At the Fair," and David

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Times - Picayune

1 7 1925

Wilhelm Gericke

ONE of the few instances of the creation by weight of money and hard work of a true artistic foyer on barren ground was the development of a wide and cultured musical public at Boston through the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Had it been started and then left to its own devices, that enterprise would have met early death and burial like unto most such attempts in America. For years there was a tragic deficit in the budget that was met by the eminent "angel" of the association, and it was only by the slowest and most disappointing progress that a public finally was won to support, from sheer love of fine music, the splendid orchestra. Henry Lee Higginson's was the money and faith that maintained the organization, but one of those who did most in an artistic sense to instruct and win over a musically uneducated public to a recognition and appreciation of the finest in classical music was Wilhelm Gericke, whose death in his native Austria took place during the past week.

Gericke was not the first Boston Symphony leader, that position having been held by Henschel, but he was the orchestra's second leader for whom the ground had been broken by his predecessor. Gericke took the baton in 1884. He led for five years, then gave way for nine years to Nickish and Paur, to return, however, in 1898 to carry through eight years more of triumph.

When Gericke made his concluding bow to the Boston public and returned to Vienna he was fated to see the war's chasm separate his own land from that which he so long had adopted, and there were sad stories of the aged artist's sufferings during the dark days. America had not abandoned him, however, and contributions made by American admirers and by the Boston Symphony itself gave him such comforts as money could buy during the days when there were scant thoughts of music.

And now Gericke is dead, at eighty years. [illegible] did as much as any one man for the cause [illegible] in the United States, and his mem- [illegible] will be honored.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1925

First Programme of Boston Symphony Concert

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Written Few Days Before He Died, Impressive Feature of Tuesday Evening's Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For many years, in fact from the time when Arthur Nikisch relinquished its conductorship, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra scarcely did full justice to the music of Tchaikovsky.

One could not imagine the precisionist Gericke warming to it. Rather he played it with his customary emphasis upon euphony and finish of detail. Certainly Max Fiedler displayed no special aptitude for the conducting of it, while neither Dr. Muck nor M. Monteux professed any love for it.

And then came M. Koussevitsky to Boston, and once more the fiery Russian had a true champion among us.

Providence as well as Boston and New York heard last season M. Koussevitsky's—and the orchestra's—remarkable performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, and in kind his version of its successor, the so-called "Pathetic" Symphony, which Providence will hear Tuesday evening, is no less impressive.

By now the historical background and the content of the "Pathetic" are so old a story that it should be necessary to recall them only in briefest summary. The prevailing melancholy, the almost-morbidity of the Symphony, coupled with the fact that Tchaikovsky died within a few days after its first performance, gave rise to the legend that in writing it he was haunted by a premonition of his approaching end. But we have it on good authority that during the actual composition of this symphony, Tchaikovsky was in the best of health and spirits, while the attack of cholera which brought about his death was a circumstance wholly accidental. Nor is this the only instance in which the mood of a piece of music has been quite at variance with the composer's own state of mind or body at the time of its composition.

At first Tchaikovsky was minded to call his Sixth Symphony a "Programme Symphony," although he had determined not to make known the programme that had inspired it. The name "Pathetic" was suggested by his brother Modest, and the composer seized upon it with alacrity. Just what the "Pathetic" Symphony did mean to Tchaikovsky as programme music, then, we shall never know. Each hearer must, if he prefers that music have some significance outside itself, interpret it in his own way and to his own satisfaction. The facts of the music are these:

A sombre, almost dismal introduction precedes the first movement, itself predominantly agitated, at times to the point of hysteria, but twice relieved by the songful and sentimental second theme and ending in a mood of resignation. The waltz-like second movement, which is actually in 5-4 time, has an ominous, brooding middle section with a threatening, portentous, reiterated drum-beat that rises and falls. A reminiscence of these menacing strains recurs at the end. Half scherzo, half march, the third movement is one of the most forceful and original in the whole range of symphonic literature. Beginning lightly, almost fancifully, the music gradually rises to a tremendous climax at once frenzied and triumphal. Finally, over the mighty wail that is the last movement much speculative ink has been shed. Music of despair alternates with music of yearning; there is an anguished outburst and at the last a descent into the depths of woe.

In Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and the Fifth we have a recurring theme that suggests relentless fate, but at the end of each comes a note of victory. Not so in the "Pathetic." Here all hope is ultimately vanquished. So much of the cor poser's programme must be clear to ev the least imaginative hearer.

The remaining numbers on the p gramme M. Koussevitzky has set next Tuesday evening provide abunda contrast, not only to the Symphony b to each other. Weber's overture "Euryanthe," now in its 103rd year lusty life, is one of the finest flowerin of that epoch in music, which is terme the Romantic. Here are the pomps an likewise the fires of chivalry, the accen of heroic love, and, in the celebrated pa sage for muted violins, a suggestion awesome mystery.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon o a Faun," on the other hand, is all hal lights and half-shadows. This is music o the pagan world, at once natural an supernatural. Six years before the clos of the last century this prelude came t its first hearing, and for it there was n precedent. At one stroke Debussy has created a new kind of music, the impressionistic. A multitude of composition have since been added unto it, but th "Afternoon of a Faun" still holds i place.

Born three years later than Debussy his countryman Paul Dukas has alread outlived him by nearly a decade. Unlik Debussy, however, Dukas seems destined to be known, as a man of one composition, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Tuesday's concert. Based upon the ballad of Goethe, this witty and brilli recount apprent comman then, h word th so rashl the risin music ar tive and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 1 6 1925

Boston Symphony Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky will open the concerts of the Boston Symphony Society the evening of November 26 with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Bruch's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for string orchestra and two new numbers, first time in New York, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales." The second concert, the afternoon of November 28, will consist of Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Tsar Sultan," and Brahms' First Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

NOV 17 1925

Music Jottings

Serge Koussevitzky will open the season of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall ~~on Thanksgiving~~ night and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first he will play Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3, Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, and, as novelties, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and "Escales" by Jacques Ibert. On Saturday, Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and "Kikimora"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan" and Brahms's First Symphony.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE TONIGHT

First Concert of Season to Be Given in Infantry Hall at 8:15 O'Clock

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky were to come to Providence ~~late~~ this afternoon to open their season here with a concert in Infantry hall at 8:15. The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving to be the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following program for tonight's opening: Weber's overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Unusual Demand Reported This Season for Providence Concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrive here late this afternoon to open their season in this city with a concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15. The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities, where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following eventful programme for to-night's opening: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 17 1925

Boston Symphony Season Opens To-night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will journey to Providence ~~late~~ this afternoon to open their season here with a concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

18 1925

SYMPHONY IS WELL ATTEN

Under Koussevits Will Write Musica tory in Americ

A crowd which packed Infa to the doors greeted M. Serge vitsky and the Boston Symp chestra in the opening conce Providence season. Sincere app given when M. Koussevitsky the stand and he was recalle times at its close for an ovati he shared most graciously members.

There were several familiar fa ing in the ensemble last night ral new youthful faces. M. K sky is remaking the orchestra in new blood, but also in t method. The concert last nigh brilliant one, with the hard lustre of a diamond. One felt sentimentalism which used to under M. Monteux has been chased away by the baton o tellectual Russian

This fact was very notic bussy's "Prelude a l'Apres- Faun," the tone poem w Stephen Mallarme's yet to b eclogue. Under M. Monteux D played with a warmth that almost to lush. Under M. K it took on a hard intellectu There was a firmness in the

The symphony was T sixth, in B-minor, the fan ways magnificent "Patheti played last night as it never before in Infantry Hall. Int sevitsky read subtle shades made delicate and touch passages, joyous and sa and like the distant beatin made omnious the sombre his members the terrible fate devastating hope illusion.

The familiar overture to by Weber, was played wit M. Koussevitsky introduced timo to a Providence scherzo of the modern Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," setting to music of an old t retold in a ballad by Goet sevitsky seems to have a the moderns, their buffooner illusionment, their mocking sacred traditions of conve and reading. The audienc seemed to appreciate wh sevitsky was doing with the ber and applauded him w close.

There is no doubt that un Russian the Boston Symp tra is increasing in stature M. Kroussevitsky had the ways under control, co-ord suading, commanding. Th was as responsive as the of a forceful top sergeant. Symphony, it is apparent, direction of M. Koussevits write musical history in thi

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

NOV 3 1925

5,000 LISTENED TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

Cheering Followed Rendition of Tchaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetique" at Forum

ONE ENCORE WAS GIVEN

Conductor Was Recalled Four Times After Close of Russian's Composition—Berlioz's March a Favorite

Very seldom in recent years has a musical event drawn such a large gathering as that which last night greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Forum. Nearly every seat in the vast amphitheatre was filled by a brilliant, and at times demonstratively responsive, audience who proved time and time again that Montrealers both understand and appreciate great music played in [illegible] way.

[illegible] five thousand persons [illegible] the [illegible] boxes, and numerous [illegible] which rise to the high [illegible] on either side of the stage. Added to the imposing sight which the assemblage itself presented, with its animation and brilliant colors, was the truly magnificent spectacle of the orchestra itself, one hundred and ten strong, grouped in a large semi-circle on the platform—with massed violins, violas, 'cellos, and double-bass, glittering basses, and tall [illegible] harps.

RECALLED FOUR TIMES

In every way, the artists and especially their conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, fulfilled the [illegible] expectations and if anything enhanced a reputation which was [illegible] high in this city. Even in the somewhat arid passages [illegible] occasionally in a few of the movements of the great Tchaikowsky Symphony, "Pathetique," which is the major work of the evening, the genius of Mr. Koussevitsky was always evident and his great musician[illegible], seconded by the flawless technique of his artists, [illegible] poetry into it all. At the conclusion of this number, the conductor was recalled four times by the applauding multitude and so high did the enthusiasm run that [illegible] upper tiers of seat broke into cheers. So keen were some to show their enthusiasm that they applauded even at the brief pauses between the movements—a custom, [illegible] which inevitably proves disconcerting to performers and listeners alike. The conductor showed his disapproval by suddenly facing the audience which at once took the cue and hissed down the over-exuberant ones. Though the audience showed plainly that they wanted encores, Mr. Koussevitsky favored them only once, when he repeated the Berlioz Marche Hongroise, the last composition on the programme.

The magnum opus of the evening was the great Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 6, in B minor. The opening adagio movement was delicately rendered, and was finely phrased and shaded throughout. The Allegro no troppo was interpreted in splendid fashion, even though as music it did not prove so interesting as the Allegro con grazia which followed. But it was in the magnificent passage of the Allegro molto vivace, rising at times almost to Wagnerian majesty, that the orchestra touched the summit of its performance. Violins, 'cellos, brasses and percussion wove the weird and powerful harmonies into a picture of crashing armies and things heroic. It was a splendid and awesome achievement, due in great measure to the great generalship of the Koussevitsky baton. In the final movement, the adagio lamentoso, there was some very effective scale work by the violins.

Another composition worthy of particular note was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." The deep mystic quality of the opening measures, rendered mainly by the 'cellos and double-bass, brought to mind nothing so much as the music of a great organ.

The fantastic, at times weirdly grotesque, melodies of "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, also greatly stirred the imagination of the audience. Some very effective pizzicato work by the violins was noticeable, and the brasses and percussion instrumentalists had their opportunity to show that they were not one whit less accomplished than their fellow performers.

Some pleasing effects were obtained in the interpretation of the strange harmonies in Ibert's "Escales." But much greater was the applause which rewarded the performance of Berlioz' Marche Hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust"—a composition which the orchestra played twice, so insistent were the cheers which followed its first rendition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1925

First Programme of Boston Symphony Concert

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Written Few Days Before He Died, Impressive Feature of Tuesday Evening's Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For many years, in fact from the time when Arthur Nikisch relinquished its conductorship, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra scarcely did full justice to the music of Tchaikovsky.

One could not imagine the precisionist Gericke warming to it. Rather he played it with his customary emphasis upon euphony and finish of detail. Certainly Max Fiedler displayed no special aptitude for the conducting of it, while neither Dr. Muck nor M. Monteux professed any love for it.

And then came M. Koussevitsky to Boston, and once more the fiery Russian had a true champion among us.

Providence as well as Boston and New York heard last season M. Koussevitsky's—and the orchestra's—remarkable performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, and in kind his version of its successor, the so-called "Pathetic" Symphony, which Providence will hear Tuesday evening, is no less impressive.

By now the historical background and the content of the "Pathetic" are so old a story that it should be necessary to recall them only in briefest summary. The prevailing melancholy, the almost-morbidity of the Symphony, coupled with the fact that Tchaikovsky died within a few days after its first performance, gave rise to the legend that in writing it he was haunted by a premonition of his approaching end. But we have it on good authority that during the actual composition of this symphony, Tchaikovsky was in the best of health and spirits, while the attack of cholera which brought about his death was a circumstance wholly accidental. Nor is this the only instance in which the mood of a piece of music has been quite at variance with the composer's own state of mind or body at the time of its composition.

At first Tchaikovsky was minded to call his Sixth Symphony a "Programme Symphony," although he had determined not to make known the programme that had inspired it. The name "Pathetic" was suggested by his brother Modest, and the composer seized upon it with alacrity. Just what the "Pathetic" Symphony did mean to Tchaikovsky as programme music, then, we shall never know. Each hearer must, if he prefers that music have some significance outside itself, interpret it in his own way and to his own satisfaction. The facts of the music are these:

A sombre, almost dismal introduction precedes the first movement, itself predominantly agitated, at times to the point of hysteria, but twice relieved by the songful and sentimental second theme and ending in a mood of resignation. The waltz-like second movement, which is actually in 5-4 time, has an ominous, brooding middle section with a threatening, portentous, reiterated drum-beat that rises and falls. A reminiscence of these menacing strains recurs at the end. Half scherzo, half march, the third movement is one of the most forceful and original in the whole range of symphonic literature. Beginning lightly, almost fancifully, the music gradually rises to a tremendous climax at once frenzied and triumphal. Finally, over the mighty wail that is the last movement much speculative ink has been shed. Music of despair alternates with music of yearning; there is an anguished outburst and at the last a descent into the depths of woe.

In Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and the Fifth we have a recurring theme that suggests relentless fate, but at the end of each comes a note of victory. Not so in the "Pathetic." Here all hope is ultimately vanquished. So much of the composer's programme must be clear to even the least imaginative hearer.

The remaining numbers on the programme M. Koussevitzky has set for next Tuesday evening provide abundant contrast, not only to the Symphony but to each other. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," now in its 103rd year of lusty life, is one of the finest flowerings of that epoch in music, which is termed the Romantic. Here are the pomps and likewise the fires of chivalry, the accents of heroic love, and, in the celebrated passage for muted violins, a suggestion of awesome mystery.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," on the other hand, is all half-lights and half-shadows. This is music of the pagan world, at once natural and supernatural. Six years before the close of the last century this prelude came to its first hearing, and for it there was no precedent. At one stroke Debussy has created a new kind of music, the impressionistic. A multitude of compositions have since been added unto it, but this "Afternoon of a Faun" still holds its place.

Born three years later than Debussy, his countryman Paul Dukas has already outlived him by nearly a decade. Unlike Debussy, however, Dukas seems destined to be known, as a man of one composition, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Tuesday's concert. Based upon the ballad of Goethe, this witty and brilliant piece recounts the unhappy adventure of the apprentice who, in his master's absence, commanded the broom to fetch water and then, having forgotten the conjuring-word that would terminate what he had so rashly begun, was powerless to check the rising flood. Few pieces of programme music are at once so graphically delineative and intrinsically so satisfying.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

144

NOV 15 1925

Music at the Library

In memory of Wilhelm Gericke, who died in Vienna on Oct. 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its Boston concert on Oct. 30, paid tribute to its former leader by playing the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The Providence Public Library has this symphony arranged as piano solo, for four hands, and the conductor's orchestral score. Gericke is generally credited with being the pioneer in American orchestral development. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," an historical sketch by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, contains a chapter entitled "The Establishment Under Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889," and a chapter entitled "The Second Term of Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906." The library has a file of the concert programmes given under his leadership, both in Boston and in Providence.

In commemoration of the 150th anniversary of theh birth of Luigi Spontini, an almost forgotten composer, the Metropolitan Opera Company presented "La Vestale," as a feature of its second week. "Musical America," Nov. 7, contains an account of this novelty in an article entitled "Metropolitan to Rekindle Flame of 'La Vestale'." This classic opera with its story of ancient Rome, is in the library's collection of operas. All the other operas given the second week at the Metropolitan, "Tannhauser," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Il Pagliacci," "Madam Butterfly" and "Lohengrin," can be obtained at the library.

Ossip Gabrilowitch, concert pianist and conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, observes the silver anniversary of his coming to America by playing at the opening concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the same concerto which he played 25 years ago, Tschaikovsky's B flat minor concerto. The library has this concerto for piano solo, with the orchestral part arranged for a second piano in the score.

The library has "The Nightingale," found in Brockway's collection of "Lonesome Tunes," folk songs from the Kentucky mountains, one of the numbers on the radio programme given by Eva Gauthier. "A Book of Shakespeare Songs," with musical settings by various composers, edited by Edward Edwards, contains "Hark, Hark the Lark," "Under the Greenwood Tree" and "Who is Sylvia," are also in the library. There are also the Chopin numbers played by John Powell, "Prelude in A-flat," and "Polonaise in A-flat," and Powell's own composition "The Banjo Picker," found in his suite "At the Fair," and David Guion's "Turkey in the Straw."

Numbers on the Chaminade Club's programme last Thursday which are at the library are Mozart's "Trio in E Major," for violin, 'cello, and piano; songs, "Nymphs and Shepherds," by Purcell, "O Sleep, Why dost Thou Leave Me?" by Handel, Ariette, by Vidal; piano selections, Impromptu in A-flat by Chopin, and D-flat by Liszt.

Teachers and club members in search of concert material will find practical suggestions in "Musician" for June, 1925, in an article entitled "What to put on an All-American Programme."

* * *

Kindly send me without...
808 New Orleans Bank Bldg.—M

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 17 1925

...ton Symphony Season Opens To-night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will journey to Providence ~~late~~ this afternoon to open their season here with a concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15.

The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following eventful program for to-night's opening: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 16 1925

Boston Symphony Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky will open the concerts of the Boston Symphony Society the evening of November 26 with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Bruch's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for string orchestra and two new numbers, first time in New York, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales." The second concert, the afternoon of November 28, will consist of Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Tsar Sultan," and Brahms' First Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

NOV 17 1925

Music Jottings

Serge Koussevitzky will open the season of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall ~~on Thanksgiving~~ night and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first he will play Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3, Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, and, as novelties, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and "Escales," by Jacques Ibert. On Saturday, Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and "Kikimora"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan" and Brahms's First Symphony.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE TONIGHT

First Concert of Season to Be Given in Infantry Hall at 8:15 O'Clock

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky were to come to Providence ~~late~~ this afternoon to open their season here with a concert in Infantry hall at 8:15. The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving to be the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following program for tonight's opening: Weber's overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 17 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Unusual Demand Reported This Season for Providence Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will arrive here late this afternoon to open their season in this city with a concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15. The present 45th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving the most popular this orchestra has ever had. The unusual demand for the Providence concerts, which are nearly all sold by the season, is but a repetition of the demand in Boston and other cities, where each series of concerts is fully subscribed.

Koussevitzky has prepared the following eventful programme for to-night's opening: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6.

WELL ATTENDED

Under Koussevitsky It Will Write Musical History in America

A crowd which packed Infantry Hall to the doors greeted M. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of the Providence season. Sincere applause was given when M. Koussevitsky first took the stand and he was recalled several times at its close for an ovation, which he shared most graciously with the members.

There were several familiar faces missing in the ensemble last night and several new youthful faces. M. Koussevitsky is remaking the orchestra, not only in new blood, but also in form and method. The concert last night was a brilliant one, with the hardness and lustre of a diamond. One felt that the sentimentalism which used to creep in under M. Monteux has been vigorously chased away by the baton of the intellectual Russian

This fact was very noticeable in Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," the tone poem written from Stephen Mallarme's yet to be explained eclogue. Under M. Monteux Debussy was played with a warmth that amounted almost to lush. Under M. Koussevitsky it took on a hard intellectual quality. There was a firmness in the [illegible]

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's sixth, in B-minor, the familiar and always magnificent "Pathetic." It was played last night as it never was played before in Infantry Hall. Into it M. Koussevitsky read subtle shades of meaning, made delicate and touching [illegible] passages, joyous and gay [illegible] and like the distant beating [illegible] drum made omnious the sombre, [illegible] from his members the terrible sound of blind fate devastating hope and shattering illusion.

The familiar overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, was played with life and vim. M. Koussevitsky introduced for the first time to a Providence audience the scherzo of the modern Frenchman, Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," the playful setting to music of an old tale by Lucian retold in a ballad by Goethe. M. Koussevitsky seems to have a fondness for the moderns, their buffooneries, their disillusionment, their mocking at all the sacred traditions of conventional form and reading. The audience last night seemed to appreciate what M. Koussevitsky was doing with the Dukas' number and applauded him warmly at its close.

There is no doubt that under this great Russian the Boston Symphony Orchestra is increasing in stature and strength. M. Kroussevitsky had the ensemble always under control, co-ordinating, persuading, commanding. The discipline was as responsive as the shrill whistle of a forceful top sergeant. The Boston Symphony, it is apparent, is, under the direction of M. Koussevitsky, going to write musical history in this country.

---

public r love
Henry
th that those nstruct
and win over a musically uneducated public to a recognition and appreciation of the finest in classical music was Wilhelm Gericke, whose death in his native Austria took place during the past week.

Gericke was not the first Boston Symphony leader, that position having been held by Henschel, but he was the orchestra's second leader for whom the ground had been broken by his predecessor. Gericke took the baton in 1884. He led for five years, then gave way for nine years to Nickish and Paur, to return, however, in 1898 to carry through eight years more of triumph.

When Gericke made his concluding bow to the Boston public and returned to Vienna he was fated to see the war's chasm separate his own land from that which he so long had adopted, and there were sad stories of the aged artist's sufferings during the dark days. America had not abandoned him, however, and contributions made by American admirers and by the Boston Symphony itself gave him such comforts as money could buy during the days when there were scant thoughts of music.

And now Gericke is dead, at eighty years. He did as much as any one man for the cause of music in the United States, and his memory will be honored.

---

majesty, that the orchestra tou... the summit of its performance. ...lins, 'cellos, brasses and percuss... wove the weird and powerful harmonies into a picture of crashing armies and things heroic. It was a splendid and awesome achievement, due in great measure to the great generalship of the Koussevitsky baton. In the final movement, the adagio lamentoso, there was some very effective scale work by the violins.

Another composition worthy of particular note was Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." The deep mystic quality of the opening measures, rendered mainly by the 'cellos and double-bass, brought to mind nothing so much as the music of a great organ.

The fantastic, at times weirdly grotesque, melodies of "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, also greatly stirred the imagination of the audience. Some very effective pizzicato work by the violins was noticeable, and the brasses and percussion instrumentalists had their opportunity to show that they were not one whit less accomplished than their fellow performers.

Some pleasing effects were obtained in the interpretation of the strange harmonies in Ibert's "Escales." But much greater was the applause which rewarded the performance of Berlioz' Marche Hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust" —a composition which the orchestra played twice, so insistent were the cheers which followed its first rendition.

…PPING FROM
…CE, R. I.
…NE

1… 1925

…phony
…ens To-night

…ony Orchestra and
…will journey to Prov-
…noon to open their
…concert in Infantry

…PPING FROM
…AL CANADA
…TAR

…OV 3 1925

…STENED TO
…N SYMPHONY

…wed Rendition
…'s Symphony
… at Forum

…WAS GIVEN

…Recalled Four
…lose of Rus-
…sition—Ber-
…a Favorite

…recent years has
…awn such a large
…which last night
…n Symphony Or-
…um. Nearly every
…mphitheatre was
…t, and at times
…ponsive, audience
…and time again
…both understand
…eat music played

…sand persons filled
…nd numerous tiers
…he high roof on
…stage. Added to
…t which the as-
…presented, with its
…iant colors, was
…ent spectacle of
…one hundred and
…in a large semi-
…rm—with massed
…ellos, and double-
…sses, and tall gild-

…FOUR TIMES.

…e artists, and
…nductor, Serge
…the most ex-
…nd if anything,
…which was al-
…ty. Even in the
…ges to be found
…orchestra touche
…performance. Vio
…es and percussion
…nd powerful har-
…cture of crashing
…heroic. It was a
…some achievement,
…asure to the great
…the Koussevitsky
…inal movement, the
…o, there was some
…ale work by the

…position worthy of
…was Weber's Over-
…nthe." The deep
…the opening meas-
…inly by the 'cellos
…brought to mind
…the music of a

…t times weirdly
…of "L'Apprenti
…also greatly stir-
…of the audience.
…e pizzicato work
…noticeable, and
…ercussion instru-
…ir opportunity to
…ere not one whit
…than their fellow

…ffects were obtain-
…pretation of the
…in Ibert's "Es-
…h greater was the
…ewarded the per-
…Marche Hong-
…ation de Faust"
…the orchestra
…ent were the
…lo… its first

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 8 1925

Gericke Struggled Years to Make Boston Symphony Lead in Orchestral Performance

Director Who Was Engaged in 1883 Inaugurated Post-Season 'Pop' Concerts and Undertook Tours Into Neighboring States.

By James Davies.

TO MUSIC LOVERS of this later generation the announcement of Wilhelm Gericke's death signifies very little, but there was a time in the musical history of America when the name of Gericke was one to conjure with, for it was probably due to him, as much as to anybody, that the Boston Symphony orchestra grew into the magnificent instrument which for three decades represented the highest achievement in the evolution of orchestral performance in America.

Gericke was a product of what we may call the classic age, for he incurred the resentment of all progressive Bostonians for his pertinacity in disregarding the claims of practically all composers subsequent to Brahms, for whom he had a passionate admiration. His antagonism to newer schools of musical thought underwent some modifications during his second term of office as conductor of the Boston orchestra, and as a concession he inaugurated the post-season "pop" concerts and undertook concert tours into neighboring states at the conclusion of the regular season, when his programs assumed a character that, judged by the high standards he maintained for the regular symphony season, may be called popular.

He was engaged for the Boston orchestra in 1883 and found the organization rather lax in those particulars necessary for the best results. Rehearsals had become haphazard affairs that were treated with disrespect by the members, who would leave whenever they became a little weary; the music was largely light in character and the personnel changed from year to year with somewhat disastrous results. Gericke proceeded to change this condition by inaugurating, first of all, rules of conduct for the members of the orchestra, then by presenting programs built up on classic lines.

* * *

CHANGES as radical as these caused trouble; members of the orchestra rebelled and were discharged; Gericke brought over a score of players from Europe on one occasion to take the places of those sent out of the orchestra; patrons resented the heavy programs and deserted by hundreds. It seems strange to us at this time that a performance of the third Brahms symphony should have almost emptied the old concert hall just off Tremont street, and the same result happened when the Strauss "Aus Italien" was given in 1888. There were more people on the stage than in the hall, according to Gericke's own statement.

It needed courage to continue under such circumstances and no wonder that in his second season Gericke wished to be released, but was persuaded to stick to his post by that most gallant defender of musical culture, Major Higginson. Young players were imported, among them Franz Kneisel, who for many years served as concertmaster, and later organized the string quartet that bore his name. Rehearsals became disciplinary in character instead of the easy-going institutions of the past. The conductor spared neither himself nor his men; hours were spent polishing single phrases, and on one occasion he forced the postponement of a New York concert because the orchestra was not perfect enough.

* * *

ART with a large A obsessed this man; he never considered expense, his object was to make the Boston Symphony orchestra equal in performance to the best in Europe and gradually he won toward his goal. New York acclaimed him when he finally appeared there; Bostonians were led to believe that his methods were the best and soon fought for the privilege of supporting him. It was hard for them to follow him to such an extreme that they were willing to have the usual soloist eliminated from the programs, but even in this Gericke won their acquiescence. It would be difficult in these times to fill our Symphony halls without a soloist, but Gericke did it by pure obstinacy and because he was a remarkable personality.

In spite of his autocratic methods, the same kind of methods, by the way, that won for Theodore Thomas his place in the musical life and history of America, Gericke's place in our art life is a very considerable one. Like all pioneers he was compelled to achieve his ends by the use of brute force sometimes; but like these men in any walk in life he never spared himself, while he rode rough shod over all opposition he kept his own ideals inviolate and gradually inoculated his public with the same virus, until they too demanded and received only the best. If, however, the public of his own time did not happen to [illegible] giving them Gericke never worried about it, he was sorry of course, but thought the public stupid in such a case.

* * *

MUSICAL America relates some amusing stories of this conductor's arrogant methods. On one occasion he discharged one of his players, giving him all the money due on his contract, that is to say Higginson had to stand the punishment, he ordered another man from Europe, was not satisfied with him and paid him to return and re-engaged the first man all over again. He would sing all the parts at rehearsals to the great amusement of the men and on one occasion one of them burst out into uncontrollable laughter; when commanded to stop he remarked he would laugh when he wanted to. Naturally, he lost his job, for like most men who take themselves seriously Gericke could not bear to be laughed at.

A tremendous change has taken place in America since Gericke's day. At that time there were but three orchestras in the country worthy the name. Today there are four times that many nearly all of them the equal of Gericke's orchestra. To find players it was necessary in those far off days to go to Europe for them, and it was not easy to persuade them to leave their homes for the new country; today we probably have in America as many fine orchestra players as the whole of Europe combined and there are laws to prevent the importation of others.

If we need proof that our standards have improved and are improving we may find it in these facts. We have fine men and money, too. We have a constantly developing taste in the good things of music and musical interpretation; we have increasing thousands of people whose ideal of musical interpretation is that given by the Symphony orchestra. As a recent editorial in The Tribune pointed out, we should not forget that these benefits have accrued to us through the generosity and self-sacrifice of a mere handful of our fellow countrymen, who have fought a mighty good fight and suffered that we might benefit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 0 1925

CONCERT NOTES

…oussevitzky and his Boston Sym-…ny Orchestra come to this city for …r first pair of concerts next week … Thursday night and Saturday …rnoon. A new score by Jacques … called "Ports of Call" will be …ed for the first time here at the …rsday concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Providence patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening crowded Infantry Hall to the doors. It was their first "experience" of the present season with Koussevitzky, and the Russian genius of the baton, as if in response to the cordial greeting accorded him, led his band of virtuosi through a programme which in content and interpretation left little to be desired. With the exception of the Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" the numbers played are all well known to symphony audiences here. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude," "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the work by Dukas were preliminary to the programme's piece de resistance, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B-minor, the "Pathetic." No soloist was provided, indeed none was needed in such a well-arranged and excellently contrasted orchestral programme.

It was arranged as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe"..............Weber
"Preude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("The Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme..........Debussy
"L' Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice") Scherzo, (after a ballad by Goethe)..........Dukas
Symphony No. 6 in Bminor, "Pathetic," Op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Before the concert began the audience noted a change in the position of his instrumentalists since last season, bringing first and second violins together at his left, violas and cellos at the right with a massed brass choir facing him in the centre. This change seems to give a greater brilliance to the strings but the effects produced probably owe little to a mere change in position of the men. The magic lies in the superb artistry of Koussevitzky. And each season seems to bring conductor and players in more perfect accord. Technically the players are equal to the work assigned them. It is not this proficiency with their respective instruments that surprises, that of course is expected. It is that indefinable something, an artistic unity of minds, if you will, governed by a master intelligence that merges the entire personnal into a unit that thinks and acts as one.

The works by the French modernists, Debussy and Dukas, offer admirable contrast. Both are examples of the modern art of instrumental expression. But each is entirely individual.

In the "Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy reaches a high plane of imaginative thought. His music paints in pale, delicate tints the pictures that arise in the mind of the Faun who strives to remember the joys of yesterday. The fleeting, half-formed images float in musical form from the orchestra in delightful ever-changing color. This number, admirably conceived and realized by Mr. Koussevitzky, was equalled by the remarkable portrayel of the story of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a work inspired by a ballad by Goethe which depicts the mischief wrought by the use of magic in the hands of one Eucrates, who tried the arts of a magician with disastrous results. With the text at hand it is easy to follow the thread of the story but without such aid the music is tremendously effective and delights the hearer by its brilliance.

Tschaikowsky's symphony is a work that is bound to powerfully impress the listener. Many stories of the composer's inspiration are told. The most reasonable would make it the expression of his philosophy of life. The first movement offers a complete revelation of his pessimism. The movements which follow are in the nature of explanations of the philosophy revealed in the opening "Adagio; Allegro non troppo," in which he struggles with inexorable Fate. Fircely he fights but at last acknowledges de-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 1 8 1925

-:- MUSIC

Magical Mr. Kousse…

Mr. Koussevitzky led th… Symphony Orchestra at Infa… last night in the first conc… season here through a prog… was a model in its variety. … may add at once, a model o… interpretation and of … musicianship, if we except … "Euryanthe" which opened … ceedings and which not eve… sourceful Mr. Koussevitz… make interesting to us.

There were on the progr… ever, Debussy's "Afternoo… Faun" and Dukas's "… Apprentice," the former we… by now, the latter but rare… in this country. Then, as t… ing work of the evenin… Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" S… which ought to be called hi… tic" Symphony.

* * *

Let us speak first of the la… It is a good many years sinc… heard it conducted, and the le… Arthur Nikisch, who then ha… as an interpreter of the Russ… poser. In the interval we ha… it many times. Yet we do … tate to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading is the most satisfying of all. We do not mean that in musicians… Mr. Koussevitzky outtops Nikisch. … is in the mental and spiritual qua… of Mr. Koussevitzky's travail that … excels in drawing from the inst… ments this tonal picture of a ma… life struggle.

We noted in the second movem… particularly last night, a sense … irony where too often we have liste… to sentimental interpretations. … we noted all through the four m… ments the Aristotelian conceptio… the function of tragedy in art … purge the soul of pity and terr… Neither pity nor terror were … when Mr. Koussevitzky laid down … baton. What he had evoked w… mood of exaltation springing from … contemplation of a struggle that … sublime in its intensity and hero… its submission to destiny.

* * *

What a contrast there was in … master's playing of the music … depicts the wistful faun recolle… his wantonness in a momen… tranquillity! All the loveline… primal woods, of elusive shapes … ting through faery groves, of … tions half-recaptured only to be … again were summoned up for u… Mr. Koussevitzky as if he had … Prospero.

And then, that masterpiec… musical humor, the "Sorc… Apprentice." Even without the … on which it is founded, one could … felt the wild, fantastic delight of the composer in painting the antics of the apprentice who knew enough magic to make trouble, but not enough to unmake it.

Altogether a night to be remembered. Mr. Koussevitzky had to rouse his band a little testily once or twice to make it keep up with his dynamic imagination. But there were few flaws and it is a rare band indeed that could respond so successfully to the demands of Mr. Koussevitzky's versatile genius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

145

NOV 1 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN OPENING CONCERT

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Gloriously Played Under Baton of Koussevitzky.

Gloriously played and directed by a leader with his heart in his work, Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, "The Pathetic," thrilled a tremendous audience in Infantry Hall, last night. It was the opening concert of the Boston symphony season in Providence, and Director Koussevitzky had selected the famous work of his great countryman as the principal number on a notable programme.

Tchaikovsky has never been neglected by the Boston conductors on Providence visits, his splendid genius always commanding the recognition and admiration of musicians and music lovers. To say that Providence audiences had to wait for a Russian to bring the marvels of this great master properly before them may be saying too much, but it is certa… evening's audience there… tors who felt that they ha… ly heard the Pathetic Sy… for…

…or Koussevitzky, himself … seems to have fairly imbibed … sage written by Tchaikovsky … have breathed the spirit of th… sage into his orchestra. His in… tation and their playing was … perfection as human things ca… The symphony was approached … spirit of reverence; it was played … a beauty of conception that made … hearer forget the utter perfection … technique achieved by conductor a… players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1 8 1925

The programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week will include another composition by Aaron Copland, the young American whose modernistic music was the subject of animated comment recently in the same place. This week Mr. Koussevitzky will present his "Music for the Theatre," to be played for the first performance anywhere. The other movements are a Prolog, Dance, Interlude and a Burlesque. The other and familiar numbers will be the overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute:" Beethoven's Fourth Symphony; the Prelude and closing scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

On Friday evening next in Jordan hall, Boston, the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will play for the first time in that city the Pastoral Symphony of Vaughan Williams, which was well received in London and in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 1 8 1925

…TON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

…ence Patrons of Orchestra Crowd Infantry Hall.

…ience patrons of the Boston Sym-…Orchestra last evening crowded In-…Hall to the doors. It was their …xperience" of the present season …ussevitzky, and the Russian genius …baton, as if in response to the …greeting accorded him, led his … virtuosi through a programme …n content and interpretation left … be desired. With the exception …Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" the … played are all well known to …y audiences here. Weber's Over-… "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Pre-…The Afternoon of a Faun" and … by Dukas were preliminary to …ramme's piece de resistance, …wsky's Symphony No. 6 in B-…e "Pathetic." No soloist was … indeed none was needed in such …anged and excellently contrasted … programme.

…rranged as follows:

… "Euryanthe"..............Weber
… l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
…e Afternoon of a Faun"),
…ue by S. Mallarme..........Debussy
…renti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's
…ntice") Scherzo, (after a ballad
…ethe)..........Dukas
… No. 6 in Bminor, "Pathetic,"
…4 ....Tschaikowsky
…gio; Allegro non troppo.
…gro con grazia.
…gro molto vivace.
…le; Adagio lamentoso.

… the concert began the audience …hange in the position of his in…lists since last season, bringing first and second violins together at his left, violas and cellos at the right with a massed brass choir facing him in the centre. This change seems to give a greater brilliance to the strings but the effects produced probably owe little to a mere change in position of the men. The magic lies in the superb artistry of Koussevitzky. And each season seems to bring conductor and players in more perfect accord. Technically the players are equal to the work assigned them. It is not this proficiency with their respective instruments that surprises, that of course is expected. It is that indefinable something, an artistic unity of minds, if you will, governed by a master intelligence that merges the entire personnal into a unit that thinks and acts as one.

The works by the French modernists, Debussy and Dukas, offer admirable contrast. Both are examples of the modern art of instrumental expression. But each is entirely individual.

In the "Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy reaches a high plane of imaginative thought. His music paints in pale, delicate tints the pictures that arise in the mind of the Faun who strives to remember the joys of yesterday. The fleeting, half-formed images float in musical form from the orchestra in delightful ever-changing color. This number, admirably conceived and realized by Mr. Koussevitzky, was equalled by the remarkable portrayel of the story of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a work inspired by a ballad by Goethe which depicts the mischief wrought by the use of magic in the hands of one Eucrates, who tried the arts of a magician with disastrous results. With the text at hand it is easy to follow the thread of the story but without such aid the music is tremendously effective and delights the hearer by its brilliance.

Tschaikowsky's symphony is a work that is bound to powerfully impress the listener. Many stories of the composer's inspiration are told. The most reasonable would make it the expression of his philosophy of life. The first movement offers a complete revelation of his pessimism. The movembents which follow are in the nature of explanations of the philosophy revealed in the opening "Adagio; Allegro non troppo," in which he struggles with inexorable Fate. Fircely he fights but at last acknowledges defeat. Those tremendous wrestlings are depicted in musical language that grips the listener, alternately charming by its sombre beauty or stirring him by its despairing power.

Fate is ever present, sometimes indicated by the recurring drumbeat and again by repeated solemn pizzicato scales in the strings.

The final movement is the utterance of a soul torn with despair, a marvellous tone picture but one which leaves the hearer in depressed mood. The playing of the work was a wonderful exhibition of artistry by both conductor and orchestra. So impressed were last evening's auditors that one might have heard a pin drop during the brief intermissions between the first three movements. At the close Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an ovation.

A. F. P.

...G FROM
...CE, R. I.
...NE

... 1925

...phony
...ns To-night

...ny Orchestra and
...ll journey to Prov-
...oon to open their
...oncert in Infantry

... FROM
...ANADA
...R

... 1925

...ENED TO ...SYMPHONY

...ed Rendition ...'s Symphony ... at Forum

...VAS GIVEN

...ecalled Four ...se of Rus- ...tion—Ber- ... Favorite

...recent years has
...wn such a large
...which last night
... Symphony Or-
...um. Nearly every
...mphitheatre was
...t, and at times
...ponsive, audience
...and time again
...both understand
...eat music played

...sand persons filled
...d numerous tiers
...e high roof on
... stage. Added to
... which the as-
...sented, with its
...liant colors, was
...ent spectacle of
...one hundred and
... in a large semi-
...rm—with massed
...los, and double-
...ses, and tall gild-

...UR TIMES.

...he artists, and
...nductor, Serge
...d the most ex-
...and if anything,
...n which was al-
...ity. Even in the
...ages to be found
... orchestra touche...
... performance. Vio-
...es and percussion
...nd powerful har-
...cture of crashing
... heroic. It was a
...ome achievement,
...ure to the great
...he Koussevitzky
...l movement, the
... there was some
... work by the

...sition worthy of
...s Weber's Over-
...the." The deep
...he opening meas-
...nly by the 'cellos
...brought to mind
... as the music of a

...t times weirdly
... of "L'Apprenti
... also greatly stir-
... of the audience.
... pizzicato work
... noticeable, and
...ercussion instru-
... opportunity to
...re not one whit
...han their fellow

...cts were obtain-
...tation of the
...in Ibert's "Es-
... greater was the
...varded the per-
... Marche Hong-
...tion de Faust"
... the orchestra
...ent were the
...lo... its first

...Ge...
...M...
...i...

...Dir...

...s to Lead ...ance

...83 In- ...ncerts ...oring

...on
...or-
...was
...him
...man
...ll the
...amuse-
...occasion
...ontrolla-
...d to stop
... when he
...st his job,
...themselves
... bear to be

...s taken place
...day. At that
...ee orchestras
...he name. To-
...hes that many
...e equal of Ger-
...nd players it was
...r off days to go
...nd it was not easy
... leave their homes
... today we probably
... many fine orchestra
...ole of Europe com-
...e laws to prevent the
...hers.
...of that our standards
...and are improving we
... these facts. We have
...noney, too. We have a

...ounce-
..., but
... of America when
...ith, for it was probably
... the Boston Symphony
...rument which for three
...nent in the evolution of

... call the classic age, for he
...stonians for his pertinacity in
...posers subsequent to Brahms,
...s antagonism to newer schools
...ons during his second term of
...nd as a concession he inaugu-
...rtook concert tours into neigh-
...ar season, when his programs
...h standards he maintained for
... popular.

...ntly developing taste in the good
... of music and musical interpreta-
... we have increasing thousands of
...e whose ideal of musical interpre-
...n is that given by the Symphony
...estra. As a recent editorial in The
...une pointed out, we should not for-
... that these benefits have accrued to
... through the generosity and self-sac-
...ce of a mere handful of our fellow
...ntrymen, who have fought a mighty
...d fight and suffered that we might
...nefit.

12

ASTER
SIXTH and HENNEPIN
A FIRST RUN
WILLIAM FOX PRODUCTION
"Thank You"
with GEORGE O'BRIEN
and

JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD'S
"The Ancient Highway"

Lyric
DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS
in "DON Q"
Still the Most Popular Picture in Town

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 1 8 1925

Sedgwick Concerts.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1,000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous ... Moscow and Leningrad where he ...ve festivals devoted to the music ... the older masters and likewise ...mpioning the young creative ...ius of the day, both in his own ... other nations.

...oming to America a year ago, ... this reputation to herald him, ...ssevitzky, appearing over the ...us orchestra which he still ...mands, more than fulfilled the ... expectations. He has ... become the most outstand-...ure in the musical world of ... cities which the orchestra ...nd his reputation extends the ... and breadth of this country. ...amous orchestra comes to the ... theater Sunday afternoon, ...ary 7, under the management ...ank A. Sedgwick, who will al-...sent Giovanni Martinelli, the ... tenor of the Metropolitan ... company, here at the Capitol ... Sunday afternoon, January ...he seats for both events are ...n sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asy-...treet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 0 1925

CONCERT NOTES

Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra come to this city for their first pair of concerts next week on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. A new score by Jacques Ibert called "Ports of Call" will be played for the first time here at the Thursday concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Providence patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening crowded Infantry Hall to the doors. It was their first "experience" of the present season with Koussevitzky, and the Russian genius of the baton, as if in response to the cordial greeting accorded him, led his band of virtuosi through a programme which in content and interpretation left little to be desired. With the exception of the Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" the numbers played are all well known to symphony audiences here. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude," "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the work by Dukas were preliminary to the programme's piece de resistance, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B-minor, the "Pathetic." No soloist was provided, indeed none was needed in such a well-arranged and excellently contrasted orchestral programme.

It was arranged as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe"..............Weber
"Preude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
("The Afternoon of a Faun"),
Eclogue by S. Mallarme..........Debussy
"L' Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's
Apprentice") Scherzo, (after a ballad
by Goethe)..........................Dukas
Symphony No. 6 in Biminor, "Pathetic,"
Op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Before the concert began the audience noted a change in the position of his instrumentalists since last season, bringing first and second violins together at his left, violas and cellos at the right with a massed brass choir facing him in the centre. This change seems to give a greater brilliance to the strings but the effects produced probably owe little to a mere change in position of the men. The magic lies in the superb artistry of Koussevitzky. And each season seems to bring conductor and players in more perfect accord. Technically the players are equal to the work assigned them. It is not this proficiency with their respective instruments that surprises, that of course is expected. It is that indefinable something, an artistic unity of minds, if you will, governed by a master intelligence that merges the entire personnal into a unit that thinks and acts as one.

The works by the French modernists, Debussy and Dukas, offer admirable contrast. Both are examples of the modern art of instrumental expression. But each is entirely individual.

In the "Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy reaches a high plane of imaginative thought. His music paints in pale, delicate tints the pictures that arise in the mind of the Faun who strives to remember the joys of yesterday. The fleeting, half-formed images float in musical form from the orchestra in delightful ever-changing color. This number, admirably conceived and realized by Mr. Koussevitzky, was equalled by the remarkable portrayel of the story of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a work inspired by a ballad by Goethe which depicts the mischief wrought by the use of magic in the hands of one Eucrates, who tried the arts of a magician with disastrous results. With the text at hand it is easy to follow the thread of the story but without such aid the music is tremendously effective and delights the hearer by its brilliance.

Tschaikowsky's symphony is a work that is bound to powerfully impress the listener. Many stories of the composer's inspiration are told. The most reasonable would make it the expression of his philosophy of life. The first movement offers a complete revelation of his pessimism. The movembents which follow are in the nature of explanations of the philosophy revealed in the opening "Adagio; Allegro non troppo," in which he struggles with inexorable Fate. Fircely he fights but at last acknowledges de-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 1 8 1925

-:- MUSIC -:-

Magical Mr. Koussevitzky

Mr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night in the first concert of the season here through a program that was a model in its variety. And, we may add at once, a model of creative interpretation and of efficient musicianship, if we except Weber's "Euryanthe" which opened the proceedings and which not even the resourceful Mr. Koussevitzky could make interesting to us.

There were on the program, however, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the former well known by now, the latter but rarely played in this country. Then, as the crowning work of the evening, came Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony which ought to be called his "Majestic" Symphony.

* * *

Let us speak first of the last named. It is a good many years since we first heard it conducted, and the leader was Arthur Nikisch, who then had no peer as an interpreter of the Russian composer. In the interval we have heard it many times. Yet we do not hesitate to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading is the most satisfying of all. We do not mean that in musicianship Mr. Koussevitzky outtops Nikisch. It is in the mental and spiritual quality of Mr. Koussevitzky's travail that he excels in drawing from the instruments this tonal picture of a man's life struggle.

We noted in the second movement particularly last night, a sense of irony where too often we have listened to sentimental interpretations. And we noted all through the four movements the Aristotelian conception of the function of tragedy in art "to purge the soul of pity and terror." Neither pity nor terror were left when Mr. Koussevitzky laid down his baton. What he had evoked was a mood of exaltation springing from the contemplation of a struggle that was sublime in its intensity and heroic in its submission to destiny.

* * *

What a contrast there was in this master's playing of the music that depicts the wistful faun recollecting his wantonness in a moment of tranquillity! All the loveliness of primal woods, of elusive shapes flitting through faery groves, of emotions half-recaptured only to be lost again were summoned up for us by Mr. Koussevitzky as if he had been Prospero.

And then, that masterpiece of musical humor, the "Sorcerer's Apprentice." Even without the story on which it is founded, one could have felt the wild, fantastic delight of the composer in painting the antics of the apprentice who knew enough magic to make trouble, but not enough to unmake it.

Altogether a night to be remembered. Mr. Koussevitzky had to rouse his band a little testily once or twice to make it keep up with his dynamic imagination. But there were few flaws and it is a rare band indeed that could respond so successfully to the demands of Mr. Koussevitzky's versatile genius.

...ROM
...ET

145

...925

...ud

...otligh...
...Lansd...

...NY
...CONCERT

..."Pathetic"
... Under
...vitzky,

...directed by a
...in his work,
...mphony, "The
...mendous audi-
...last night. It
... of the Boston
...rovidence, and
...ad selected the
...at countryman
...r on a notable

...r been neglect-
...ctors on Provi-
...dida genius al-
...recognition and
...ns and music
...rovidence audi-
...a Russian to
...is great master
... may be saying too m...

even...
tors ...uch, but
ly h...ng's aud...
fore ... who felt t...
F...eard the "...
seem...
sag... or Koussev...
hav...ns to have sag...e written ta...e breathed pe...e into his T...ion and the sp...rfection as a...e symphony
h...irit of revere...
...beauty of co...
...earer forget
...echnique achi...
...layers.

...it is certa...
...ence there...
...hat they ha...
...Pathetic Sy...
...itzky, himself
...fairly imbibed
...by Tchaikovsky,
...the spirit of th...
...rchestra. His d...
...r playing was ...
...human things ...
... was approached
...ce; it was played
...ception that made
...he utter perfection
...ved by conductor ...

...M

...ZEN

... the city ...
... columns to-

...HT

...was featured
...or John Ab-

...s brought to
... address by
...esenting the
...ent of Agri-
...as "Leader-
...he emphasize
...uch as moth-
...ercise in the

...ton Sym-
... will ...n
...y Aaron
...n whose
... subject
...ly in the
...Kousse-
...s for the
...he first
... other
...nce, In-
...e other
...be the
..., "The
... Fourth
... closing
...n and

...Jordan
...e New
...c will
...ty the
... Wil-
...ed in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 1 8 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Providence Patrons of Orchestra Crowd Infantry Hall.

Providence patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening crowded Infantry Hall to the doors. It was their first "experience" of the present season with Koussevitzky, and the Russian genius of the baton, as if in response to the cordial greeting accorded him, led his band of virtuosi through a programme which in content and interpretation left little to be desired. With the exception of the Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" the numbers played are all well known to symphony audiences here. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude," "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the work by Dukas were preliminary to the programme's piece de resistance, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B-minor, the "Pathetic." No soloist was provided, indeed none was needed in such a well-arranged and excellently contrasted orchestral programme.

It was arranged as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe"..............Weber
"Preude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
("The Afternoon of a Faun"),
Eclogue by S. Mallarme..........Debussy
"L' Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's
Apprentice") Scherzo, (after a ballad
by Goethe)..........................Dukas
Symphony No. 6 in Biminor, "Pathetic,"
Op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Before the concert began the audience noted a change in the position of his instrumentalists since last season, bringing first and second violins together at his left, violas and cellos at the right with a massed brass choir facing him in the centre. This change seems to give a greater brilliance to the strings but the effects produced probably owe little to a mere change in position of the men. The magic lies in the superb artistry of Koussevitzky. And each season seems to bring conductor and players in more perfect accord. Technically the players are equal to the work assigned them. It is not this proficiency with their respective instruments that surprises, that of course is expected. It is that indefinable something, an artistic unity of minds, if you will, governed by a master intelligence that merges the entire personnal into a unit that thinks and acts as one.

The works by the French modernists, Debussy and Dukas, offer admirable contrast. Both are examples of the modern art of instrumental expression. But each is entirely individual.

In the "Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy reaches a high plane of imaginative thought. His music paints in pale, delicate tints the pictures that arise in the mind of the Faun who strives to remember the joys of yesterday. The fleeting, half-formed images float in musical form from the orchestra in delightful ever-changing color. This number, admirably conceived and realized by Mr. Koussevitzky, was equalled by the remarkable portrayel of the story of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a work inspired by a ballad by Goethe which depicts the mischief wrought by the use of magic in the hands of one Eucrates, who tried the arts of a magician with disastrous results. With the text at hand it is easy to follow the thread of the story but without such aid the music is tremendously effective and delights the hearer by its brilliance.

Tschaikowsky's symphony is a work that is bound to powerfully impress the listener. Many stories of the composer's inspiration are told. The most reasonable would make it the expression of his philosophy of life. The first movement offers a complete revelation of his pessimism. The movembents which follow are in the nature of explanations of the philosophy revealed in the opening "Adagio; Allegro non troppo," in which he struggles with inexorable Fate. Fircely he fights but at last acknowledges de-feat. Those tremendous wrestlings are depicted in musical language that grips the listener, alternately charming by its sombre beauty or stirring him by its despairing power.

Fate is ever present, sometimes indicated by the recurring drumbeat and again by repeated solemn pizzicato scales in the strings.

The final movement is the utterance of a soul torn with despair, a marvellous tone picture but one which leaves the hearer in depressed mood. The playing of the work was a wonderful exhibition of artistry by both conductor and orchestra. So impressed were last evening's auditors that one might have heard a pin drop during the brief intermissions between the first three movements. At the close Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an ovation.

A. F. P.

145

G FROM

CE, R. I.
NE

hony
ns To-night

ny Orchestra and
l journey to Prov.
oon to open their
oncert in Infantry

FROM ANADA

1925

NED TO SYMPHONY

wed Rendition
's Symphony
at Forum

WAS GIVEN

Recalled Four se of Rustion—Ber-
Favorite

---

r off days
nd it was not easy
leave their homes
today we probably
many fine orchestra
ole of Europe com-
laws to prevent the
hers.
of that our standards
and are improving we these facts. We have money, too. We have a ncerts oring

unce-
, but
of America when ith, for it was probably
the Boston Symphony
rument which for three nent in the evolution of

call the classic age, for he stonians for his pertinacity in
posers subsequent to Brahms,
s antagonism to newer schools
ons during his second term of
nd as a concession he inaugu-
rtook concert tours into neigh-
ar season, when his programs
h standards he maintained for popular.

ntly developing taste in the good
of music and musical interpreta-
we have increasing thousands of
e whose ideal of musical interpre-
n is that given by the Symphony
estra. As a recent editorial in The une pointed out, we should not for-
that these benefits have accrued to
through the generosity and self-sac-
ce of a mere handful of our fellow ntrymen, who have fought a mighty
d fight and suffered that we might efit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 18 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Providence patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening crowded Infantry Hall to the doors. It was their first "experience" of the present season with Koussevitzky, and the Russian genius of the baton, as if in response to the cordial greeting accorded him, led his band of virtuosi through a programme which in content and interpretation left little to be desired. With the exception of the Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" the numbers played are all well known to symphony audiences here. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Debussy's "Prelude," "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the work by Dukas were preliminary to the programme's piece de resistance, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B-minor, the "Pathetic." No soloist was provided, indeed none was needed in such a well-arranged and excellently contrasted orchestral programme.

It was arranged as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe"..............Weber
"Preude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
("The Afternoon of a Faun"),
Eclogue by S. Mallarme..........Debussy
"L' Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's
Apprentice") Scherzo, (after a ballad
by Goethe).........................Dukas
Symphony No. 6 in Bminor, "Pathetic,"
Op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Before the concert began the audience noted a change in the position of his instrumentalists since last season, bringing first and second violins together at his left, violas and cellos at the right with a massed brass choir facing him in the centre. This change seems to give a greater brilliance to the strings but the effects produced probably owe little to a mere change in position of the men. The magic lies in the superb artistry of Koussevitzky. And each season seems to bring conductor and players in more perfect accord. Technically the players are equal to the work assigned them. It is not this proficiency with their respective instruments that surprises, that of course is expected. It is that indefinable something, an artistic unity of minds, if you will, governed by a master intelligence that merges the entire personnal into a unit that thinks and acts as one.

The works by the French modernists, Debussy and Dukas, offer admirable contrast. Both are examples of the modern art of instrumental expression. But each is entirely individual.

In the "Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy reaches a high plane of imaginative thought. His music paints in pale, delicate tints the pictures that arise in the mind of the Faun who strives to remember the joys of yesterday. The fleeting, half-formed images float in musical form from the orchestra in delightful ever-changing color. This number, admirably conceived and realized by Mr. Koussevitzky, was equalled by the remarkable portrayel of the story of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a work inspired by a ballad by Goethe which depicts the mischief wrought by the use of magic in the hands of one Eucrates, who tried the arts of a magician with disastrous results. With the text at hand it is easy to follow the thread of the story but without such aid the music is tremendously effective and delights the hearer by its brilliance.

Tschaikowsky's symphony is a work that is bound to powerfully impress the listener. Many stories of the composer's inspiration are told. The most reasonable would make it the expression of his philosophy of life. The first movement offers a complete revelation of his pessimism. The movembents which follow are in the nature of explanations of the philosophy revealed in the opening "Adagio; Allegro non troppo," in which he struggles with inexorable Fate. Fircely he fights but at last acknowledges defeat. These tremendous wrestlings are depicted in musical language that grips the listener, alternately charming by its sombre beauty or stirring him by its despairing power.

Fate is ever present, sometimes indicated by the recurring drumbeat and again by repeated solemn pizzicato scales in the strings.

The final movement is the utterance of a soul torn with despair, a marvellous tone picture but one which leaves the hearer in depressed mood. The playing of the work was a wonderful exhibition of artistry by both conductor and orchestra. So impressed were last evening's auditors that one might have heard a pin drop during the brief intermissions between the first three movements. At the close Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an ovation.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 18 1925

-:- MUSIC -:-

Magical Mr. Koussevitzky

Mr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night in the first concert of the season here through a program that was a model in its variety. And, we may add at once, a model of creative interpretation and of efficient musicianship, if we except Weber's "Euryanthe" which opened the proceedings and which not even the resourceful Mr. Koussevitzky could make interesting to us.

There were on the program, however, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the former well known by now, the latter but rarely played in this country. Then, as the crowning work of the evening, came Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony which ought to be called his "Majestic" Symphony.

* * *

Let us speak first of the last named. It is a good many years since we first heard it conducted, and the leader was Arthur Nikisch, who then had no peer as an interpreter of the Russian composer. In the interval we have heard it many times. Yet we do not hesitate to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading is the most satisfying of all. We do not mean that in musicianship Mr. Koussevitzky outtops Nikisch. It is in the mental and spiritual quality of Mr. Koussevitzky's travail that he excels in drawing from the instruments this tonal picture of a man's life struggle.

We noted in the second movement particularly last night, a sense of irony where too often we have listened to sentimental interpretations. And we noted all through the four movements the Aristotelian conception of the function of tragedy in art "to purge the soul of pity and terror." Neither pity nor terror were left when Mr. Koussevitzky laid down his baton. What he had evoked was a mood of exaltation springing from the contemplation of a struggle that was sublime in its intensity and heroic in its submission to destiny.

* * *

What a contrast there was in this master's playing of the music that depicts the wistful faun recollecting his wantonness in a moment of tranquillity! All the loveliness of primal woods, of elusive shapes flitting through faery groves, of emotions half-recaptured only to be lost again were summoned up for us by Mr. Koussevitzky as if he had been Prospero.

And then, that masterpiece of musical humor, the "Sorcerer's Apprentice." Even without the story on which it is founded, one could have felt the wild, fantastic delight of the composer in painting the antics of the apprentice who knew enough magic to make trouble, but not enough to unmake it.

Altogether a night to be remembered. Mr. Koussevitzky had to rouse his band a little testily once or twice to make it keep up with his dynamic imagination. But there were few flaws and it is a rare band indeed that could respond so successfully to the demands of Mr. Koussevitzky's versatile genius.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 18 1925

Sedgwick Concerts.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season are in greater demand than they have ever been in the illustrious history of this great organization, and the waiting lists of applicants for subscription tickets have for the first time reached the number of 1,000. Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 five years ago. The same conditions apply in New York where ten concerts are given.

This demand is largely due to the extraordinary genius of Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America. Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country which

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 20 1925

CONCERT NOTES

Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra come to this city for their first pair of concerts next week on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. A new score by Jacques Ibert called "Ports of Call" will be played for the first time here at the Thursday concert.

Roland Hayes, Negro tenor, will give a recital on Nov. 28 in Carnegie Hall.

A jazz symphony by Albert Chiafarelli is promised for an Aeolian Hall hearing early in December by Harry A. Yerkee, who is the leader of an orchestra called the Syncopating Symphonists.

Koussevitzky and his men were ovation. A. F. P.

N, PROVIDENCE, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1925

OLD CUSTOMERS PAY NO MONEY DOWN
Summerf
274 to 280 Weybosset Street

Overture
"Preude
("The Eclogue
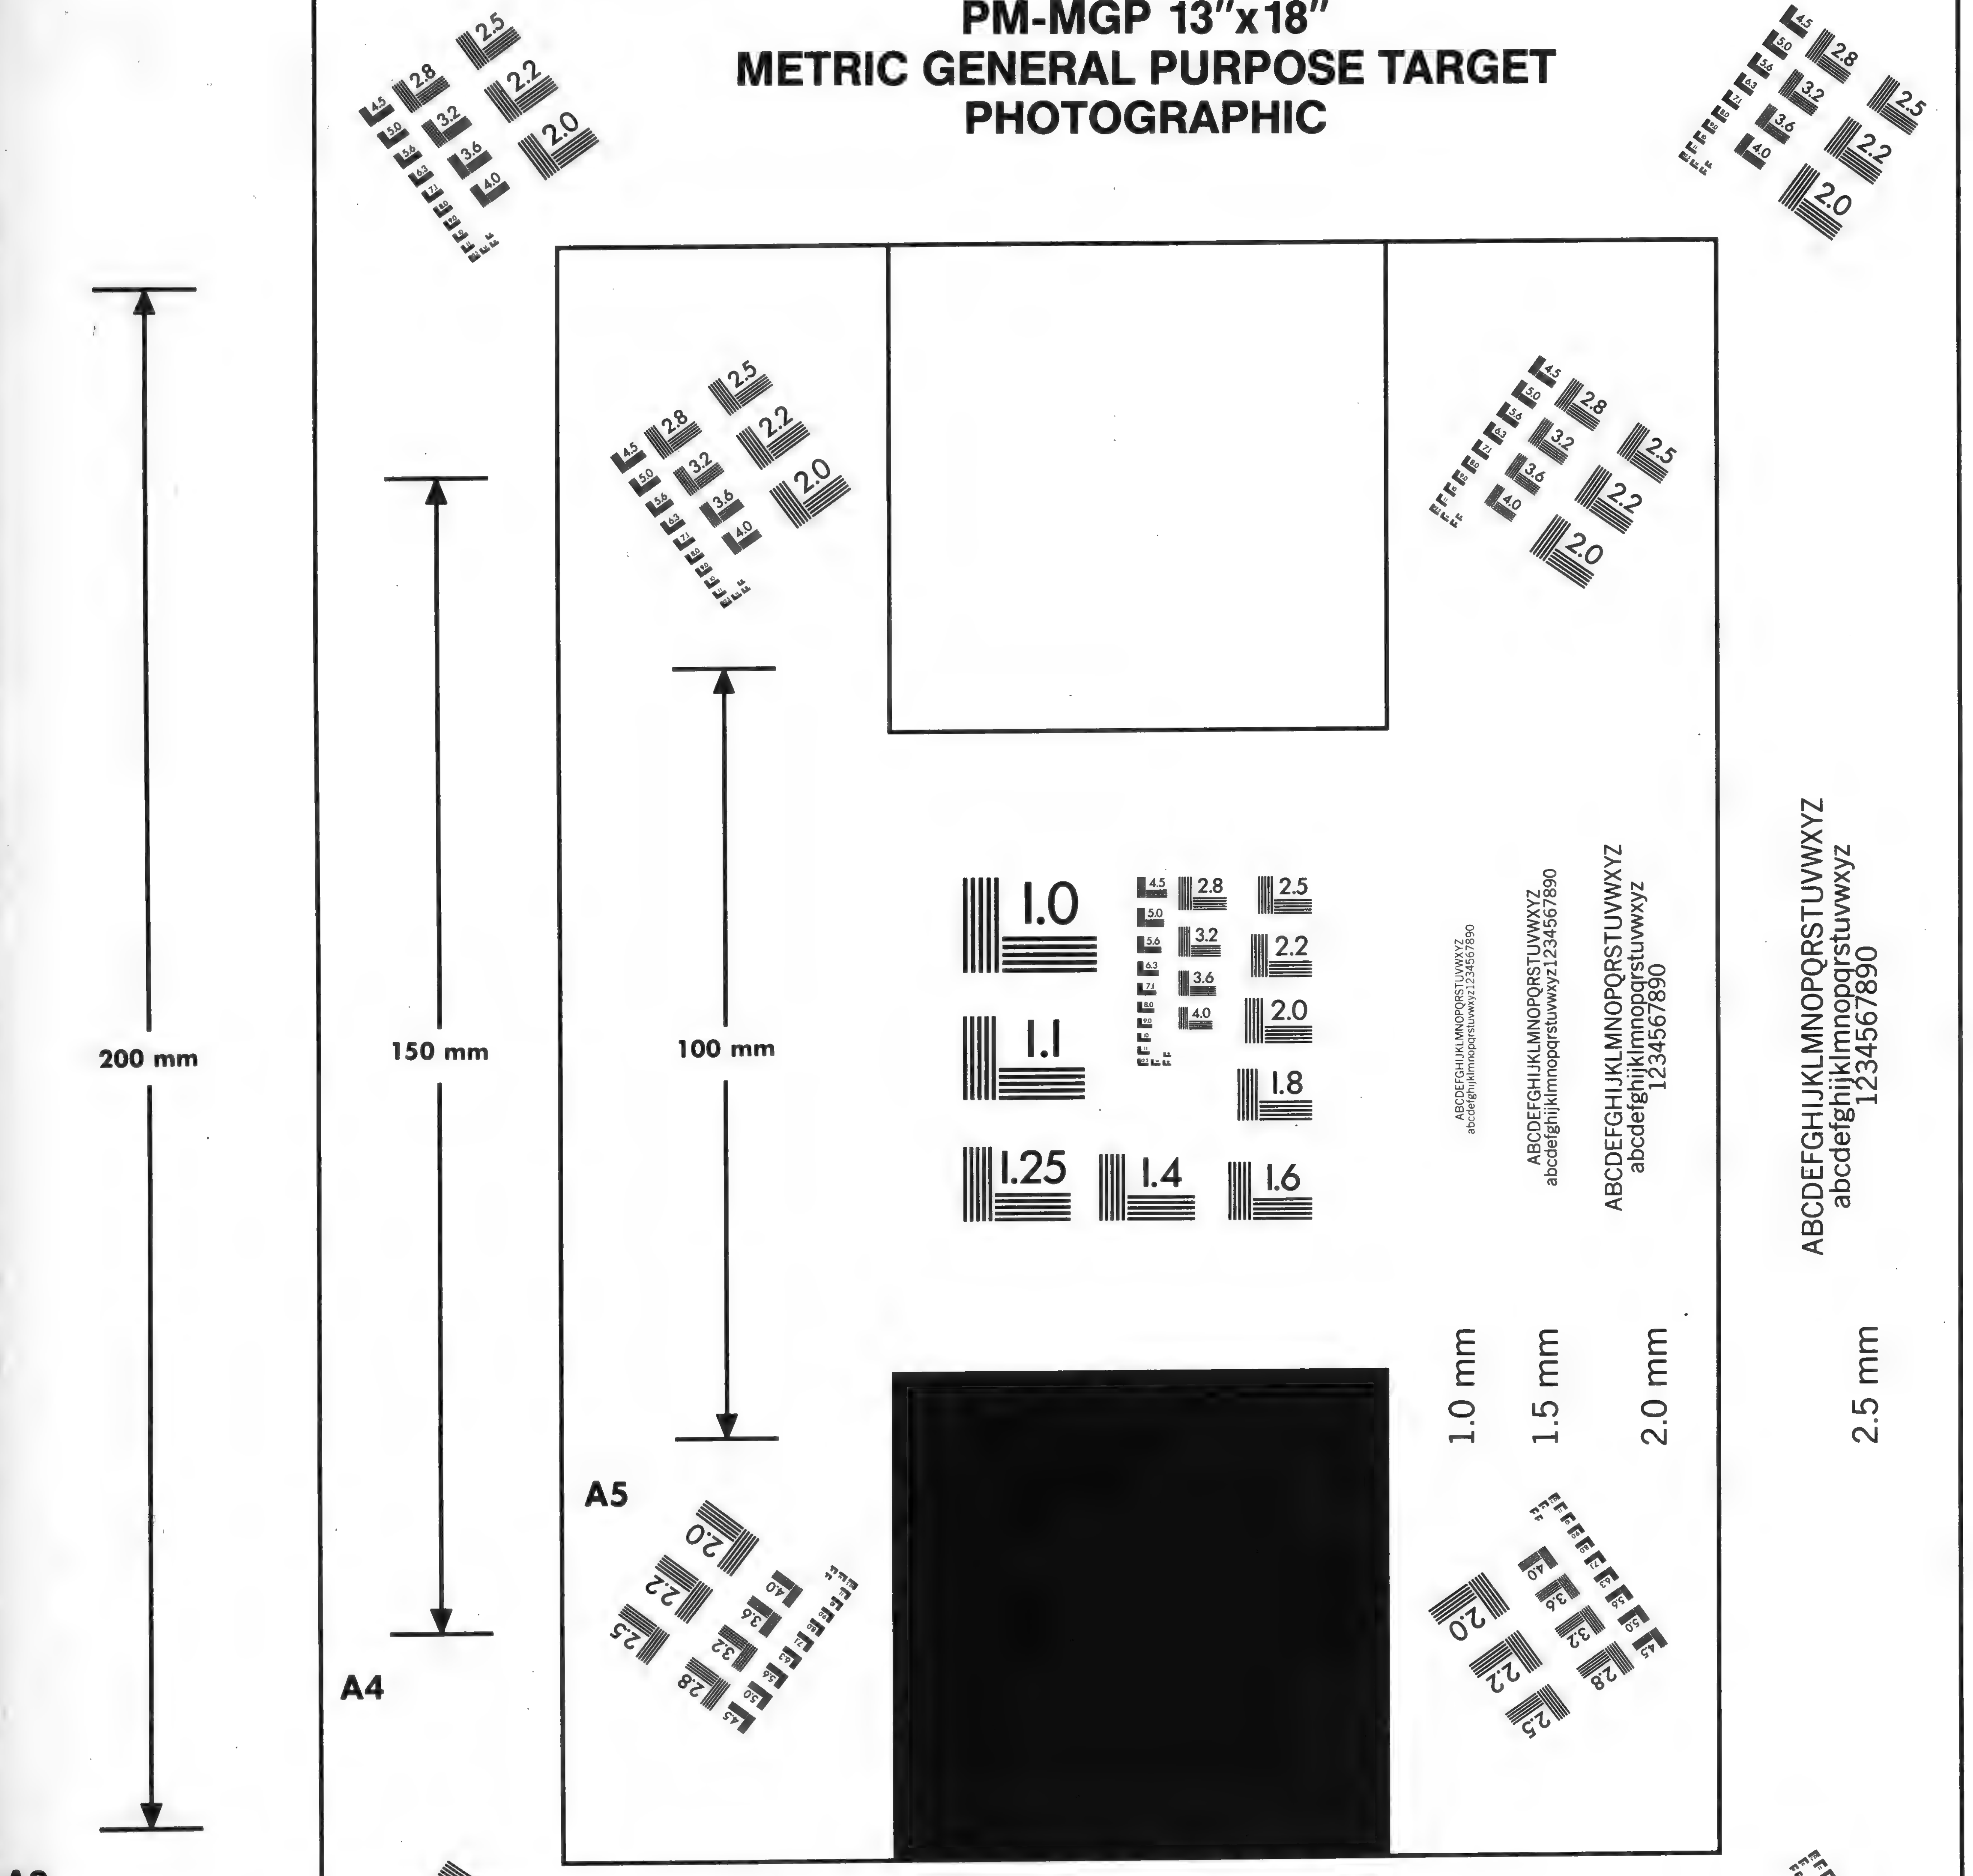
"L' Appre
Appre
by Goe
Symphony ...minor, "Pathetic,"
Op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Before the concert began the audience noted a change in the position of his instrumentalists since last season, bringing

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

146

Chamber Music of the Coming Week

League of Composers' Concert Directed by Koussevitzky

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will make his first appearance outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Town Hall ~~next Saturd~~ay evening, November 28, when the League of Composers presents its initial chamber orchestral concert of the season.

The program will be made up entirely of works never played here before by a group of outstanding modern composers, four of them Europeans, one American. They are Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokieff, Maurice Ravel, Alexander Tansman and the one representative of this country, Aaron Copland.

Mr. Koussevitsky, whose appearance is made by arrangement with the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony, will lead a group of picked instrumentalists from that orchestra. His soloists will be Maria Dormont, the singer, and Jesus Sanroma, the pianist.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino, a work for piano and chamber orchestra, which Koussevitsky introduced to Paris this spring. Its three movements are played without interruption, allegro moderato, larghetto and allegro. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice and as percussion.

Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was played last year both by Koussevitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for seventeen instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater." This was written last summer without any play in mind, but having its origin in several musical ideas that the composer felt might have been combined as incidental music for a play if there had been one at hand to fit. The prologue, announcing and developing a main theme, is followed by a quick, nervous dance. An interlude, based on a single theme, precedes a burlesque. Material from the first and third movements is reworked in the epilogue. The composer has just reached his twenty-fifth year.

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass and may be played by ten performers, as the character of thé work permits doubling. The first movement is devoted to the announcement of a theme and the development of variations. The second is andante energico, the third is allegro sostenuto ma con bria, the last adagio peasante.

This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theatre and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the Second Symphony, and reveals the same boisterous spirit expressed in jerky, concise themes and narrow internals.

Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country, though one of the songs has been played with piano accompaniment. According to Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, these represent Ravel's most notable songs since Scheherezade. They are written to verses of Mallarme.

The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, the young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double qintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones, kettledrums and other percussion instruments. According to his own description, it has the proportions of a chamber symphony for small orchestra and is divided into an allegro, a scherzo, a notturano, and a fugue and toccata.

The Letz Quartet will give a program of modern French music Thanksgiving night in Aeolian Hall, the numbers being Debussy's Quartet in G minor, G. Faure's Quartet for piano and strings and Ravel's Quartet in F major.

Music of Erwin Schulhoff, Czech composer, will be heard for the first time here at the concert of the New York String Quartet in Aeolian Hall Tuesday night. Five pieces will be given, including a waltz, tango, tarantella, serenade and allegro. Smetana's "From My Life" quartet and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1, complete the program.

Jean Leclair's Trio in D, Beethoven's Trio in G, for flute, bassoon and piano; Enesco's andante for flute and piano; Mozart's concerto for bassoon, first movement, and Bach's sonata in E for flute and piano, will be the program Wednesday night in the Adolph Lewisohn music appreciation course in Hunter College.

The Chamber Music Orchestra will give its first concert of this season tomorrow evening in Aeolian Hall. The program will include a number of novelties and Bella Katz, violinist, will make her debut in New York.

The Vertchamp String Quartet and Erwin Nyireghazi, pianist, will give the program tomorrow night at the concert of the Educational Alliance in the Straus Auditorium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony Opens Brooklyn Season on Friday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score recently in Boston, the opinion was generally expressed that his reading of the music of his countryman was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra, in G major; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorceror's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The unusually large demand for the Brooklyn series of Boston Symphony concerts is having its counterpart elsewhere this season, as the Boston Symphony concerts, generally, are in greater demand than ever before. In Boston, a fully subscribed season and a waiting list of 1,000 has led to the announcement of an additional series of five which will bring the total of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 2 1 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Sergei Koussevitsky is the conductor, will give the second in the series of concerts and recitals arranged by the management of the Unity Course in Montclair for this season in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night.

It should be needless to say that the concert will be one of the most important and enjoyable events occurring in this neighborhood this season. In instrumental performance, nothing can excel those to be heard on this occasion. The Boston orchestra and its conductor are known to Montclairites through the concerts in which Mr. Koussevitsky was introduced to them a year ago. They, as well as patrons of symphonic concerts in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, where the best are heard, know that no finer orchestral organisation exists than is the one having its headquarters in the Hub. As for Mr. Koussevitsky, he has been recognised since he came to this country as one of the most individual and eloquent among directors.

The program will be as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra, J. S. Bach
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV221925

Boston Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall: "Fragment from the Apocalypse," Liadov; "Kikimora," Liadov; suite from the opera "Tsar-Sultan," Rimsky - Korsakov, and symphony No. 1, Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV221925

Thursday.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall: Mr. Koussevitzky's first program this season in-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 2 6 1925

son, starting at 1 o'clock this afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens a sold-out series in Manhattan tonight and in Brooklyn tomorrow, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV22 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 26 and 28. The Symphony on Koussevitzky's Thursday evening program will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" No. 6. His program will also include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for strings, and two numbers to be heard for the first time in New York; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.), and a new score by Jacques Ibert, "Escales" ("Ports of Call") which Mr. Koussevitzky is introducing to America.

The matinee program will have the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor, and three Russian numbers: Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, the same composer's "Kikimora," an an orchestral suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 2 1925

Koussewitsky Leads First League Concert; Reiner With the Guild

THE first concert this season by the League of Composers will take place on Saturday evening, Nov. 28, and will be under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Koussewitsky makes this appearance by special arrangement with the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony.

Music hitherto unheard in New York will be played at this concert. The program is composed of works by Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and chamber orchestra. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice, and as percussion. Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was performed last year bath by Koussewitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for 17 instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater."

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass. This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theater and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the second symphony. Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country. The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, a young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double quintet

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV221925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 2 2 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its second season under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall with the usual Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts, November 26 and 28. On Thanksgiving night two numbers will be played for the first time in New York—Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and a new French work, Jacques Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). The symphony will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic." Saturday afternoon Liadoff's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and his "Kikimora," which was played at the stadium last summer, and an orchestral suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan" will precede Brahms's First Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

NOV 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony in Montclair

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the second concert of the Unity course in Unity Church, Montclair, on Wednesday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 2 1925

* * *

Koussevitsky Expected to Renew Contract

An announcement that Serge Koussevitzky probably would not continue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the expiration of his present contract in the spring of 1927, made recently in a music magazine, is utterly without foundation, W. H. Brennan, the manager, declared while in this city Tuesday evening for the first concert of the local series by the orchestra.

The article stated that Koussevitzky "is said to balk at so heavy a schedule as that which confronts him." The conductor, according to Mr. Brennan, has never intimated to the management that his schedule was overcrowded, and indeed he is given an important part in deciding how many concerts shall be played. Because of the increasing popularity of the orchestra and the demand for concerts in the larger cities, many smaller places have already been eliminated from the schedule, Providence now being one of the few cities in New England, outside of Greater Boston, that the organization continues to visit regularly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's present contract calls for a three year engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and according to Mr. Brennan, it is not customary to negotiate for the renewal of a contract

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

NOV 2 2 1925

Opening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music, next Friday evening, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score, recently in Boston the opinion was genrally expressed that his reading of music of his countrymen was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for String Orchestra, in G major; DeBusy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and another French score, Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this, Koussevitzky's second year, is having one of the finest seasons in its history. The concerts have never been more sought. Since in Boston all the season's concerts were fully subscribed, and there was a waiting list of 1,000, an additional series of five has been

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 2 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the marvelous Koussevitzky, which Portland regrets not hearing this season, is giving some most interesting music just now. One of its last programs offered Stravinsky's Suite, "Le Chant du Rossignol," with its strange rhythms, its original and descriptive orchestration and the rare instrumental color; Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "Battle of Kerjenetzt," from the opera "Kitesch," and Moussorgsky's picturesque "Persian" Dances from "Khovantchina."

For contrasting music, Serge Koussevitzky drew upon Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor. The Symphony was given an eloquent and romantic reading.

Chamber Music of the Coming Week

League of Composers' Concert Directed by Koussevitsky

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will make his first appearance outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Town Hall ~~next Saturday~~ evening, November 28, when the League of Composers presents its initial chamber orchestral concert of the season.

The program will be made up entirely of works never played here before by a group of outstanding modern composers, four of them Europeans, one American. They are Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokieff, Maurice Ravel, Alexander Tansman and the one representative of this country, Aaron Copland.

Mr. Koussevitsky, whose appearance is made by arrangement with the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony, will lead a group of picked instrumentalists from that orchestra. His soloists will be Maria Dormont, the singer, and Jesus Sanroma, the pianist.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino, a work for piano and chamber orchestra, which Koussevitsky introduced to Paris this spring. Its three movements are played without interruption, allegro moderato, larghetto and allegro. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice and as percussion.

Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was played last year both by Koussevitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for seventeen instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater." This was written last summer without any play in mind, but having its origin in several musical ideas that the composer felt might have been combined as incidental music for a play if there had been one at hand to fit. The prologue, announcing and developing a main theme, is followed by a quick, nervous dance. An interlude, based on a single theme, precedes a burlesque. Material from the first and third movements is reworked in the epilogue. The composer has just reached his twenty-fifth year.

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass and may be played by ten performers, as the character of the work permits doubling. The first movement is devoted to the announcement of a theme and the development of variations. The second is andante energico, the third is allegro sostenuto ma con bria, the last adagio peasante.

This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theatre and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the Second Symphony, and reveals the same boisterous spirit expressed in jerky, concise themes and narrow internals.

Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country, though one of the songs has been played with piano accompaniment. According to Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, these represent Ravel's most notable songs since Scheherezade. They are written to verses of Mallarme.

The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, the young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double qintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones, kettledrums and other percussion instruments. According to his own description, it has the proportions of a chamber symphony for small orchestra and is divided into an allegro, a scherzo, a notturano, and a fugue and toccata.

The Letz Quartet will give a program of modern French music Thanksgiving night in Aeolian Hall, the numbers being Debussy's Quartet in G minor, G. Faure's Quartet for piano and strings and Ravel's Quartet in F major.

Music of Erwin Schulhoff, Czech composer, will be heard for the first time here at the concert of the New York String Quartet in Aeolian Hall Tuesday night. Five pieces will be given, including a waltz, tango, tarantella, serenade and allegro. Smetana's "From My Life" quartet and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1, complete the program.

Jean Leclair's Trio in D, Beethoven's Trio in G, for flute, bassoon and piano; Enesco's andante for flute and piano; Mozart's concerto for bassoon, first movement, and Bach's sonata in E for flute and piano, will be the program Wednesday night in the Adolph Lewisohn music appreciation course in Hunter College.

The Chamber Music Orchestra will give its first concert of this season tomorrow evening in Aeolian Hall. The program will include a number of novelties and Bella Katz, violinist, will make her debut in New York.

The Vertchamp String Quartet and Erwin Nyireghazi, pianist, will give the program tomorrow night at the concert of the Educational Alliance in the Straus Auditorium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 22 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 26 and 28. The Symphony on Koussevitzky's Thursday evening program will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" No. 6. His program will also include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for strings, and two numbers to be heard for the first time in New York; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.), and a new score by Jacques Ibert, "Escales" ("Ports of Call") which Mr. Koussevitzky is introducing to America.

The matinee program will have the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor, and three Russian numbers: Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, the same composer's "Kikimora," an an orchestral suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 22 1925

Koussewitsky Leads First League Concert; Reiner With the Guild

THE first concert this season by the League of Composers will take place on Saturday evening, Nov. 28, and will be under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Koussewitsky makes this appearance by special arrangement with the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony.

Music ~~hitherto~~ unheard in New York will be played at this concert. The program is composed of works by Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and chamber orchestra. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice, and as percussion. Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was performed last year bath by Koussewitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for 17 instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater."

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass. This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theater and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the second symphony. Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country. The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, a young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double quintet

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 22 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 22 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its second ~~season~~ under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its New York ~~season~~ in Carnegie Hall with the usual Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts, November 26 and 28. On Thanksgiving night two numbers will be played for the first time in New York—Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and a new French work, Jacques Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). The symphony will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic." Saturday afternoon Liadoff's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and his "Kikimora," which was played at the stadium last summer, and an orchestral suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan" will precede Brahms's First Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

NOV 22 1925

Boston Symphony in Montclair

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the second concert of the Unity course in Unity Church, Montclair, on Wednesday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1925

Koussevitsky Expected to Renew Contract

An announcement that Serge Koussevitzky probably would not continue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the expiration of his present contract in the spring of 1927, made recently in a music magazine, is utterly without foundation, W. H. Brennan, the manager, declared while in this city Tuesday evening for the first concert of the local series by the orchestra.

The article stated that Koussevitzky "is said to balk at so heavy a schedule as that which confronts him." The conductor, according to Mr. Brennan, has never intimated to the management that his schedule was overcrowded, and indeed he is given an important part in deciding how many concerts shall be played. Because of the increasing popularity of the orchestra and the demand for concerts in the larger cities, many smaller places have already been eliminated from the schedule, Providence now being one of the few cities in New England, outside of Greater Boston, that the organization continues to visit regularly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's present contract calls for a three year engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and according to Mr. Brennan, it is not customary to negotiate for the renewal of a contract

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

NOV 22 1925

Opening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music, next Friday evening, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score, recently in Boston the opinion was genrally expressed that his reading of music of his countrymen was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for String Orchestra, in G major; DeBusy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and another French score, Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this, Koussevitzky's second year, is having one of the finest seasons in its history. The concerts have never been more sought. Since in Boston all the season's concerts were fully subscribed, and there was a waiting list of 1,000, an additional series of five has been

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 22 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the marvelous Koussevitzky, which Portland regrets not hearing this season, is giving some most interesting music just now. One of its last programs offered Stravinsky's Suite, "Le Chant du Rossignol," with its strange rhythms, its original and descriptive orchestration and the rare instrumental color; Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "Battle of Kerjenetzt," from the opera "Kitesch," and Moussorgsky's picturesque "Persian" Dances from "Khovantchina."

For contrasting music, Serge Koussevitzky drew upon Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor. The Symphony was given an eloquent and romantic reading.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 21 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Sergei Koussevitzky is the conductor, will give the second in the series of concerts and recitals arranged by the management of the Unity Course in Montclair for this season in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night.

It should be needless to say that the concert will be one of the most important and enjoyable events occurring in this neighborhood this season. In instrumental performance, nothing can excel those to be heard on this occasion. The Boston orchestra and its conductor are known to Montclairites through the concerts in which Mr. Koussevitsky was introduced to them a year ago. They, as well as patrons of symphonic concerts in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, where the best are heard, know that no finer orchestral organisation exists than is the one having its headquarters in the Hub. As for Mr. Koussevitsky, he has been recognized since he came to this country as one of the most individual and eloquent among directors.

The program will be as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra, J. S. Bach
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 22 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall: "Fragment from the Apocalypse," Liadov; "Kikimora," Liadov; suite from the opera "Tsar-Sultan," Rimsky - Korsakov, symphony No. 1, Brahms.

in the United States, and his me will be honored.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 22 1925

Boston Symphony Opens Brooklyn Season on Friday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score recently in Boston, the opinion was generally expressed that his reading of the music of his countryman was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra, in G major; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorceror's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The unusually large demand for the Brooklyn series of Boston Symphony concerts is having its counterpart elsewhere this season, as the Boston Symphony concerts, generally, are in greater demand than ever before. In Boston, a fully subscribed season and a waiting list of 1,000 has led to the announcement of an additional series of five which will bring the total of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 22 1925

Thursday.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall: Mr. Koussevitzky's first program this season in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 26 1925

season, starting at 1 o'clock this afternoon. The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens a sold-out series in Manhattan tonight and in Brooklyn tomorrow, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

146

Chamber Music of the Coming Week

League of Composers' Concert Directed by Koussevitsky

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will make his first appearance outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Town Hall ~~next Saturday~~ evening, November 28, when the League of Composers presents its initial chamber orchestral concert of the season.

The program will be made up entirely of works never played here before by a group of outstanding modern composers, four of them Europeans, one American. They are Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokieff, Maurice Ravel, Alexander Tansman and the one representative of this country, Aaron Copland.

Mr. Koussevitsky, whose appearance is made by arrangement with the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony, will lead a group of picked instrumentalists from that orchestra. His soloists will be Maria Dormont, the singer, and Jesus Sanroma, the pianist.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino, a work for piano and chamber orchestra, which Koussevitsky introduced to Paris this spring. Its three movements are played without interruption, allegro moderato, larghetto and allegro. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice and as percussion.

Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was played last year both by Koussevitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for seventeen instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater." This was written last summer without any play in mind, but having its origin in several musical ideas that the composer felt might have been combined as incidental music for a play if there had been one at hand to fit. The prologue, announcing and developing a main theme, is followed by a quick, nervous dance. An interlude, based on a single theme, precedes a burlesque. Material from the first and third movements is reworked in the epilogue. The composer has just reached his twenty-fifth year.

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass and may be played by ten performers, ~~as the~~ character of thé work permits doubling. The first movement is devoted to the announcement of a theme and the development of variations. The second is andante energico, the third is allegro sostenuto ma con bria, the last adagio peasante.

This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theatre and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the Second Symphony, and reveals the same boisterous spirit expressed in jerky, concise themes and narrow internals.

Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country, though one of the songs has been played with piano accompaniment. According to Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, these represent Ravel's most notable songs since Scheherezade. They are written to verses of Mallarme.

The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, the young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double qintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones, kettledrums and other percussion instruments. According to his own description, it has the proportions of a chamber symphony for small orchestra and is divided into an allegro, a scherzo, a notturano, and a fugue and toccata.

The Letz Quartet will give a program of modern French music Thanksgiving night in Aeolian Hall, the numbers being Debussy's Quartet in G minor, G. Faure's Quartet for piano and strings and Ravel's Quartet in F major.

Music of Erwin Schulhoff, Czech composer, will be heard for the first time here at the concert of the New York String Quartet in Aeolian Hall Tuesday night. Five pieces will be given, including a waltz, tango, tarantella, serenade and allegro. Smetana's "From My Life" quartet and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1, complete the program.

Jean Leclair's Trio in D, Beethoven's Trio in G, for flute, bassoon and piano; Enesco's andante for flute and piano; Mozart's concerto for bassoon, first movement, and Bach's sonata in E for flute and piano, will be the program Wednesday night in the Adolph Lewisohn music appreciation course in Hunter College.

The Chamber Music Orchestra will give its first concert of this season tomorrow evening in Aeolian Hall. The program will include a number of novelties and Bella Katz, violinist, will make her debut in New York.

The Vertchamp String Quartet and Erwin Nyireghazi, pianist, will give the program tomorrow night at the concert of the Educational Alliance in the Straus Auditorium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 22 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 26 and 28. The Symphony on Koussevitzky's Thursday evening program will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" No. 6. His program will also include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for strings, and two numbers to be heard for the first time in New York; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.), and a new score by Jacques Ibert, "Escales" ("Ports of Call") which Mr. Koussevitzky is introducing to America.

The matinee program will have the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor, and three Russian numbers: Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, the same composer's "Kikimora," an an orchestral suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

NOV 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony in Montclair

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the second concert of the Unity course in Unity Church, Montclair, on Wednesday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 2 1925

• • •

Koussevitsky Expected to Renew Contract

An announcement that Serge Koussevitzky probably would not continue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the expiration of his present contract in the spring of 1927, made recently in a music magazine, is utterly without foundation, W. H. Brennan, the manager, declared while in this city Tuesday evening for the first concert of the local series by the orchestra.

The article stated that Koussevitzky "is said to balk at so heavy a schedule as that which confronts him." The conductor, according to Mr. Brennan, has never intimated to the management that his schedule was overcrowded, and indeed he is given an important part in deciding how many concerts shall be played. Because of the increasing popularity of the orchestra and the demand for concerts in the larger cities, many smaller places have already been eliminated from the schedule, Providence now being one of the few cities in New England, outside of Greater Boston, that the organization continues to visit regularly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's present contract calls for a three year engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and according to Mr. Brennan, it is not customary to negotiate for the renewal of a contract until a year before it expires. While the conductor is strongly attached to Paris, he has found great artistic pleasure in conducting in this country, Mr. Brennan says, and it is expected that he will continue at the head of the orchestra at least for another three-year period after 1927. The orchestra schedule this season includes 112 concerts.

• • •

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 2 1925

Koussewitsky Leads First League Concert; Reiner With the Guild

THE first concert this season by the League of Composers will take place on Saturday evening, Nov. 28, and will be under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Koussewitsky makes this appearance by special arrangement with the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony.

Music ~~hitherto~~ unheard in New York will be played at this concert. The program is composed of works by Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and chamber orchestra. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice, and as percussion. Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was performed last year bath by Koussewitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for 17 instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater."

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass. This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theater and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the second symphony. Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country. The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, a young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double quintet

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 2 2 1925

Boston Symphony Opens Brooklyn Season on Friday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score recently in Boston, the opinion was generally expressed that his reading of the music of his countryman was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra, in G major; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorceror's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The unusually large demand for the Brooklyn series of Boston Symphony concerts is having its counterpart elsewhere this season, as the Boston Symphony concerts, generally, are in greater demand than ever before. In Boston, a fully subscribed season and a waiting list of 1,000 has led to the announcement of an additional series of five which will bring the total of … in their … so wait- … ncerts in … sons, are … he Insti-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 2 1 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Sergei Koussevitzky is the conductor, will give the second in the series of concerts and recitals arranged by the management of the Unity Course in Montclair for this season in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night.

It should be needless to say that the concert will be one of the most important and enjoyable events occurring in this neighborhood this season. In instrumental performance, nothing can excel those to be heard on this occasion. The Boston orchestra and its conductor are known to Montclairites through the concerts in which Mr. Koussevitzky was introduced to them a year ago. They, as well as patrons of symphonic concerts in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, where the best are heard, know that no finer orchestral organisation exists than is the one having its headquarters in the Hub. As for Mr. Koussevitzky, he has been recognised since he came to this country as one of the most individual and eloquent among directors.

The program will be as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra, J. S. Bach
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV22 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall: "Fragment from the Apocalypse," Liadov; "Kikimora," Liadov; suite from the opera "Tsar-Sultan," Rimsky - Korsakov, symphony No. 1, Brahms.

… will be honored.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV22 1925

Thursday.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall: Mr. Koussevitzky's first program this ~~season~~ includes Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, Bach; "A Chinese Legend" (new), Eichheim; "Escales" (new), Jacques Ibert; "Pathetic" symphony, Tchaikovsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV22 1925

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony open a Brooklyn Academy series next Friday night with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Debussy's "Faun," Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique."

Sy… Br… Mu… The… will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score, recently in Boston the opinion was genrally expressed that his reading of music of his countrymen was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for String Orchestra, in G major; DeBusy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and another French score, Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this, Koussevitzky's second year, is having one of the finest seasons in its history. The concerts have never been more sought. Since in Boston all the season's concerts were fully subscribed, and there was a waiting list of 1,000, an additional series of five has been added which will make a total of seventy-six Boston Symphony Concerts to be given in their own city this year. The series given by this Orchestra in a few other cities have likewise met with a similar demand, and the subscription in Brooklyn has been unusually large.

…end" and a new French work, Jacques Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). The symphony will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic." Saturday afternoon Liadoff's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and his "Kikimora," which was played at the stadium last summer, and an orchestral suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan" will precede Brahms's First Symphony.

For contrasting music, Serge Koussevitzky drew upon Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor. The Symphony was given an eloquent and romantic reading.

Chamber Music of the Coming Week

League of Composers' Concert Directed by Koussevitsky

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will make his first appearance outside the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Town Hall ~~next Saturda~~y evening, November 28, when the League of Composers presents its initial chamber orchestral concert of the season.

The program will be made up entirely of works never played here before by a group of outstanding modern composers, four of them Europeans, one American. They are Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokieff, Maurice Ravel, Alexander Tansman and the one representative of this country, Aaron Copland.

Mr. Koussevitsky, whose appearance is made by arrangement with the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony, will lead a group of picked instrumentalists from that orchestra. His soloists will be Maria Dormont, the singer, and Jesus Sanroma, the pianist.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino, a work for piano and chamber orchestra, which Koussevitsky introduced to Paris this spring. Its three movements are played without interruption, allegro moderato, larghetto and allegro. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice and as percussion.

Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was played last year both by Koussevitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for seventeen instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater." This was written last summer without any play in mind, but having its origin in several musical ideas that the composer felt might have been combined as incidental music for a play if there had been one at hand to fit. The prologue, announcing and developing a main theme, is followed by a quick, nervous dance. An interlude, based on a single theme, precedes a burlesque. Material from the first and third movements is reworked in the epilogue. The composer has just reached his twenty-fifth year.

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass and may be played by ten performers, as the character of thé work permits doubling. The first movement is devoted to the announcement of a theme and the development of variations. The second is andante energico, the third is allegro sostenuto ma con bria, the last adagio peasante.

This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theatre and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the Second Symphony, and reveals the same boisterous spirit expressed in jerky, concise themes and narrow internals.

Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country, though one of the songs has been played with piano accompaniment. According to Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, these represent Ravel's most notable songs since Scheherezade. They are written to verses of Mallarme.

The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, the young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double qintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones, kettledrums and other percussion instruments. According to his own description, it has the proportions of a chamber symphony for small orchestra and is divided into an allegro, a scherzo, a notturano, and a fugue and toccata.

The Letz Quartet will give a program of modern French music Thanksgiving night in Aeolian Hall, the numbers being Debussy's Quartet in G minor, G. Faure's Quartet for piano and strings and Ravel's Quartet in F major.

Music of Erwin Schulhoff, Czech composer, will be heard for the first time here at the concert of the New York String Quartet in Aeolian Hall Tuesday night. Five pieces will be given, including a waltz, tango, tarantella, serenade and allegro. Smetana's "From My Life" quartet and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1, complete the program.

Jean Leclair's Trio in D, Beethoven's Trio in G, for flute, bassoon and piano; Enesco's andante for flute and piano; Mozart's concerto for bassoon, first movement, and Bach's sonata in E for flute and piano, will be the program Wednesday night in the Adolph Lewisohn music appreciation course in Hunter College.

The Chamber Music Orchestra will give its first concert of this season tomorrow evening in Aeolian Hall. The program will include a number of novelties and Bella Katz, violinist, will make her debut in New York.

The Vertchamp String Quartet and Erwin Nyireghazi, pianist, will give the program tomorrow night at the concert of the Educational Alliance in the Straus Auditorium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 21 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Sergei Koussevitzky is the conductor, will give the second in the series of concerts and recitals arranged by the management of the Unity Course in Montclair for this season in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night.

It should be needless to say that the concert will be one of the most important and enjoyable events occurring in this neighborhood this season. In instrumental performance, nothing can excel those to be heard on this occasion. The Boston orchestra and its conductor are known to Montclairites through the concerts in which Mr. Koussevitsky was introduced to them a year ago. They, as well as patrons of symphonic concerts in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, where the best are heard, know that no finer orchestral organisation exists than is the one having its headquarters in the Hub. As for Mr. Koussevitzky, he has been recognized since he came to this country as one of the most individual and eloquent among directors.

The program will be as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra, J. S. Bach
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy
Suite from the opera "Tsar Saltana" ...... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68 .... Brahms

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 22 1925

Boston Symphony Opens Brooklyn Season on Friday Night.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score recently in Boston, the opinion was generally expressed that his reading of the music of his countryman was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra, in G major; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorceror's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The unusually large demand for the Brooklyn series of Boston Symphony concerts is having its counterpart elsewhere this season, as the Boston Symphony concerts, generally, are in greater demand than ever before. In Boston, a fully subscribed season and a waiting list of 1,000 has led to the announcement of an additional series of five, which will bring the total of Boston Symphony concerts in their own city to 76. There are also waiting lists in New York.

The Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn, as in former seasons, are given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Kousse- ... program this ~~season in~~cludes Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, Bach; "A Chinese Legend" (new), Eichheim; "Escales" (new), Jacques Ibert; "Pathetic" symphony, Tchaikovsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 22 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its New York season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 26 and 28. The Symphony on Koussevitzky's Thursday evening program will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" No. 6. His program will also include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for strings, and two numbers to be heard for the first time in New York; Eichheim's Chinese Legend (about 600 A. D.), and a new score by Jacques Ibert, "Escales" ("Ports of Call") which Mr. Koussevitzky is introducing to America.

The matinee program will have the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor, and three Russian numbers: Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, the same composer's "Kikimora," an an orchestral suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 22 1925

Koussewitsky Leads First League Concert; Reiner With the Guild

THE first concert this season by the League of Composers will take place on Saturday evening, Nov. 28, and will be under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Koussewitsky makes this appearance by special arrangement with the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony.

Music ~~hitherto~~ unheard in New York will be played at this concert. The program is composed of works by Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland.

Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and chamber orchestra. The piano is contrasted with the orchestra in the first movement, in the second and third it is alternately treated as leading voice, and as percussion. Copland, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was performed last year bath by Koussewitsky and Walter Damrosch, contributes a piece for 17 instruments and percussion, entitled "Music for the Theater."

The quintet of Prokofieff is for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass. This was originally planned as a ballet for the Russian Romantic Theater and given the title "The Trapeze." It was composed in about 1921, the period of the second symphony. Ravel's "Trois Poemes," written in 1913 for voice and chamber orchestra of two clarinets, two flutes, a harp and string quartet, are not known in this country. The "Sinfonietta" of Tansman, a young Polish composer now living in France, was written in 1924 and introduced to Paris in 1925. He is known to America only through the string quartet produced by the League of Composers in March, 1924. The new work is for a double quintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones, kettledrums and other percussion instruments. According to his own description, it has the proportions of a chamber symphony for small orchestra.

* * *

AT THE first of this season's concerts by the International Com- ... Reiner will con- ... rmance end" and a new French work, Jacques Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). The symphony will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic." Saturday afternoon Liadoff's "Fragment from the Apocalypse" and his "Kikimora," which was played at the stadium last summer, and an orchestral suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan" will precede Brahms's First Symphony.

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

NOV 22 1925

Boston Symphony in Montclair

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the second concert of the Unity course in Unity Church, Montclair, on Wednesday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1925

* * *

Koussevitsky Expected to Renew Contract

An announcement that Serge Koussevitzky probably would not continue with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the expiration of his present contract in the spring of 1927, made recently in a music magazine, is utterly without foundation, W. H. Brennan, the manager, declared while in this city Tuesday evening for the first concert of the local series by the orchestra.

The article stated that Koussevitzky "is said to balk at so heavy a schedule as that which confronts him." The conductor, according to Mr. Brennan, has never intimated to the management that his schedule was overcrowded, and indeed he is given an important part in deciding how many concerts shall be played. Because of the increasing popularity of the orchestra and the demand for concerts in the larger cities, many smaller places have already been eliminated from the schedule, Providence now being one of the few cities in New England, outside of Greater Boston, that the organization continues to visit regularly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's present contract calls for a three year engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and according to Mr. Brennan, it is not customary to negotiate for the renewal of a contract until a year before it expires. While the conductor is strongly attached to Paris, he has found great artistic pleasure in conducting in this country, Mr. Brennan says, and it is expected that he will continue at the head of the orchestra at least for another three-year period after 1927. The orchestra schedule this season includes 112 concerts.

* * *

Sy
Br
Mu
The
will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. When the Russian conductor was first heard in America in this score, recently in Boston the opinion was genrally expressed that his reading of music of his countrymen was one of his most remarkable performances during his sojourn in America so far. Also on this programme there will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for String Orchestra, in G major; DeBusy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and another French score, Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's poem of the same name.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this, Koussevitzky's second year, is having one of the finest seasons in its history. The concerts have never been more sought. Since in Boston all the season's concerts were fully subscribed, and there was a waiting list of 1,000, an additional series of five has been added which will make a total of seventy-six Boston Symphony Concerts to be given in their own city this year. The series given by this Orchestra in a few other cities have likewise met with a similar demand, and the subscription in Brooklyn has been unusually large.

For contrasting music, Serge Koussevitzky drew upon Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor. The Symphony was given an eloquent and romantic reading.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 2 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, for many years famous as an orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, died at his home recently at the age of 80 years. He is survived by a widow and two daughters. He had lived in retirement for a number of years.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke in America is linked particularly with that of the Boston Symphony, which under his excellent leadership in the years following 1884 developed into an orchestra of the first rank.

Gericke, it will be remembered, visited Portland in the earlier days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in old City Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

There will be no performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston this week, as the organization will be in New York and Brooklyn. The new historical series of concerts in Boston to be given on Tuesday afternoons will open on Dec. 1.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following program for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concert for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah;" the Praeludium to Hadyn's "Creation;" Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The new Repertory Theatre in Boston, under the direction of Henry Jewett, has been fortunate enough to secure Daniel Kuntz as leader of the little orchestra of 10 pieces which will furnish the incidental and between-acts music. Mr. Kuntz will be remembered by reason of his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra in which for many years, under various conductors, he was formerly one of the leading violins.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

Two new pieces are on the Boston Symphony orchestra's programs in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 2 8 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK TELEGRAM

NOV 2 1 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, at present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first American appearance outside of the concerts of that organization when on Saturday evening, November 28, in the Town Hall, he directs the season's first chamber orchestral concert of the League of Composers.

Compositions by Honegger, Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland are to be performed on that occasion. Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and small orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky brought forward in Paris last spring. The Prokokieff piece is a quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass.

Ravel contributes "Trio Poems," composed as far back as 1913, to texts by Mallarme. They are written for solo voice accompanied by two clarinets, two flutes, harp and quartet of strings. The work of Tansman, a young Polish composer now loving in Paris, is a "Sinfonietta." Aaron Copland, the young American composer, whose symphony for orchestra and organ Walter Damrosch introduced here last season, this time appears as author of a composition entitled "Music for the Theatre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 1 1925

REALM OF MUSIC

By Paul Morris

LAST year a group of indignant directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra threatened the conductor of that lively symphonic body, the awe-inspiring Leopold Stokowski, with banishment if he continued to exploit "futurist" composers. But he still persists in giving his subscribers the kind of novelties they don't want in conjunction with the conventional symphonic fare that they crave.

In New York, also, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with such orchestral novelties as are from time to time foisted upon an unwilling public. But, if the public prefers the over played classics, most conductors find real pleasure in preparing new sounding untraditional musical experiments. Next week a good many highly conventionalized symphonic subscribers will give their seats to their poor relatives or to their tone deaf friends whose nerves are not upset by discords and dissonance. There will be an extra seat sale for that select group of music lovers who detest harmonious music and adore Schoenberg, Leo Ornstein and their imitators. It will be a great week for the "advanced" composers.

Koussevitzky, the high priest of the "futurists," who directs new music much better than old, brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, featuring two new works, Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Ports of Call." On Saturday night in Town Hall he will do even better by the composers of the future when he directs a whole program of new music

American appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by kind permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization, and his soloists will be Jesus Sanroma at the piano and Maria 'Dormont, singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 2 2 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

League to Give Three Evening Concerts

New Chamber Music Will Be Presented This Season

well as the dolls who take part. There will, of course, be a stage within a stage, and the marionettes, the scenes and action will be designed and directed by Remo Bufano, the young Italian puppet master, who is opening his own puppet theatre here this winter.

Plans for the third concert, which will take place in February, will be announced later in the season.

The League of Composers' Review will be published four times this year under the title of "Modern Music." The first issue will appear early in November, and the expanded plans of the magazine will be made public shortly before that time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 2 1 1925

The Schola Cantorum and the Philharmonic

Orchestral Concerts of Thanksgiving Week

FOUR CONCERTS are scheduled for Thanksgiving week by the Philharmonic, the feature being the performance of Mahler's Second Symphony on Wednesday evening (instead of the usual Thursday) and on Friday afternoon. A chorus from Kurt Schindler's Schola Cantorum will assist, and the soloists will be Ruth Rodgers, soprano, and Martha Offers, a Dutch contralto, who has sung with Toscanini at Milan and is making her debut in this country.

The program for tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall consists of Tansman's "Danse de la Sorciere," its first performance here, the orchestral suite from Strauss' "Bourgeoise Gentilhomme," and Brahms' Second Symphony. One week from tonight will be the students' concert in Carnegie Hall, when the program will be one movement from the Mahler Symphony, Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, De Falla's "Suite Tricorne" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Two concerts are scheduled for the week by the New York Symphony; the first tomorrow afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, when Walter Damrosch and his daughter Polly will play Saint-Saens' "Carnaval des Animaux" for two pianos, Reinald Werrenrath will sing Horatio Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" (new to New York) and Shubert, Grieg and Brahms songs. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony and Faure's "La Pavanne"

March from "Aida," excerpts from Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, the overture to "Der Freischuetz" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, when the program will be Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 for string orchestra, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and two numbers played here for the first time, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"). Saturday's program will be Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse," "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Tsar Saltan" and Brahms' First Symphony.

Three compositions will be heard for the first time tomorrow afternoon at the concert of the Society of the Friends of Music in Town Hall. Artur Bodanzky will conduct the orchestra and Stephen Townsend the chorus. They will be Frederick Jacobi's "The Poet of the Desert," for orchestra, chorus and baritone, Lawrence Tibbett, soloist; Ella Adaiewsky's "Horatian Ode," for two voices, Marion Telva and Mr. Tibbett, soloists, and Paolo Gallico's septet, in which he will play the piano, Leonard Sansonne the horn, the New York String Quartet the strings and Miss Telva will sing. The other number will be Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" with orchestra, chorus and Miss Telva, Carl Schlegel and Max Bloch, soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

Music Notes

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will open the New York season of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

The program for the opening concert will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for String Orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony "Pathetic;" and two numbers to be heard for the first time in New York—Eichheim's Chinese Legend, and "Escales" ("Ports of Call") by Jacques Ibert, the French composer. The program for the Saturday matinee will consist of Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, and "Kikimora;" a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan;" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

NOV 2 7 1925

MUS

By Samuel Ch

Boston Orchestra at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed Thanksgiving Day by descending on New York with a program devoted mainly to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," which, as every one knows, is no hymn of joy. At least that is the general opinion of the popular work fostered by the greatest amount of written nonsense ever called forth by any work of art.

It may very well be that its popularity is due in a greater measure to the lachrymose theories about it, which the general public is fed in books and program notes and musical biography, than to the merits of the music itself. Tschaikowsky is believed to have felt this and that when he wrote it, and it is even whispered that he committed suicide the moment it was finished. At the first lugubrious notes of the beginning the audience settles down to a luxuriant melancholy and people furtively reach out for each other's hands in mute sympathy and understanding.

Conductors as a rule do nothing to spoil this charming illusion and play up the melancholy for all it is worth. Pictorially too, it is not to be despised, and there are any number of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

NOV 2 7 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN EXOTIC CONCERT

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ORIENTAL, Slavic, Latin and other exotic melodies, colors d rhythms constituted the rgest part of the Boston Symiony Orchestra programme at arnegie Hall last evening. It as a concert of lively and luinous procedures. And let it e said at once that the experince was a thoroughly delightful ne.

The session opened sedately nough, with the strictly classial "Brandenburg Concerto," No. , one of the series of six enemble compositions for stringed nstruments, written by the reat master in 1721 at the order of Christian Ludwig, Markgraf of Brandenburg (Germany). It was a period when composers hardly could earn their bread and butter without such commissions from royal personages.

It was a far and picturesque plunge from the ancient Bach to Henry Eichheim, born in Chicago, whose "Chinese Legend" came next. Mr. Eachheim has lived in the Far East and made an intensive study of its music and life. What he learned there he embodied in several compositions, the latest and most interesting of which is the one heard last night.

The legend dates from 600 A. D., and in true Chinese fashion is made up of elements delicate, dreadful, dreamy and dinful. In Mr. Eichheim's handling, the story resolved itself into a deeply interesting piece of music, written with sympathetic fancy and high skill in bending the modern orchestral idiom into moulds of pure beauty. There were rhythms and tonal colors that wooed the ear irresistibly, and the tintinabulations of the Chinese gongs, cymbals and other native instruments of percussion were blended with the rest of the music into effects which have not been excelled for originality and charm. The score is a gem and far more important than Stravinsky's Chinese piece, "The Nightingale." The audience received the novelty with unmistakable favor.

Jacques Ibert, a Frenchman, supplied further spice and piquancy with his "Escales" (ports of call) orchestral impressions of Palermo, Tunis and Valencia. The work, in three short movements, is in ultra-modern French technical style, but with distinct Spanish flavoring. A light touch characterizes the writing. The mind-pictures which Ibert carried home from his journey were in pastel colorings. "Escales" is a suave, insinuating and lovely composition.

The flaming passion of Mother Russia closed the programme, with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonic Pathetique."

Serge Koussevitzky did the most expert and temperamental conducting he has exhibited here, and his orchestra was in superb form—quite the virtuoso band of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

147

NOV 2 7 1925

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced two compositions new to this city, a "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of these works, indeed, of the program as a whole, the orchestra gave the most brilliant performances that it has given under its present conductorship.

Some of the music appea virtuoso purpose chosen for as a sound sincere else. There ates of the ning with he G major "B concerto of J. S. Bach, played and and with a very brilliant sonorou by the strings. But the works upon wh Mr. Koussevitzky trained his wh arsenal of effects were the afores novelties and Tchaikowsky's thetic" symphony. The novelties pr of uneven value, though they consp ously displayed the capacities of orchestra. In the symphony the ductor showed by turns his fiery perament and re-creative power an passion for effect at any cost, wh or not this reacted to the benef the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt dreamed, in the Far East. Whe writes music suggested by Eastern pressions or age-old legends it is with the purpose of showing how Eastern he can be. He has lived of which he speaks, and he has a ticular gift of transcribing it. Whe the listener comes from Oshkosh Jersey City the music has the right there is no doubt that it is a ge artistic result of first-hand cont And so with that heard last nig score with evident dificiencies, bu genuinely expressive of the legend spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from abou year 600, is that of the two Gen enemies who fight until on killed. The survivor faces his tim's widow, who is armed and mined upon revenge. The two battle, only to realize that they each other. At last, for honor's they take death into their own h This story formed the basis of a "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Leg performed with Mr. Eichheim's m last January at the Eighth Street atre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim him whose works are quoted in the inv ble program notes of Philip Hale, "the music of the drama begins Chinese ceremonial music written Chinese Emperor about the yea A. D. in memory of a slain and b General." Thereafter is the thou the fight, the voice of the young mourning, the beginnings of lov tween the pair, and the other pr phases of the story. It is a pity lacking the stage action, the mu too long and has no clear or well anced form; too bad, because th among the most interesting music Eichheim has produced. It princ requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are ofte precedented and are wholly of th tant land of his legend. The music Chinese—as Chinese as a golden or a pair of warriors fighting on There are sounds unprecedented orchestral repertory; there is go drama, expressed in musical terms are not of the West. Only at the is seen suddenly the cloven hoo Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere consciousness of a composer wh really bridged the gap between o and occidental consciousness by of translating the beauty created people into a message articulate telligible to the other.

This work should be cut and It is eminently deserving of this has material that should not gotten. The audience liked Mr. heim's music, long, cut-up, super as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are ermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. places suggest characteristic rh and melodic turns utilized by the poser. And there one stops, wit haps a single remark: that Mr. knows very well the art of instru tion, and Mr. Koussevilsky the orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pie the everplayed symphony of Tc sky emphasized the inalienabl ness of the Russian. Tchaiko heard too often, but what a rem artist he is! His music is nev than flesh and blood, than po memories, intense feeling, the m of despair, the resignation of the The march is surely the wildest phonic literature. The sympho matter how overplayed or malt is a work that commands admirat its reckless sincerity and its mus spiration. Tchaikovsky was not composer. Last night, it is true fered frequently from the virtuo the officiousness of Mr. Kousse

The second theme of the fir ment is sentimental enough wi ing dragged as it was. The sa is true of the trio of the secon ment—the passage with the drum-beat. It was anticipated ing taken the greater part of t movements too slowly Mr. Kou would play the march very fas he did—so very fast that it wa sible for the superb orchestra to cleanly. There are rights that dividual interpreter may be exp assume. The performance, h went past this point. It em some rather wanton eccentric Koussevitsky, and proved at th time that Tchaikovsky is inco ibly a great composer.

Aside from these reserv playing of the orchestra was ing merit. It is a better b cians than it was last se has more brilliancy, precis tainty of itself. There cellent players in the f the new o on that d by

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 22 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, for many years famous as an orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, died at his home recently at the age of 80 years. He is survived by a widow and two daughters. He had lived in retirement for a number of years.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke in America is linked particularly with that of the Boston Symphony, which under his excellent leadership in the years following 1884 developed into an orchestra of the first rank.

Gericke, it will be remembered, visited Portland in the earlier days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in old City Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

There will be no performance by [illegible] Boston Symphony orchestra in [illegible] week, as the organization [illegible] New York and Brooklyn. The new historical series of concerts in Boston to be given on Tuesday afternoons will open on Dec. 1.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following program for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concert for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah;" the Praeludium to Hadyn's "Creation;" Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The new Repertory Theatre in Boston, under the direction of Henry Jewett, has been fortunate enough to secure Daniel Kuntz as leader of the little orchestra of 10 pieces which will furnish the incidental and between-acts music. Mr. Kuntz will be remembered by reason of his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra in which for many years, under various conductors, he was formerly one of the leading violins. N[illegible] will and taste as a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

Two new pieces are on the Boston Symphony orchestra's programs in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 28 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK TELEGRAM

NOV 21 1925

Serge Koussevitzky, at present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first American appearance outside of the concerts of that organization when on Saturday evening, November 28, in the Town Hall, he directs the season's first chamber orchestral concert of the League of Composers.

Compositions by Honegger, Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland are to be performed on that occasion. Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and small orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky brought forward in Paris last spring. The Prokokieff piece is a quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass.

Ravel contributes "Trio Poems,' composed as far back as 1913, to texts by Mallarme. They are written for solo voice accompanied by two clarinets, two flutes, harp and quartet of strings. The work of Tansman, a young Polish composer now loving in Paris, is a "Sinfonietta." Aaron Copland, the young American composer, whose symphony for orchestra and organ Walter Damrosch introduced here last season, this time appears as author of a composition entitled "Music for the Theatre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 21 1925

REALM OF MUSIC

By Paul Morris

LAST year a group of indignant directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra threatened the conductor of that lively symphonic body, the awe-inspiring Leopold Stokowski, with banishment if he continued to exploit "futurist" composers. But he still persists in giving his subscribers the kind of novelties they don't want in conjunction with the conventional symphonic fare that they crave.

In New York, also, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with such orchestral novelties as are from time to time foisted upon an unwilling public. But, if the public prefers the over played classics, most conductors find real pleasure in preparing new sounding untraditional musical experiments. Next week a good many highly conventionalized symphonic subscribers will give their seats to their poor relatives or to their tone deaf friends whose nerves are not upset by discords and dissonance. There will be an extra seat sale for that select group of music lovers who detest harmonious music and adore Schoenberg, Leo Ornstein and their imitators. It will be a great week for the "advanced" composers.

Koussevitzky, the high priest of the "futurists," who directs new music much better than old, brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, featuring two new works, Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Ports of Call." On Saturday night in Town Hall he will do even better by the composers of the future when he directs a whole program of new music

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 22 1925

American appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by kind permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization, and his soloists will be Jesus Sanroma at the piano and Maria 'Dormont, singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 21 1925

The Schola Cantorum and the Philharmonic

Orchestral Concerts of Thanksgiving Week

FOUR CONCERTS are scheduled for Thanksgiving week by the Philharmonic, the feature being the performance of Mahler's Second Symphony on Wednesday evening (instead of the usual Thursday) and on Friday afternoon. A chorus from Kurt Schindler's Schola Cantorum will assist, and the soloists will be Ruth Rodgers, soprano, and Martha Offers, a Dutch contralto, who has sung with Toscanini at Milan and is making her debut in this country.

The program for tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall consists of Tansman's "Danse de la Sorciere," its first performance here, the orchestral suite from Strauss' "Bourgeoise Gentilhomme," and Brahms' Second Symphony. One week from tonight will be the students' concert in Carnegie Hall, when the program will be one movement from the Mahler Symphony, Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, De Falla's "Suite Tricorne" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Two concerts are scheduled for the week by the New York Symphony: the first tomorrow afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, when Walter Damrosch and his daughter Polly will play Saint-Saens' "Carnaval des Animaux" for two pianos. Reinald Werrenrath will sing Horatio Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" (new to New York) and Shubert, Grieg and Brahms songs. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony and Faure's "La Pavanne" and "La Fileuse"

March from "Aida," excerpts from Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, the overture to "Der Freischuetz" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, when the program will be Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 for string orchestra, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and two numbers played here for the first time, Henry Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales" ("Ports of Call"). Saturday's program will be Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse," "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Tsar Saltan" and Brahms' First Symphony.

Three compositions will be heard for the first time tomorrow afternoon at the concert of the Society of the Friends of Music in Town Hall. Artur Bodanzky will conduct the orchestra and Stephen Townsend the chorus. They will be Frederick Jacobi's "The Poet of the Desert," for orchestra, chorus and baritone, Lawrence Tibbett, soloist; Ella Adaiewsky's "Horatian Ode," for two voices, Marion Telva and Mr. Tibbett, soloists, and Paolo Gallico's septet, in which he will play the piano, Leonard Sansonne the horn, the New York String Quartet the strings and Miss Telva will sing. The other number will be Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" with orchestra, chorus and Miss Telva, Carl Schlegel and Max Bloch, soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

League to Give Three Evening Concerts

New Chamber Music Will Be Presented This Season

well as the dolls who take part. There will, of course, be a stage within a stage, and the marionettes, the scenes and action will be designed and directed by Remo Bufano, the young Italian puppet master, who is opening his own puppet theatre here this winter.

Plans for the third concert, which will take place in February, will be announced later in the season.

The League of Composers' Review will be published four times this year under the title of "Modern Music." The first issue will appear early in November, and the expanded plans of the magazine will be made public shortly before that time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

Music Notes

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will open the New York season of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

The program for the opening concert will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for String Orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony "Pathetic;" and two numbers to be heard for the first time in New York—Eichheim's Chinese Legend, and "Escales" ("Ports of Call") by Jacques Ibert, the French composer. The program for the Saturday matinee will consist of Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, and "Kikimora;" a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan;" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

NOV 27 1925

MUS

By Samuel Ch

Boston Orchestra at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed Thanksgiving Day by descending on New York with a program devoted mainly to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," which, as every one knows, is no hymn of joy. At least that is the general opinion of the popular work fostered by the greatest amount of written nonsense ever called forth by any work of art.

It may very well be that its popularity is due in a greater measure to the lachrymose theories about it, which the general public is fed in books and program notes and musical biography, than to the merits of the music itself. Tschaikowsky is believed to have felt this and that when he wrote it, and it is even whispered that he committed suicide the moment it was finished. At the first lugubrious notes of the beginning the audience settles down to a luxuriant melancholy and people furtively reach out for each other's hands in mute sympathy and understanding.

Conductors as a rule do nothing to spoil this charming illusion and play up the melancholy for all it is worth. Pictorially too, it is not to be despised, and there are any number of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

NOV 27 1925

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN EXOTIC CONCERT

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ORIENTAL, Slavic, Latin and other exotic melodies, colors d rhythms constituted the rgest part of the Boston Sym iony Orchestra programme at arnegie Hall last evening. It as a concert of lively and lu inous procedures. And let it e said at once that the experi nce was a thoroughly delightful ne.

The session opened sedately nough, with the strictly classi al "Brandenburg Concerto," No. , one of the series of six en semble compositions for stringed nstruments, written by the great master in 1721 at the order of Christian Ludwig, Markgraf of Brandenburg (Germany). It was a period when composers hardly could earn their bread and butter without such commissions from royal personages.

It was a far and picturesque plunge from the ancient Bach to Henry Eichheim, born in Chicago, whose "Chinese Legend" came next. Mr. Eachheim has lived in the Far East and made an intensive study of its music and life. What he learned there he embodied in several compositions, the latest and most interesting of which is the one heard last night.

The legend dates from 600 A. D., and in true Chinese fashion is made up of elements delicate, dreadful, dreamy and dinful. In Mr. Eichheim's handling, the story resolved itself into a deeply interesting piece of music, written with sympathetic fancy and high skill in bending the modern orchestral idiom into moulds of pure beauty. There were rhythms and tonal colors that wooed the ear irresistibly, and the tintinabulations of the Chinese gongs, cymbals and other native instruments of percussion were blended with the rest of the music into effects which have not been excelled for originality and charm. The score is a gem and far more important than Stravinsky's Chinese piece, "The Nightingale." The audience received the novelty with unmistakable favor.

Jacques Ibert, a Frenchman, supplied further spice and piquancy with his "Escales" (ports of call) orchestral impressions of Palermo, Tunis and Valencia. The work, in three short movements, is in ultra-modern French technical style, but with distinct Spanish flavoring. A light touch characterizes the writing. The mind-pictures which Ibert carried home from his journey were in pastel colorings. "Escales" is a suave, insinuating and lovely composition.

The flaming passion of Mother Russia closed the programme, with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonic Pathetique."

Serge Koussevitsky did the most expert and temperamental conducting he has exhibited here, and his orchestra was in superb form—quite the virtuoso band of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

147

NOV 27 1925

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky introduced two compositions new to this city, a "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of these works, indeed of the program as a whole, the orchestra gave the most brilliant performances that it has given [illegible] under its present conductorship. here [illegible] of the music appea find

Some [illegible] virtuoso purpose sincere chosen for [illegible]s a sound [illegible]es of the else. There [illegible] ning with he G major "B concerto f J. S. Bach, playe and and with a very brilliant sonoro by the strings. But the works upon wh Mr. Koussevitsky trained his wh arsenal of effects were the afores novelties and Tchaikowsky's " thetic" symphony. The novelties pro of uneven value, though they cons ously displayed the capacities of orchestra. In the symphony the ductor showed by turns his fiery perament and re-creative power a passion for effect at any cost, wh or not this reacted to the benefi the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt dreamed, in the Far East. Whe writes music suggested by Eastern pressions or age-old legends it is with the purpose of showing how Eastern he can be. He has lived of which he speaks, and he has a ticular gift of transcribing it. Whe the listener comes from Oshkosh Jersey City the music has the right there is no doubt that it is a ge artistic result of first-hand cont And so with that heard last nigh score with evident dificiencies, bu genuinely expressive of the legenda spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from about year 600, is that of the two Gene enemies who fight until one killed. The survivor faces his tim's widow, who is armed and d mined upon revenge. The two battle, only to realize that they each other. At last, for honor's they take death into their own h This story formed the basis of a "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Leg performed with Mr. Eichheim's m last January at the Eighth Street atre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim hin whose works are quoted in the inv ble program notes of Philip Hale, "the music of the drama begins Chinese ceremonial music written Chinese Emperor about the year A. D. in memory of a slain and b General." Thereafter is the thou the fight, the voice of the young mourning, the beginnings of lov tween the pair, and the other pri phases of the story. It is a pity lacking the stage action, the mus too long and has no clear or well anced form; too bad, because th among the most interesting music Eichheim has produced. It princ requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are ofte precedented and are wholly of th tant land of his legend. The musi Chinese—as Chinese as a golden or a pair of warriors fighting on There are sounds unprecedented orchestral repertory; there is ge drama, expressed in musical terms are not of the West. Only at th is seen suddenly the cloven ho Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere consciousness of a composer wh really bridged the gap between o and occidental consciousness by of translating the beauty created people into a message articulate telligible to the other.

This work should be cut and It is eminently deserving of thi has material that should not gotten. The audience liked Mr. heim's music, long, cut-up, super as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are ermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. places suggest characteristic rh and melodic turns utilized by the poser. And there one stops, wit haps a single remark: that Mr. knows very well the art of instru tion, and Mr. Koussevilsky the orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these piec the everplayed symphony of Tc sky emphasized the inalienabl ness of the Russian. Tchaiko heard too often, but what a rem artist he is! His music is nev than flesh and blood, than po memories, intense feeling, the m of despair, the resignation of the The march is surely the wildest phonic literature. The sympho matter how overplayed or malt is a work that commands admirat its reckless sincerity and its mus spiration. Tchaikovsky was not composer. Last night, it is true fered frequently from the virtuc the officiousness of Mr. Kousse

The second theme of the fir ment is sentimental enough wi ing dragged as it was. The sa is true of the trio of the secon ment—the passage with the drum-beat. It was anticipated ing taken the greater part of t movements too slowly Mr. Kou would play the march very fas he did—so very fast that it wa sible for the superb orchestra to cleanly. There are rights that dividual interpreter may be exp assume. The performance, h went past this point. It em some rather wanton eccentric Koussevitsky, and proved at th time that Tchaikovsky is inco ibly a great composer.

Aside from these reserv playing of the orchestra was ing merit. It is a better bo cians than it was last se has more brilliancy, precis tainty of itself. There cellent players in the f the new o

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 2 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, for many years famous as an orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, died at his home recently at the age of 80 years. He is survived by a widow and two daughters. He had lived in retirement for a number of years.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke in America is linked particularly with that of the Boston Symphony, which under his excellent leadership in the years following 1884 developed into an orchestra of the first rank.

Gericke, it will be remembered, visited Portland in the earlier days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in old City Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

There will be no performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston this week, as the organization will be in New York and Brooklyn. The new historical series of concerts in Boston to be given on Tuesday afternoons will open on Dec. 1.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following program for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concert for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah;" the Praeludium to Hadyn's "Creation;" Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The new Repertory Theatre in Boston, under the direction of Henry Jewett, has been fortunate enough to secure Daniel Kuntz as leader of the little orchestra of 10 pieces which will furnish the incidental and between-acts music. Mr. Kuntz will be remembered by reason of his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra in which for many years, under various conductors, he was formerly one of the leading violins. Needless to say his skill and taste as a musician will add to the enjoyment of those who frequent the new theatre in the Back Bay.

On the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra next week Mr. Loeffler's "Memories of Childhood" will be played for the first time in Boston.

NOV 2 8 1925

To Lead Hub Symphony

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Nov. 27.—Eugene Goossens, British composer-conductor, who for the third season is directing the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts in January.

Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland are to be performed on that occasion. Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and small orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky brought forward in Paris last spring. The Prokokieff piece is a quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass.

Ravel contributes "Trio Poems," composed as far back as 1913, to texts by Mallarme. They are written for solo voice accompanied by two clarinets, two flutes, harp and quartet of strings. The work of Tansman, a young Polish composer now loving in Paris, is a "Sinfonietta." Aaron Copland, the young American composer, whose symphony for orchestra and organ Walter Damrosch introduced here last season, this time appears as author of a composition entitled "Music for the Theatre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 1 1925

URDAY, NOVEMBE

WALKER BARS TIGER LEADER AS POLICE HEAD

In New York, also, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with such orchestral novelties as are from time to time foisted upon an unwilling public. But, if the public prefers the over played classics, most conductors find real pleasure in preparing new sounding untraditional musical experiments. Next week a good many highly conventionalized symphonic subscribers will give their seats to their poor relatives or to their tone deaf friends whose nerves are not upset by discords and dissonance. There will be an extra seat sale for that select group of music lovers who detest harmonious music and adore Schoenberg, Leo Ornstein and their imitators. It will be a great week for the "advanced" composers.

Koussevitzky, the high priest of the "futurists," who directs new music much better than old, brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, featuring two new works, Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Ports of Call." On Saturday night in Town Hall he will do even better by the composers of the future when he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 2 1 1925

The Ph

Some Afterthoughts on "Stella D of the

TIMES SQUARE, for a while at least, should be renamed the Vale of Tears. Afternoon and evening, in the vicinity of the Apollo Theatre, in Forty-second street, may be heard a low sobbing sound. It is Belle Bennett practising her music lesson regularly twice a day, twanging and twiddling away on what we are sure Mr. Samuel Goldwyn would call "the heartstrings of the multitudes."

"Stella Dallas," which arrived in town last Monday evening, is dubbed by the Goldwyn offices "a great woman picture," and there is no doubt of the fact that it is a great box-office attraction.

Very often moving picture producers swoop down upon an excellent but defenseless novel and make a mediocre picture out of it. Now and then one of them gathers in a mediocre novel and improves upon the original. That is what happened in the case of "Stella Dallas," a typical super-sentimental woman's magazine

---

Two concerts are scheduled for the week by the New York Symphony; the first tomorrow afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, when Walter Damrosch and his daughter Polly will play Saint-Saens' "Carnaval des Animaux" for two pianos, Reinald Werrenrath will sing Horatio Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" (new to New York) and Shubert, Grieg and Brahms songs. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony and Faure's "La Pavanne" and "La Fileuse."

The other concert will be for children next Saturday morning when Mr. Damrosch will lecture on the use of the brass wind instruments, illustrated by the orchestra, which will play the Triumphal

---

and program for the opening concert will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for String Orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony "Pathetic;" and two numbers to be heard

---

e first time in New York—
im's Chinese Legend, and "Es ("Ports of Call") by Jacques
e French composer. The pror the Saturday matinee will of Liadov's Fragment from e Apocalypse, and "Kikimora;" a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera,
"Tsar Saltan;" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 2 2 1925

Koussevitzky to Conduct For League Nov. 28

Serge Koussevitzky will open the League of Composers series of three evening concerts devoted to new music, at Town Hall on Saturday night, November 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for December 29, with Willem Mengelberg conducting "El Retablo," De Falla's opera with marionettes.

The concert will mark the first American appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by kind permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization, and his soloists will be Jesus Sanroma at the piano and Maria Dormont, singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

League to Give Three Evening Concerts

New Chamber Music Will Be Presented This Season

The League of Composers will celebrate the third year of its existence with three evening concerts in Town Hall devoted to music for the chamber orchestra, each to be led by a conductor of international distinction.

Serge Koussevitsky and Willem Mengelberg will conduct, respectively, the first and second evening concerts, Nov. 28 and Dec. 29. Mr. Koussevitsky, who will make his appearance by special permission of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make ~~his first appear~~ance in this country outside the concerts of that organization. Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct a program of new works recently completed by young men in Europe as well as America.

The second concert, which Mr. Mengelberg directs by courtesy of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society, will feature Manuel de Falla's celebrated marionette opera "El Retablo." This will be the American premiere of a work which has been made famous in Europe first by the stage production of the Princesse de Polignac and later by concert and dramatic performance in other large cities.

Mme. Landowska will play the harpsichord. The singers themselves will not take part in the action, the League presenting the work in full puppet regalia with two sizes of puppets, to represent the living people as well as the dolls who take part. There will, of course, be a stage within a stage, and the marionettes, the scenes and action will be designed and directed by Remo Bufano, the young Italian puppet master, who is opening his own puppet theatre here this winter.

Plans for the third concert, which will take place in February, will be announced later in the season.

The League of Composers' Review will be published four times this year under the title of "Modern Music." The first issue will appear early in November, and the expanded plans of the magazine will be made public shortly before that time.

NOV 2 7 1925

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Boston Orchestra at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed Thanksgiving Day by descending on New York with a program devoted mainly to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," which, as every one knows, is no hymn of joy. At least that is the general opinion of the popular work fostered by the greatest amount of written nonsense ever called forth by any work of art.

It may very well be that its popularity is due in a greater measure to the lachrymose theories about it, which the general public is fed in books and program notes and musical biography, than to the merits of the music itself. Tschaikowsky is believed to have felt this and that when he wrote it, and it is even whispered that he committed suicide the moment it was finished. At the first lugubrious notes of the beginning the audience settles down to a luxuriant melancholy and people furtively reach out for each other's hands in mute sympathy and understanding.

Conductors as a rule do nothing to spoil this charming illusion and play up the melancholy for all it is worth. Pictorially too, it is not to be despised, and there are any number of opportunities for gestures and poses. There is no limit in this piece to what the orchestra can produce in the matter of tone and one of the most effective conductorial attitudes is the one in which the men are implored to give more and more of it.

there were times when he stood stock still mutely facing the first fiddles. It must be stated that the orchestra was responsive and gave him all they had, to the great satisfaction of both Mr. Koussevitzky and his audience.

It is a curious fact that the moment a great work becomes really popular it is at once deserted by musicians and musical connoisseurs. The Pathetique, which was once the joy of the understanding, is now abandoned by them for the less popular Fifth Symphony in E minor. But the Sixth, in spite of the sentimental nonsense woven around it, remains an unparalleled achievement. Discard the program notes and commentaries and whispered theories and listen to it without any preconceived ideas, simply as music, and you will find in it a wealth of beauty and a sincere expression of some of the states of the human soul.

There is a great deal of pathos and melancholy in the music, and one long stretch in the first movement, which seems to express abysmal terror, but there is charm in it, too, and the second allegro con grazia is by no means joyless. The finale is really a lament, but it is not so hopeless as conductors would have us believe.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the entir symphony, with the exception of th first part of the second movemen with what the Germans call "zu vie gefiel." To accentuate the sorrow o the Pathetique is as bad as paintin

(Continued on Tenth Page)

IN EXOTIC CONCERT

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ORIENTAL, Slavic, Latin and other exotic melodies, colors and rhythms constituted the largest part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme a Carnegie Hall last evening. was a concert of lively and l minous procedures. And let be said at once that the exper ence was a thoroughly delightfu one.

The session opened sedate enough, with the strictly clas cal "Brandenburg Concerto," N 3, one of the series of six en semble compositions for stringed instruments, written by the great master in 1721 at the order of Christian Ludwig, Markgraf of Brandenburg (Germany). It was a period when composers hardly could earn their bread and butter without such commissions from royal personages.

It was a far and picturesque plunge from the ancient Bach to Henry Eichheim, born in Chicago, whose "Chinese Legend" came next. Mr. Eachheim has lived in the Far East and made an intensive study of its music and life. What he learned there he embodied in several compositions, the latest and most interesting of which is the one heard last night.

The legend dates from 600 A. D., and in true Chinese fashion is made up of elements delicate, dreadful, dreamy and dinful. In Mr. Eichheim's handling, the story resolved itself into a deeply interesting piece of music, written with sympathetic fancy and high skill in bending the modern orchestral idiom into moulds of pure beauty. There were rhythms and tonal colors that wooed the ear irresistibly, and the tintinabulations of the Chinese gongs, cymbals and other native instruments of percussion were blended with the rest of the music into effects which have not been excelled for originality and charm. The score is a gem and far more important than Stravinsky's Chinese piece, "The Nightingale." The audience received the novelty with unmistakable favor.

Jacques Ibert, a Frenchman, supplied further spice and piquancy with his "Escales" (ports of call) orchestral impressions of Palermo, Tunis and Valencia. The work, in three short movements, is in ultra-modern French technical style, but with distinct Spanish flavoring. A light touch characterizes the writing. The mind-pictures which Ibert carried home from his journey were in pastel colorings. "Escales" is a suave, insinuating and lovely composition.

The flaming passion of Mother Russia closed the programme, with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonic Pathetique."

Serge Koussevitsky did the most expert and temperamental conducting he has exhibited here, and his orchestra was in superb form—quite the virtuoso band of pre tan Chin or a

There
orchest reper there is g drama, expressed in musical terms are not of the West. Only at th is seen suddenly the cloven ho
Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere consciousness of a composer w really bridged the gap between and occidental consciousness by of translating the beauty create people into a message articulate telligible to the other.

This work should be cut and
It is eminently deserving of thi has material that should not gotten. The audience liked Mr.
heim's music, long, cut-up, supe as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" ar ermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. places suggest characteristic rh and melodic turns utilized by the poser. And there one stops, wit haps a single remark: that Mr.
knows very well the art of instru tion, and Mr. Koussevilsky the orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these piec
the everplayed symphony of Tc sky emphasized the inalienabl ness of the Russian. Tchaiko heard too often, but what a rem artist he is! His music is nev than flesh and blood, than p memories, intense feeling, the m of despair, the resignation of the
The march is surely the wildest phonic literature. The sympho matter how overplayed or malt is a work that commands admirat its reckless sincerity and its mus spiration. Tchaikovsky was not composer. Last night, it is true, fered frequently from the virtu
the officiousness of Mr. Kousse
The second theme of the fir ment is sentimental enough wi ing dragged as it was. The sa is true of the trio of the secon ment—the passage with the drum-beat. It was anticipated ing taken the greater part of t movements too slowly Mr. Kou would play the march very fas he did—so very fast that it wa sible for the superb orchestra to cleanly. There are rights that dividual interpreter may be exp assume. The performance, h went past this point. It em some rather wanton eccentric Koussevitsky, and proved at t time that Tchaikovsky is inco ibly a great composer.

Aside from these reserv playing of the orchestra was ing merit. It is a better b cians than it was last se has more brilliancy, precis tainty of itself. There cellent players in the f
the new o on that d by

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 2 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, for many years famous as an orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, died at his home recently at the age of 80 years. He is survived by a widow and two daughters. He had lived in retirement for a number of years.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke in America is linked particularly with that of the Boston Symphony, which under his excellent leadership in the years following 1884 developed into an orchestra of the first rank.

Gericke, it will be remembered, visited Portland in the earlier days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in old City Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

There will be no performance by Boston Symphony orchestra in [illegible] this week, as the organization will be in New York and Brooklyn. The new historical series of concerts in Boston to be given on Tuesday afternoons will open on Dec. 1.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following program for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concert for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah;" the Praeludium to Hadyn's "Creation;" Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The new Repertory Theatre in Boston, under the direction of Henry Jewett, has been fortunate enough to secure Daniel Kuntz as leader of the little orchestra of 10 pieces which will furnish the incidental and between-acts music. Mr. Kuntz will be remembered by reason of his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra in which for many years, under various conductors, he was formerly one of the leading violins. Needless to say his skill and taste as a musician will add to the enjoyment of those who frequent the new theatre in the Back Bay.

On the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra next week Mr. Loeffler's "Memories of Childhood" will be played for the first time in Boston.

NOV 2 8 1925

To Lead Hub Symphony

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Nov. 27.—Eugene Goossens, British composer-conductor, who for the third season is directing the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts in January.

Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland are to be performed on that occasion. Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and small orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky brought forward in Paris last spring. The Prokokieff piece is a quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass.

Ravel contributes "Trio Poems," composed as far back as 1913, to texts by Mallarme. They are written for solo voice accompanied by two clarinets, two flutes, harp and quartet of strings. The work of Tansman, a young Polish composer now loving in Paris, is a 'Sinfonietta.' Aaron Copland, the young American composer, whose symphony for orchestra and organ Walter Damrosch introduced here last season, this time appears as author of a composition entitled "Music for the Theatre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 1 1925

URDAY, NOVEMBE

WALKER BARS TIGER LEADER AS POLICE HEAD

In New York, also, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with such orchestral novelties as are from time to time foisted upon an unwilling public. But, if the public prefers the over played classics, most conductors find real pleasure in preparing new sounding untraditional musical experiments. Next week a good many highly conventionalized symphonic subscribers will give their seats to their poor relatives or to their tone deaf friends whose nerves are not upset by discords and dissonance. There will be an extra seat sale for that select group of music lovers who detest harmonious music and adore Schoenberg, Leo Ornstein and their imitators. It will be a great week for the "advanced" composers.

Koussevitzky, the high priest of the "futurists," who directs new music much better than old, brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, featuring two new works, Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Ports of Call." On Saturday night in Town Hall he will do even better by the composers of the future when he directs a whole program of new music

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 2 1 1925

The Ph

Some Afterthoughts on "Stella D of the

TIMES SQUARE, for a while at least, should be renamed the Vale of Tears. Afternoon and evening, in the vicinity of the Apollo Theatre, in Forty-second street, may be heard a low sobbing sound. It is Belle Bennett practising her music lesson regularly twice a day, twanging and twiddling away on what we are sure Mr. Samuel Goldwyn would call "the heartstrings of the multitudes."

"Stella Dallas," which arrived in town last Monday evening, is dubbed by the Goldwyn offices "a great woman picture," and there is no doubt of the fact that it is a great box-office attraction.

Very often moving picture producers swoop down upon an excellent but defenseless novel and make a mediocre picture out of it. Now and then one of them gathers in a mediocre novel and improves upon the original. That is what happened in the case of "Stella Dallas," a typical super-sentimental woman's magazine

---

Two concerts are scheduled for the week by the New York Symphony: the first tomorrow afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, when Walter Damrosch and his daughter Polly will play Saint-Saens' "Carnaval des Animaux" for two pianos; Reinald Werrenrath will sing Horatio Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" (new to New York) and Shubert, Grieg and Brahms songs. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony and Faure's "La Pavanne" and "La Fileuse."

The other concert will be for children next Saturday morning when Mr. Damrosch will lecture on the use of the brass wind instruments, illustrated by the orchestra, which will play the Triumphal program for the opening concert will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for String Orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony "Pathetic;" and two numbers to be heard the first time in New York—Eichheim's Chinese Legend, and "Escales" ("Ports of Call") by Jacques Ibert, the French composer. The program for Saturday matinee will include Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, and "Kikimora;" a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan;" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

---

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 2 2 1925

Koussevitzky to Conduct For League Nov. 28

Serge Koussevitzky will open the League of Composers series of three evening concerts devoted to new music, at Town Hall on Saturday night, November 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for December 29, with Willem Mengelberg conducting "El Retablo," De Falla's opera with marionettes.

The concert will mark the first American appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by kind permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization, and his soloists will be Jesus Sanroma at the piano and Maria Dormont, singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

League to Give Three Evening Concerts

New Chamber Music Will Be Presented This Season

The League of Composers will celebrate the third year of its existence with three evening concerts in Town Hall devoted to music for the chamber orchestra, each to be led by a conductor of international distinction.

Serge Koussevitsky and Willem Mengelberg will conduct, respectively, the first and second evening concerts, Nov. 28 and Dec. 29. Mr. Koussevitsky, who will make his appearance by special permission of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in this country outside the concerts of that organization. Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct a program of new works recently completed by young men in Europe as well as America.

The second concert, which Mr. Mengelberg directs by courtesy of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society, will feature Manuel de Falla's celebrated marionette opera "El Retablo." This will be the American premiere of a work which has been made famous in Europe first by the stage production of the Princesse de Polignac and later by concert and dramatic performance in other large cities.

Mme. Landowska will play the harpsichord. The singers themselves will not take part in the action, the League presenting the work in full puppet regalia with two sizes of puppets, to represent the living people as well as the dolls who take part. There will, of course, be a stage within a stage, and the marionettes, the scenes and action will be designed and directed by Remo Bufano, the young Italian puppet master, who is opening his own puppet theatre here this winter.

Plans for the third concert, which will take place in February, will be announced later in the season.

The League of Composers' Review will be published four times this year under the title of "Modern Music." The first issue will appear early in November, and the expanded plans of the magazine will be made public shortly before that time.

NOV 2 7 1925

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Boston Orchestra at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed Thanksgiving Day by descending on New York with a program devoted mainly to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," which, as every one knows, is no hymn of joy. At least that is the general opinion of the popular work fostered by the greatest amount of written nonsense ever called forth by any work of art.

It may very well be that its popularity is due in a greater measure to the lachrymose theories about it, which the general public is fed in books and program notes and musical biography, than to the merits of the music itself. Tschaikowsky is believed to have felt this and that when he wrote it, and it is even whispered that he committed suicide the moment it was finished. At the first lugubrious notes of the beginning the audience settles down to a luxuriant melancholy and people furtively reach out for each other's hands in mute sympathy and understanding.

Conductors as a rule do nothing to spoil this charming illusion and play up the melancholy for all it is worth. Pictorially too, it is not to be despised, and there are any number of opportunities for gestures and poses. There is no limit in this piece to what the orchestra can produce in the matter of tone and one of the most effective conductorial attitudes is the one in which the men are implored to give more and more of it.

there were times when he stood stock still mutely facing the first fiddles. It must be stated that the orchestra was responsive and gave him all they had, to the great satisfaction of both Mr. Koussevitzky and his audience.

It is a curious fact that the moment a great work becomes really popular it is at once deserted by musicians and musical connoisseurs. The Pathetique, which was once the joy of the understanding, is now abandoned by them for the less popular Fifth Symphony in E minor. But the Sixth, in spite of the sentimental nonsense woven around it, remains an unparalleled achievement. Discard the program notes and commentaries and whispered theories and listen to it without any preconceived ideas, simply as music, and you will find in it a wealth of beauty and a sincere expression of some of the states of the human soul.

There is a great deal of pathos and melancholy in the music, and one long stretch in the first movement, which seems to express abysmal terror, but there is charm in it, too, and the second allegro con grazia is by no means joyless. The finale is really a lament, but it is not so hopeless as conductors would have us believe.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the entir symphony, with the exception of th first part of the second movemen with what the Germans call "zu viel gefiel." To accentuate the sorrow of the Pathetique is as bad as paintin

(Continued on Tenth Page)

IN EXOTIC CONCERT

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ORIENTAL, Slavic, Latin and other exotic melodies, colors and rhythms constituted the largest part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme at Carnegie Hall last evening. It was a concert of lively and luminous procedures. And let it be said at once that the experience was a thoroughly delightful one.

The session opened sedately enough, with the strictly classical "Brandenburg Concerto," No. 3, one of the series of six ensemble compositions for stringed instruments, written by the great master in 1721 at the order of Christian Ludwig, Markgraf of Brandenburg (Germany). It was a period when composers hardly could earn their bread and butter without such commissions from royal personages.

It was a far and picturesque plunge from the ancient Bach to Henry Eichheim, born in Chicago, whose "Chinese Legend" came next. Mr. Eachheim has lived in the Far East and made an intensive study of its music and life. What he learned there he embodied in several compositions, the latest and most interesting of which is the one heard last night.

The legend dates from 600 A. D., and in true Chinese fashion is made up of elements delicate, dreadful, dreamy and dinful. In Mr. Eichheim's handling, the story resolved itself into a deeply interesting piece of music, written with sympathetic fancy and high skill in bending the modern orchestral idiom into moulds of pure beauty. There were rhythms and tonal colors that wooed the ear irresistibly, and the tintinabulations of the Chinese gongs, cymbals and other native instruments of percussion were blended with the rest of the music into effects which have not been excelled for originality and charm. The score is a gem and far more important than Stravinsky's Chinese piece, "The Nightingale." The audience received the novelty with unmistakable favor.

Jacques Ibert, a Frenchman, supplied further spice and piquancy with his "Escales" (ports of call) orchestral impressions of Palermo, Tunis and Valencia. The work, in three short movements, is in ultra-modern French technical style, but with distinct Spanish flavoring. A light touch characterizes the writing. The mind-pictures which Ibert carried home from his journey were in pastel colorings. "Escales" is a suave, insinuating and lovely composition.

The flaming passion of Mother Russia closed the programme, with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonic Pathetique."

Serge Koussevitsky did the most expert and temperamental conducting he has exhibited here, and his orchestra was in superb form—quite the virtuoso band of

There orchestral reper there is g drama, expressed in musical terms are not of the West. Only at th is seen suddenly the cloven hoo Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere consciousness of a composer wh really bridged the gap between o and occidental consciousness by of translating the beauty created people into a message articulate telligible to the other.

This work should be cut and It is eminently deserving of thi has material that should not gotten. The audience liked Mr. heim's music, long, cut-up, super as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are ermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. places suggest characteristic rh and melodic turns utilized by the poser. And there one stops, wit haps a single remark: that Mr. knows very well the art of instru tion, and Mr. Koussevilsky the orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pie the everplayed symphony of Tc sky emphasized the inalienabl ness of the Russian. Tchaiko heard too often, but what a rem artist he is! His music is nev than flesh and blood, than po memories, intense feeling, the n of despair, the resignation of the The march is surely the wildest phonic literature. The sympho matter how overplayed or malt is a work that commands admirat its reckless sincerity and its mus spiration. Tchaikovsky was not composer. Last night, it is true fered frequently from the virtuc the officiousness of Mr. Kousse

The second theme of the fir ment is sentimental enough wi ing dragged as it was. The sa is true of the trio of the secor ment—the passage with the drum-beat. It was anticipated ing taken the greater part of t movements too slowly Mr. Kou would play the march very fas he did—so very fast that it wa sible for the superb orchestra to cleanly. There are rights that dividual interpreter may be exp assume. The performance, h went past this point. It em some rather wanton eccentric Koussevitsky, and proved at th time that Tchaikovsky is inco ibly a great composer.

Aside from these reserv playing of the orchestra was ing merit. It is a better b cians than it was last se has more brilliancy, precis tainty of itself. There cellent players in the f the new o on that d by

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 2 1925

Wilhelm Gericke, for many years famous as an orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe and America, died at his home recently at the age of 80 years. He is survived by a widow and two daughters. He had lived in retirement for a number of years.

The name of Wilhelm Gericke in America is linked particularly with that of the Boston Symphony, which under his excellent leadership in the years following 1884 developed into an orchestra of the first rank.

Gericke, it will be remembered, visited Portland in the earlier days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in old City Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

There will be no performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston this week, as the organization will be in New York and Brooklyn. The new historical series of concerts in Boston to be given on Tuesday afternoons will open on Dec. 1.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following program for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concert for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah;" the Praeludium to Hadyn's "Creation;" Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The new Repertory Theatre in Boston, under the direction of Henry Jewett, has been fortunate enough to secure Daniel Kuntz as leader of the little orchestra of 10 pieces which will furnish the incidental and between-acts music. Mr. Kuntz will be remembered by reason of his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra in which for many years, under various conductors, he was formerly one of the leading violins. N[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1925

Two new pieces are on the Boston Symphony orchestra's programs in New York this week, "A Chinese Legent by Eicheim and "Escales" by Jacques Ibary. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre" at the concert in New York under the auspices of the League of Composers next

---

Roc[illegible] gene Goossens, British com[illegible] conductor, who for the third season is directing the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts in January.

[illegible] Prokofieff, Ravel, Alexander Tansman and Aaron Copland are to be performed on that occasion. Honegger will be represented by a concertino for piano and small orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky brought forward in Paris last spring. The Prokokieff piece is a quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass.

Ravel contributes "Trio Poems," composed as far back as 1913, to texts by Mallarme. They are written for solo voice accompanied by two clarinets, two flutes, harp and quartet of strings. The work of Tansman, a young Polish composer now loving in Paris, is a "Sinfonietta." Aaron Copland, the young American composer, whose symphony for orchestra and organ Walter Damrosch introduced here last season, this time appears as author of a composition entitled "Music for the Theatre."

---

tain- the "Es- was the per- Hong- Faust" orchestra re the first

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 1 1925

URDAY, NOVEMBE

WALKER BARS TIGER LEADER AS POLICE HEAD

In New York, also, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with such orchestral novelties as are from time to time foisted upon an unwilling public. But, if the public prefers the over played classics, most conductors find real pleasure in preparing new sounding untraditional musical experiments. Next week a good many highly conventionalized symphonic subscribers will give their seats to their poor relatives or to their tone deaf friends whose nerves are not upset by discords and dissonance. There will be an extra seat sale for that select group of music lovers who detest harmonious music and adore Schoenberg, Leo Ornstein and their imitators. It will be a great week for the "advanced" composers.

Koussevitzky, the high priest of the "futurists," who directs new music much better than old, brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, featuring two new works, Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Jacques Ibert's "Ports of Call." On Saturday night in Town Hall he will do even better by the composers of the future when he directs a whole program of new music for the League of Composers. Unheard works by Honegger, Prokofieff, Ravel and Aaron Coplan will be offered for the amusement of those who like that sort of thing and the annoyance of those who don't.

Three unfamiliar works will

The Ph

Some Afterthoughts on "Stella D of the

TIMES SQUARE, for a while at least, should be renamed the Vale of Tears. Afternoon and evening, in the vicinity of the Apollo Theatre, in Forty-second street, may be heard a low sobbing sound. It is Belle Bennett practising her music lesson regularly twice a day, twanging and twiddling away on what we are sure Mr. Samuel Goldwyn would call "the heartstrings of the multitudes."

"Stella Dallas," which arrived in town last Monday evening, is dubbed by the Goldwyn offices "a great woman picture," and there is no doubt of the fact that it is a great box-office attraction.

Very often moving picture producers swoop down upon an excellent but defenseless novel and make a mediocre picture out of it. Now and then one of them gathers in a mediocre novel and improves upon the original. That is what happened in the case of "Stella Dallas," a typical super-sentimental woman's magazine

---

Two concerts are scheduled for the week by the New York Symphony: the first tomorrow afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, when Walter Damrosch and his daughter Polly will play Saint-Saens' "Carnaval des Animaux" for two pianos, Reinald Werrenrath will sing Horatio Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" (new to New York) and Shubert, Grieg and Brahms songs. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony and Faure's "La Pavanne" and "La Fileuse."

The other concert will be for children next Saturday morning when Mr. Damrosch will lecture on the use of the brass wind instruments, illustrated by the orchestra, which will play the Triumphal

---

[illegible] and [illegible] program for the opening concert will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for String Orchestra; Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony "Pathetic;" and two numbers to be heard

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 2 2 1925

Koussevitzky to Conduct For League Nov. 28

Serge Koussevitzky will open the League of Composers series of three evening concerts devoted to new music, at Town Hall on Saturday night, November 28. This will be the first of the league's programs for chamber orchestra. The second concert is scheduled for December 29, with Willem Mengelberg conducting "El Retablo," De Falla's opera with marionettes.

The concert will mark the first American appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky under auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony. The arrangement is made by kind permission of the orchestra's board of directors. He will lead a picked group of instrumentalists from the Boston organization, and his soloists will be Jesus Sanroma at the piano and Maria Dormont, singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 22 1925

League to Give Three Evening Concerts

New Chamber Music Will Be Presented This Season

The League of Composers will celebrate the third year of its existence with three evening concerts in Town Hall devoted to music for the chamber orchestra, each to be led by a conductor of international distinction.

Serge Koussevitsky and Willem Mengelberg will conduct, respectively, the first and second evening concerts, Nov. 28 and Dec. 29. Mr. Koussevitsky, who will make his appearance by special permission of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make ~~his first appear~~ance in this country outside the concerts of that organization. Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct a program of new works recently completed by young men in Europe as well as America.

The second concert, which Mr. Mengelberg directs by courtesy of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society, will feature Manuel de Falla's celebrated marionette opera "El Retablo." This will be the American premiere of a work which has been made famous in Europe first by the stage production of the Princesse de Polignac and later by concert and dramatic performance in other large cities.

Mme. Landowska will play the harpsichord. The singers themselves will not take part in the action, the League presenting the work in full puppet regalia with two sizes of puppets, to represent the living people as well as the dolls who take part. There will, of course, be a stage within a stage, and the marionettes, the scenes and action will be designed and directed by Remo Bufano, the young Italian puppet master, who is opening his own puppet theatre here this winter.

Plans for the third concert, which will take place in February, will be announced later in the season.

The League of Composers' Review will be published four times this year under the title of "Modern Music." The first issue will appear early in November, and the expanded plans of the magazine will be made public shortly before that time.

[illegible]e first time in New York—[illegible]im's Chinese Legend, and "Es[illegible] ("Ports of Call") by Jacques [illegible]e French composer. The pro[illegible]r the Saturday matinee will [illegible] of Liadov's Fragment from the Apocalypse, and "Kikimora;" a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan;" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

NOV 27 1925

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Boston Orchestra at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed Thanksgiving Day by descending on New York with a program devoted mainly to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," which, as every one knows, is no hymn of joy. At least that is the general opinion of the popular work fostered by the greatest amount of written nonsense ever called forth by any work of art.

It may very well be that its popularity is due in a greater measure to the lachrymose theories about it, which the general public is fed in books and program notes and musical biography, than to the merits of the music itself. Tschaikowsky is believed to have felt this and that when he wrote it, and it is even whispered that he committed suicide the moment it was finished. At the first lugubrious notes of the beginning the audience settles down to a luxuriant melancholy and people furtively reach out for each other's hands in mute sympathy and understanding.

Conductors as a rule do nothing to spoil this charming illusion and play up the melancholy for all it is worth. Pictorially too, it is not to be despised, and there are any number of opportunities for gestures and poses. There is no limit in this piece to what the orchestra can produce in the matter of tone and one of the most effective conductorial attitudes is the one in which the men are implored to give more and more of it.

Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky did a tremendous amount of imploring and there were times when he stood stock still mutely facing the first fiddles. It must be stated that the orchestra was responsive and gave him all they had, to the great satisfaction of both Mr. Koussevitzky and his audience.

It is a curious fact that the moment a great work becomes really popular it is at once deserted by musicians and musical connoisseurs. The Pathetique, which was once the joy of the understanding, is now abandoned by them for the less popular Fifth Symphony in E minor. But the Sixth, in spite of the sentimental nonsense woven around it, remains an unparalleled achievement. Discard the program notes and commentaries and whispered theories and listen to it without any preconceived ideas, simply as music, and you will find in it a wealth of beauty and a sincere expression of some of the states of the human soul.

There is a great deal of pathos and melancholy in the music, and one long stretch in the first movement, which seems to express abysmal terror, but there is charm in it, too, and the second allegro con grazia is by no means joyless. The finale is really a lament, but it is not so hopeless as conductors would have us believe.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the entire symphony, with the exception of the first part of the second movement with what the Germans call "zu viel gefiel." To accentuate the sorrow of the Pathetique is as bad as painting

(Continued on Tenth Page)

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ORIENTAL, Slavic, Latin and other exotic melodies, colors and rhythms constituted the largest part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme at Carnegie Hall last evening. It was a concert of lively and luminous procedures. And let it be said at once that the experience was a thoroughly delightful one.

The session opened sedately enough, with the strictly classical "Brandenburg Concerto," No. 3, one of the series of six ensemble compositions for stringed instruments, written by the great master in 1721 at the order of Christian Ludwig, Markgraf of Brandenburg (Germany). It was a period when composers hardly could earn their bread and butter without such commissions from royal personages.

It was a far and picturesque plunge from the ancient Bach to Henry Eichheim, born in Chicago, whose "Chinese Legend" came next. Mr. Eachheim has lived in the Far East and made an intensive study of its music and life. What he learned there he embodied in several compositions, the latest and most interesting of which is the one heard last night.

The legend dates from 600 A. D., and in true Chinese fashion is made up of elements delicate, dreadful, dreamy and dinful. In Mr. Eichheim's handling, the story resolved itself into a deeply interesting piece of music, written with sympathetic fancy and high skill in bending the modern orchestral idiom into moulds of pure beauty. There were rhythms and tonal colors that wooed the ear irresistibly, and the tintinabulations of the Chinese gongs, cymbals and other native instruments of percussion were blended with the rest of the music into effects which have not been excelled for originality and charm. The score is a gem and far more important than Stravinsky's Chinese piece, "The Nightingale." The audience received the novelty with unmistakable favor.

Jacques Ibert, a Frenchman, supplied further spice and piquancy with his "Escales" (ports of call) orchestral impressions of Palermo, Tunis and Valencia. The work, in three short movements, is in ultra-modern French technical style, but with distinct Spanish flavoring. A light touch characterizes the writing. The mind-pictures which Ibert carried home from his journey were in pastel colorings. "Escales" is a suave, insinuating and lovely composition.

The flaming passion of Mother Russia closed the programme, with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonic Pathetique."

Serge Koussevitsky did the most expert and temperamental conducting he has exhibited here, and his orchestra was in superb form—quite the virtuoso band of [illegible]

[illegible] pre[illegible] tan[illegible] Chin[illegible] or a[illegible] There[illegible] orchestra[illegible] there is g[illegible] drama, expressed in musical terms are not of the West. Only at the [illegible] is seen suddenly the cloven hoo[illegible] Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere [illegible] consciousness of a composer wh[illegible] really bridged the gap between o[illegible] and occidental consciousness by [illegible] of translating the beauty create[illegible] people into a message articulate [illegible] telligible to the other.

This work should be cut and [illegible] It is eminently deserving of thi[illegible] has material that should not [illegible] gotten. The audience liked Mr. [illegible] heim's music, long, cut-up, super[illegible] as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are [illegible] ermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. [illegible] places suggest characteristic rh[illegible] and melodic turns utilized by the [illegible] poser. And there one stops, wit[illegible] haps a single remark: that Mr. [illegible] knows very well the art of instru[illegible] tion, and Mr. Koussevitsky the [illegible] orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these piec[illegible] the everplayed symphony of Tc[illegible] sky emphasized the inalienabl[illegible] ness of the Russian. Tchaiko[illegible] heard too often, but what a rema[illegible] artist he is! His music is nev[illegible] than flesh and blood, than pe[illegible] memories, intense feeling, the m[illegible] of despair, the resignation of the [illegible] The march is surely the wildest [illegible] phonic literature. The sympho[illegible] matter how overplayed or malt[illegible] is a work that commands admirat[illegible] its reckless sincerity and its mus[illegible] spiration. Tchaikovsky was not [illegible] composer. Last night, it is true [illegible] fered frequently from the virtuo[illegible] the officiousness of Mr. Kousse[illegible]

The second theme of the fir[illegible] ment is sentimental enough wi[illegible] ing dragged as it was. The sa[illegible] is true of the trio of the secon[illegible] ment—the passage with the [illegible] drum-beat. It was anticipated [illegible] ing taken the greater part of [illegible] movements too slowly Mr. Kous[illegible] would play the march very fas[illegible] he did—so very fast that it wa[illegible] sible for the superb orchestra to [illegible] cleanly. There are rights that [illegible] dividual interpreter may be exp[illegible] assume. The performance, [illegible] went past this point. It em[illegible] some rather wanton eccentric[illegible] Koussevitsky, and proved at th[illegible] time that Tchaikovsky is inco[illegible] ibly a great composer.

Aside from these reserv[illegible] playing of the orchestra was [illegible] ing merit. It is a better b[illegible] cians than it was last se[illegible] has more brilliancy, precis[illegible] tainty of itself. There [illegible] cellent players in the [illegible] the new o[illegible] on that [illegible]

148

Herald Oct 31

PAGE TEN

TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale" Has Masterly Performance

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Schumann, Symphony, No. 4, D minor; Stravinsky, "Song of the Nightingale"; Rimsky-Korsakov "The Battle at Kerjenest"; Moussorgsky, Persian Dances from the opera "Khovantchina." The three last pieces were performed for the first time in Boston.

The orchestra and the audience stood during the playing of a portion of the Funeral March from the "Eroica" symphony, performed in memory of Wilhelm Gericke, whose death at Vienna on Oct. 28th was reported and editorially commented on in The Herald of yesterday.

Stravinsky began work on a lyric drama "The Nightingale" in 1909. He completed it in 1914 when it was produced. During the war he turned it into a ballet which was performed at the Paris Opera House in 1920. The title was then changed to "Song of the Nightingale." This ballet was performed as a symphonic poem under Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership at his concert in Paris on Oct. 26, 1922.

It is said that Stravinsky has of late years indulged himself in the affectation of insisting that all his ballets are primarily to be considered as symphonic poems; scenery, costumes, action are all incidental to the music. But surely music of the "Song of the Nightingale," as the music of "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps," would have far more significance when heard in connection with stage-settings and action than when it is performed in the concert room. Passages that sounded yesterday merely grotesque, purposeless, even incoherent would no doubt have amused, charmed, impressed, when they were played for episodes in the ballet based on Hans Christian Andersen's familiar story.

Stravinsky's idea of the nightingales reminds us of Agesilaus, who when he was asked to hear a man that "naturally counterfeited the nightingale's voice," would not hear him, saying "I have oftentimes heard the nightingale itself." No, the ornitholigical music, the song of the bird and the song of the mechanical nightingale sent as a present to the Emperor of China—this music, we say, is not the most striking feature of Stravinsky's symphonic poem. There is the bizarre Chinese March; there is the burlesque funeral march; but Stravinsky, not wishing for once to startle the hearer by strange chords and harmonic progressions, by singular orchestration, was poetic when he composed the beautiful Song of the Fisherman, admirably played by Mr. Mager, the first trumpeter. As for the two nightingales, they gave Messrs. Laurent, Bladet, Gillet, Allegra and Burgin full opportunity to show their technical proficiency. The whole orchestra was severely tested; it triumphantly stood the test.

Mr. Koussevitzky would have been remiss if he had not produced Stravinsky's symphonic poem. Other American cities have heard it, but not led by the conductor who, in Paris, brought it out in its present form. A work of this nature, more or less perplexing when it is on a program for the first time, should be soon performed again. It is not probable that Boston will know it as a ballet: the more's the pity, for notwithstanding Stravinsky's present belief that his stage music is in reality "absolute" music, "Song of the Nightingale" would beyond doubt and peradventure be more effective, more enjoyable in the theatre, even though the story of the ballet is read in the dim light of Symphony hall.

Little need be said of the other Russian pieces. The "Battle" serves as an entr'acte in Rimsky's opera "The Tale of the Invisible City of Kitesch." This entr'acte is not of great importance, thematically or pictorially. Rimsky orchestrated Moussorgsgy's "Persian" dances, which in the opera "Khovantchina" are performed for the pleasure of an irritable and irritated Prince. The slower section is charmingly languorous.

Mr. Koussevitzky caught Weber's chivalric spirit, and gave a legitimately dramatic reading of the overture. We are told that when Mr. Koussevitzky was a boy of twelve, he happened to be in a theatre or a concert hall where the conductor was missing or incapacitated; and then and there Mr. Koussevitzky conducted this overture. The mysterious measures of the Largo were exquisitely played.

Especially noteworthy in the performances of the symphony were the Romanza and the Scherzo. It might be interesting to hear the song in the former movement accompanied by a guitar as Schumann originally intended. We have not heard the haunting Trio of the Scherzo read and played so poetically since the time of Arthur Nikisch. The other conductors in turn treated this music in a perfunctory, matter-of-fact manner.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will visit Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Ithaca and Pittsburgh next week. The program of the concerts Nov. 13, 14 is announced as follows: Tansman, Sinfonietta for a small orchestra (first time in America); Satie-Debussy, Gymnopedies; Chabrier—Mottl, Bourree Fantasqua; Rimsky—Korsakov, [illegible] "Scheherazade."

By Lawrence Gilman

vitzky's motives or intentions, it was a promising list. The Third Brandenburg Concerto is always good to hear, and last night it served to exhibit the sonority and power of Mr. Koussevitzky's enlarged string section. There were two works new to this neighborhood—the suite of Jacques Ibert and the "Chinese Legend" of that indefatigable Orientalist in tone, Henry Eichheim. And there was the "Pathetic"—which, despite the infuriated contempt of the sophisticated, still has a deplorable power of attraction for even a Boston Symphony audience.

* * *

As things panned out last night neither of the two novelties amounted to much. Monsieur Jacques Ibert is a belated French Impressionist, thirty-five years old, a Prix de Rome in 1919. He has written much; though no music of his, so far as we can recall, had been heard here before last night. There are dozens of his kind in Europe—composers of taste, finesse, skill, with nothing to say and a quite exquisite grace in the saying of it. His "Escales"—a suite of three little travel sketches—are well named. An "Escale," says Mr. Hale in his note, is a port-of-call, where vessels put in to take on coal or to revictual. Monsieur Ibert has stopped frequently at such spiritual coaling stations. Most of them were on the Debussyan seacoast, others were on the shores of Ravelia. Mr. Ibert stoked up industriously, and his vessel is a pretty sight as she puts out to sea. He uses good coal.

* *

Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" is a queer mixture, half Oriental and captivating, half Occidental and trite. The passages in which he suggests the Chinese ritual of mourning, the later passage in which his orchestra becomes a silver tintinnabulation of temcause we knew already what to expect of his serene magnificence.

But it was a strange and impressive experience to listen to the despised "Pathetic" as it unfolded its sable lengths and to realize (as some long have realized) that this repudiated thing, degraded by a thousand maulings, is a towering and lonely masterpiece. Where, in music, is there anything at all like it? It has, heaven knows, its lower levels, its moments of depletion. So, incidentally, has any one of Beethoven's Nine.

* * *

It would not be quite true to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's conveyance of the great score fulfilled at every point our own notions as to how this or that passage should be read. There were many divergences from the normal in his treatment of tempi, of phrasing of dynamics, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Koussevitzky did not intend his brasses to protrude so egregiously as they did in the approach to the climax of the Finale. But we are quite willing to forget a blemish or two of that sort. And as for the eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitzky's very personal interpretation, they do not really trouble us at all. If that is the way he feels it, well and good. The point is that he feels it, quite obviously, with consuming intensity; that he makes a superb and living thing of the music, an overwhelming communication. That is enough.

* * *

This music is an unparalleled utterance of that immortal dread which lies within the human spirit. Listening to it, you hear Tchaikovsky cry, with the poet Beddoes,

> "Let me make
> A staircase of the frightened
> breasts of men."

In its moments of terrible despair, in the mighty lamentation of the Finale, we hear, with Tchaikovsky, "the opening of the nettled lips of graves." This work is heavy with mortal agony; and at the end, as the gusts die down in the darkening street, and the lights

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 2 9 1925

Recognition for Mr. Goossens

Eugene Goossens is to conduct three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has been known these many months that Rochester must spare its popular orchestra conductor to New York for a number of concerts with the New York Symphony. But New York orchestras have made somewhat of a practice of inviting conductors to come to them at stated periods as guests. The Boston Symphony has never been wont to do this.

The Boston Symphony was the first American orchestra to win world recognition. Through its years of excellence, it has been conducted by some of the most able men who have conducted orchestras and still conduct them. An invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony is an honor, and is so regarded by all people conversant with orchestral traditions and records. Rochester enjoys its major claim on Mr. Goossens's services. It will be interested as a musical community in the recognition of his worth made by this invitation from Boston and in the concerts which Mr. Goossens will conduct through acceptance of it.

GERICKE MOURNED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Oct 31

Courier-Citizen Oct. 31

Symphony Hall, Boston
Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9,
Mar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15
A NEW SERIES OF 5 TUESDAY AFTERNOON
CONCERTS BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

All reserved seats for the four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston this season were sold out by advance subscription. The Tuesday series has been added to meet in part the unfilled demand for concerts by the great orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky plans to make the program particularly enjoyable, while giving them the further interest of historical sequence. Containing representative masterpieces from each important period, they will embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music.

THIS ORCHESTRA WILL NOT VISIT LOWELL THIS SEASON

SEASON PRICES, 5 Concerts: $4, $5, $7.50 and $9, no tax
Sale Opens at Symphony Hall, Monday, Nov. 2, 9 a. m.

Mail Orders Promptly Filled—Cheques Payable to Symphony Hall

Since every series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Koussevitzky is subscribed for the season, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 last year. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2, and April 6 at 3.15. These concerts are planned to be particularly attractive to college students, for the conductor will arrange the program in historical sequence in such a way that they will give a view of the extent and the development of Symphony music from the earliest times to our own.

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country. At Moscow and Leningrad he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters, and also championing the young creative genius of the day. With this same orchestra he travelled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard outside of Russia in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted Opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago Koussevitzky has quickly become an outstanding figure in the musical world.

---

composers. Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," in the orchestral vers. made by the composer from a previous revision for ballet performance of what began life as an opera, was the most important of these novelties.

The composer now says that this piece is to be judged as absolute music, as a pattern in sound. He has, however, authorized a program note outlining the familiar story by Hans Andersen about the Chinese Emperor who discards a real nightingale for a mechanical one, only to realise his error later. Those who attempt to find this story in the music will, however, probably go astray as they read and listen, because there is no consistent use of leading motives in an intelligible dramatic sequence.

Stravinsky during the years 1909-18, in which this music was being written and rewritten, composed works in varying styles. He began with the ravel and rose water of the "Firebird," turned from that to the barbaric vigor of "The Rites of Spring" and to the peasant humors of "Petruchka." In his more recent work Stravinsky has gone back to Bach, somewhat complicated with jazz, and ceased to tell stories or paint pictures in his music.

This suite is influenced strongly by his early style and also by that of his middle or "Petruchka" period. Here and there one even caught echoes of the melodies of his teacher, Rimsky Korsakov, who certainly succeeded in teaching Stravinsky orchestration, by the way.

It is of course impossible to give more than a general impression of the music from a single hearing. But what one felt about "The Song of the Nightingale" yesterday was that it is the work of a prodigiously clever young man, who had rather be well bred than be earnest, rather be sophisticated than be emotional, rather withdraw to China and make believe than try honestly to tell his hearers what is really at the bottom of his heart as a great composer ought to do.

Perhaps the secret is that nothing is there. Perhaps Stravinsky is only shy. Perhaps his art is chiefly technique. Perhaps he as well as the listener would give a whole aviary full of nightingales like this for a single air by Mozart.

A vivid and remarkably impressive performance of a battle piece used as entr'acte in an opera "Khitesch" by Rimsky Korsakov, and of some ballet music from the fourth act of Musorgsky's "Khovantchina," another unfamiliar Russian opera, brought the concert to a close. Even a listener hostile to hearing fragments of operas at these concerts could not but enjoy these

---

Symphony Ha'l, Boston
Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9,
Mar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15
A NEW SERIES OF 5 TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS BY THE

Harvard Crimson Oct 31.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

LOWEL

HESTRA

sevitzky, Conductor

our series of 62 concerts in Greater Bosby advance subscription. The Tuesday in part the unfilled demand for concerts make the programs particularly enjoy-further interest of historical sequence.

sterpieces from each important period,
cent range of orchestral music.

ERTS—$4, $5, $7.50 and $9, no tax
y Hall, Monday, Nov. 2, 9 A. M. l—Checks Payable to Symphony Hall.

MORE CONCERTS BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Management Announces a New Series for Tuesday Afternoons Once a Month.

Now in the second season under the celebrated Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have reached a popularity which exceeds all precedent in the long distinguished history of this organization. On account of this demand, the orchestra will not be able to visit Lowell this season.

SERGE KOUSSEVIT¼KY.

Since every series in Boston is subscribed for the season to the last seat, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in Greater Boston to 73 as against 59. The same conditions apply in New York when 10 concerts are given. The new series will be given in Symphony hall on the following Tuesday afternoons at 3.15: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2, and April 6. Since the average Symphony programs lasts about one hour and three-quarters, these concerts should prove particularly convenient for those living in outlying districts of Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky will arrange the five programs of this series in chronological order so that, containing masterpieces from each important period in the development of Symphony music, they represent the magnificent range of the orchestra repertory from the times of Bach, Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

First New York concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major, for string orchestra......Bach
2. A Chinese Legend............Eichheim (First time in New York)
3. Escales (Ports of Call)...........Ibert (First time in New York)
4. Symphony No. 6, in B minor (Pathetic), Tchaikovsky

Either Mr. Koussevitzky is still an imperfect New Englander, or else he is disposed to mockery and sardonic jests. Was he unaware that yesterday was Thanksgiving Day when he chose as the principal number of his program for last night's Boston Symphony concert that most despairful of all symphonies, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"? Or did it please his humor to serve this tonal tragedy of tragedies to an audience inflated with gratitude and pumpkin pie?

* * *

Perhaps, after all, he merely desired to give a wide variety to his program. If so, that variety was wide indeed. It reminded us a little of Mr. Pepys's remarkable collection of old English ballads, which, it will be recalled, were arranged under various heads, among others the following: "Devotion and Morality. Tragedy. Love, pleasant; Love, unfortunate. The Sea. Penny Witticisms, Penny Compliments, Penny Godlinesses."

Mr. Koussevitzky's programmatic scheme covered almost as much ground. There was Bach for Morality, and the "Pathetic" Symphony for Tragedy. Mr. Eichheim's setting of an ancient Chinese tale of passion and revenge woul have stood for Love, pleasant and un fortunate, and there was even a serie of tonal ballads of the Sea, represente by Jacques Ibert's three Mediterranea impressions which he entitles "Port of Call" ("Escales," in the origina French). All that the program lacked were Witticisms, Compliments, and Godlinesses—but those, of course, had already been supplied to the audience by its own Thanksgiving celebration.

vitzky's motives or intentions, it was a promising list. The Third Brandenburg Concerto is always good to hear, and last night it served to exhibit the sonority and power of Mr. Koussevitzky's enlarged string section. There were two works new to this neighborhood—the suite of Jacques Ibert and the "Chinese Legend" of that indefatigable Orientalist in tone, Henry Eichheim. And there was the "Pathetic"—which, despite the infuriated contempt of the sophisticated, still has a deplorable power of attraction for even a Boston Symphony audience.

* * *

As things panned out last night neither of the two novelties amounted to much. Monsieur Jacques Ibert is a belated French Impressionist, thirty-five years old, a Prix de Rome in 1919. He has written much; though no music of his, so far as we can recall, had been heard here before last night. There are dozens of his kind in Europe—composers of taste, finesse, skill, with nothing to say and a quite exquisite grace in the saying of it. His "Escales"—a suite of three little travel sketches—are well named. An "Escale," says Mr. Hale in his note, is a port-of-call, where vessels put in to take on coal or to revictual. Monsieur Ibert has stopped frequently at such spiritual coaling stations. Most of them were on the Debussyan seacoast, others were on the shores of Ravelia. Mr. Ibert stoked up industriously, and his vessel is a pretty sight as she puts out to sea. He uses good coal.

* * *

Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" is a queer mixture, half Oriental and captivating, half Occidental and trite. The passages in which he suggests the Chinese ritual of mourning, the later passage in which his orchestra becomes a silver tintinnabulation of tem-

cause we knew already what to expect of his serene magnificence.

But it was a strange and impressive experience to listen to the despised "Pathetic" as it unfolded its sable lengths and to realize (as some long have realized) that this repudiated thing, degraded by a thousand maulings, is a towering and lonely masterpiece. Where, in music, is there anything at all like it? It has, heaven knows, its lower levels, its moments of depletion. So, incidentally, has any one of Beethoven's Nine.

* * *

It would not be quite true to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's conveyance of the great score fulfilled at every point our own notions as to how this or that passage should be read. There were many divergences from the normal in his treatment of tempi, of phrasing, of dynamics, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Koussevitzky did not intend his brasses to protrude so egregiously as they did in the approach to the climax of the Finale. But we are quite willing to forget a blemish or two of that sort. And as for the eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitzky's very personal interpretation, they do not really trouble us at all. If that is the way he feels it, well and good. The point is that he feels it, quite obviously, with consuming intensity; that he makes a superb and living thing of the music, an overwhelming communication. That is enough.

* * *

This music is an unparalleled utterance of that immortal dread which lies within the human spirit. Listening to it, you hear Tchaikovsky cry, with the poet Beddoes,

> "Let me make
> A staircase of the frightened
> breasts of men."

In its moments of terrible despair, in the mighty lamentation of the Finale, we hear, with Tchaikovsky, "the opening of the nettled lips of graves." This work is heavy with mortal agony; and at the end, as the gusts die down in the darkening street, and the lights

---

. . . have far m hatever Mr. Kousseheard in connection
and action than whe
in the concert room.
sounded yesterday me
purposeless, even incohe
doubt have amused,
pressed, when they
episodes in the ba Andersen

ent nost ym-
Chie fu-wisher by ogresn, was eautiful mirably t trum-tingales,
Bladet,
ll oppor-
ical proa was se-stood the

ve been reed Stravin-
ther Ameri-
t not led by
is, brought it
A work of this lexing when it
the first time,
ed again. It is on will know it
he pity, for not-y's present belief
in reality "abso-
the Nightingale"
and peradventure
e enjoyable in the
the story of the dim light of Sym-

d of the other Rus-
"Battle" serves as an ky's opera "The Tale
City of Kitesch." This t of great importance, pictorially. Rimsky or-oussorgsgy's "Persian"
in the opera "Khovant-rformed for the pleasure le and irritated Prince.
section is charmingly

sevitzky caught Weber's rit, and gave a legitimately ading of the overture. We hat when Mr. Koussevitzky of twelve, he happened to be tre or a concert hall where ctor was missing or incapacid then and there Mr. Kousse-onducted this overture. The mysterious measures of the Largo were exquisitely played.

Especially noteworthy in the performances of the symphony were the Romanza and the Scherzo. It might be interesting to hear the song in the former movement accompanied by a guitar as Schumann originally intended. We have not heard the haunting Trio of the Scherzo read and played so poetically since the time of Arthur Nikisch. The other conductors in turn treated this music in a perfunctory, matter-of-fact manner.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will visit Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Ithaca and Pittsburgh next week. The program of the concerts Nov. 13, 14 is announced as follows: Tansman, Sinfonietta for a small orchestra (first time in America); Satie-Debussy, Gymnopedies; Chabrier—Mottl, ree Fantasque; Rimsky—Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

Tech Oct 30th '25

Russian Leader of Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky

Since every series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Koussevitzky is subscribed for the season, a new historical series has just been announced to be given on five Tuesday afternoons. This will increase the total number of concerts in greater Boston to 73 as against 59 last year. The new series will be given in Symphony Hall on December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2, and April 6 at 3.15. These concerts are planned to be particularly attractive to college students, for the conductor will arrange the program in historical sequence in such a way that they will give a view of the extent and the development of Symphony music from the earliest times to our own.

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country. At Moscow and Leningrad he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters, and also championing the young creative genius of the day. With this same orchestra he travelled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard outside of Russia in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted Opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago Koussevitzky has quickly become an outstanding figure in the musical world

---

GERICKE MOURNED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe —— Oct 31

Funeral March Played for Dead Conductor

Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889, and again from 1898 to 1906, died Tuesday in Vienna. All who have followed the career of the orchestra from the beginning are agreed that he, more than any other one man, save only Maj Higginson, made it. At the beginning of yesterday's concert, orchestra and audience stood while the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was played in memory of Wilhelm Gericke.

Many in the audience and not a few in the orchestra must remember Mr Gericke vividly. One of a younger generation, to whom he has been but a name, need only record the quiet solemnity of yesterday's tribute as an honor well deserved. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a performance of unusual beauty, as befitted the occasion.

Yesterday's concert was the best of the Symphony season to date. It began, after the tribute to Gericke, with an admirable performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in which Mr Koussevitzky made the ghostly largo mysterious enough to have suited the romantic Weber and set it in a foil of brilliant rhythm.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony is music notoriously of uneven quality and not well fitted to its orchestral medium. Mr Koussevitzky managed to make most of it interesting and some of it thrilling, which is more than most conductors seem able to do with so baffling a piece.

After the intermission came three pieces new to Boston, all by Russian composers. Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," in the orchestral version made by the composer from a previous revision for ballet performance of what began life as an opera, was the most important of these novelties.

The composer now says that this piece is to be judged as absolute music, as a pattern in sound. He has, however, authorized a program note outlining the familiar story by Hans Andersen about the Chinese Emperor who discards a real nightingale for a mechanical one only to realise his error later. Those who attempt to find this story in the music will, however, probably go astray as they read and listen, because there is no consistent use of leading motives in an intelligible dramatic sequence.

Stravinsky during the years 1909-18, in which this music was being written and rewritten, composed works in varying styles. He began with the ravel and rose water of the "Firebird," turned from that to the barbaric vigor of "The Rites of Spring" and to the peasant humors of "Petruchka." In his more recent work Stravinsky has gone back to Bach, somewhat complicated with jazz, and ceased to tell stories or paint pictures in his music.

This suite is influenced strongly by his early style and also by that of his middle or "Petruchka" period. Here and there one even caught echoes of the melodies of his teacher, Rimsky Korsakov, who certainly succeeded in teaching Stravinsky orchestration, by the way.

It is of course impossible to give more than a general impression of the music from a single hearing. But what one felt about "The Song of the Nightingale" yesterday was that it is the work of a prodigiously clever young man who had rather be well bred than be earnest, rather be sophisticated than be emotional, rather withdraw to China and make believe than try honestly to tell his hearers what is really at the bottom of his heart as a great composer ought to do.

Perhaps the secret is that nothing is there. Perhaps Stravinsky is only shy. Perhaps his art is chiefly technique. Perhaps he as well as the listener would give a whole aviary full of nightingales like this for a single air by Mozart.

A vivid and remarkably impressive performance of a battle piece used as entr'acte in an opera "Khitesch" by Rimsky Korsakov, and of some ballet music from the fourth act of Musorgsky's "Khovantchina," another unfamiliar Russian opera, brought the concert to a close. Even a listener hostile to hearing fragments of operas at these concerts could not but enjoy these

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 29 1925

Recognition for Mr. Goossens

Eugene Goossens is to conduct three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has been known these many months that Rochester must spare its popular orchestra conductor to New York for a number of concerts with the New York Symphony. But New York orchestras have made somewhat of a practice of inviting conductors to come to them at stated periods as guests. The Boston Symphony has never been wont to do this.

The Boston Symphony was the first American orchestra to win world recognition. Through its years of excellence, it has been conducted by some of the most able men who have conducted orchestras and still conduct them. An invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony is an honor, and is so regarded by all people conversant with orchestral traditions and records. Rochester enjoys its major claim on Mr. Goossens's services. It will be interested as a musical community in the recognition of his worth made by this invitation from Boston and in the concerts which Mr. Goossens will conduct through acceptance of it.

Symphony Hall, Boston Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, Mar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15

A NEW SERIES OF 5 TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS BY THE

Harvard Crimson Oct 31.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

All reserved seats for the four series of 62 concerts in Greater Boston this season were sold out by advance subscription. The Tuesday series has been added to meet in part the unfilled demand for concerts by the great orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky plans to make the programs particularly enjoyable, while giving them the further interest of historical sequence. Containing representative masterpieces from each important period, they will embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music.

SEASON PRICES, 5 CONCERTS—$4, $5, $7.50 and $9, no tax

Sale Opens at Symphony Hall, Monday, Nov. 2, 9 A. M.

Mail Orders Promptly Filled—Checks Payable to Symphony Hall.

Courier— 925

repertory,

Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

First New York concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major, for string orchestra......Bach
2. A Chinese Legend............Eichheim (First time in New York)
3. Escales (Ports of Call)...........Ibert (First time in New York)
4. Symphony No. 6, in B minor (Pathetic), Tchaikovsky

Either Mr. Koussevitzky is still an imperfect New Englander, or else he is disposed to mockery and sardonic jests. Was he unaware that yesterday was Thanksgiving Day when he chose as the principal number of his program for last night's Boston Symphony concert that most despairful of all symphonies, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"? Or did it please his humor to serve this tonal tragedy of tragedies to an audience inflated with gratitude and pumpkin pie?

* * *

Perhaps, after all, he merely desired to give a wide variety to his program. If so, that variety was wide indeed. It reminded us a little of Mr. Pepys's remarkable collection of old English ballads, which, it will be recalled, were arranged under various heads, among others the following: "Devotion and Morality. Tragedy. Love, pleasant; Love, unfortunate. The Sea. Penny Witticisms, Penny Compliments, Penny Godlinesses."

Mr. Koussevitzky's programmatic scheme covered almost as much ground. There was Bach for Morality, and the "Pathetic" Symphony for Tragedy. Mr. Eichheim's setting of an ancient Chinese tale of passion and revenge would have stood for Love, pleasant and unfortunate, and there was even a series of tonal ballads of the Sea, represented by Jacques Ibert's three Mediterranean impressions which he entitles "Ports of Call" ("Escales," in the original French). All that the program lacked were Witticisms, Compliments, and Godlinesses—but those, of course, had already been supplied to the audience by its own Thanksgiving celebration.

* * *

...have far m...hatever Mr. Kousse-
vitzky's motives or intentions, it was a promising list. The Third Brandenburg Concerto is always good to hear, and last night it served to exhibit the sonority and power of Mr. Koussevitzky's enlarged string section. There were two works new to this neighborhood—the suite of Jacques Ibert and the "Chinese Legend" of that indefatigable Orientalist in tone, Henry Eichheim. And there was the "Pathetic"—which, despite the infuriated contempt of the sophisticated, still has a deplorable power of attraction for even a Boston Symphony audience.

* * *

As things panned out last night neither of the two novelties amounted to much. Monsieur Jacques Ibert is a belated French Impressionist, thirty-five years old, a Prix de Rome in 1919. He has written much; though no music of his, so far as we can recall, had been heard here before last night. There are dozens of his kind in Europe—composers of taste, finesse, skill, with nothing to say and a quite exquisite grace in the saying of it. His "Escales"—a suite of three little travel sketches—are well named. An "Escale," says Mr. Hale in his note, is a port-of-call, where vessels put in to take on coal or to revictual. Monsieur Ibert has stopped frequently at such spiritual coaling stations. Most of them were on the Debussyan seacoast, others were on the shores of Ravelia. Mr. Ibert stoked up industriously, and his vessel is a pretty sight as she puts out to sea. He uses good coal.

* * *

Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" is a queer mixture, half Oriental and captivating, half Occidental and trite. The passages in which he suggests the Chinese ritual of mourning, the later passage in which his orchestra becomes a silver tintinnabulation of temple bells and gongs and little cymbals—these are of rare, exotic beauty. This is the Eichheim of the earlier "Oriental Impressions" (which Mr. Eichheim has not yet surpassed or even equaled). But the love music is far less costly—it is not, indeed, costly at all, but second hand, marked down Puccini.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played both novelties exceedingly well—brilliantly, indeed; and in the second movement of the Ibert suite ("Tunis-Nefta"), the orchestra's new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, a successor to the inimitable Longy, was able to disclose his skill, his taste, his beauty of tone. But the amusing fact remains—and it will not be disputed, we think, by those who stayed to the end of the concert—that the dominating feature of the concert was that symphony by Tchaikovsky which no self-respecting musician will nowadays allow himself to praise, or even hear without protest—and we do not forget that last night's program contained the superb concerto of Bach. Bach can stand alone, divinely uncompanioned and incomparable. He did not surprise us last night, because we knew already what to expect of his serene magnificence.

But it was a strange and impressive experience to listen to the despised "Pathetic" as it unfolded its sable lengths and to realize (as some long have realized) that this repudiated thing, degraded by a thousand maulings, is a towering and lonely masterpiece. Where, in music, is there anything at all like it? It has, heaven knows, its lower levels, its moments of depletion. So, incidentally, has any one of Beethoven's Nine.

* * *

It would not be quite true to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's conveyance of the great score fulfilled at every point our own notions as to how this or that passage should be read. There were many divergences from the normal in his treatment of tempi, of phrasing, of dynamics, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Koussevitzky did not intend his brasses to protrude so egregiously as they did in the approach to the climax of the Finale. But we are quite willing to forget a blemish or two of that sort. And as for the eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitzky's very personal interpretation, they do not really trouble us at all. If that is the way he feels it, well and good. The point is that he feels it, quite obviously, with consuming intensity; that he makes a superb and living thing of the music, an overwhelming communication. That is enough.

* * *

This music is an unparalleled utterance of that immortal dread which lies within the human spirit. Listening to it, you hear Tchaikovsky cry, with the poet Beddoes,

> "Let me make
> A staircase of the frightened
> breasts of men."

In its moments of terrible despair, in the mighty lamentation of the Finale, we hear, with Tchaikovsky, "the opening of the nettled lips of graves." This work is heavy with mortal agony; and at the end, as the gusts die down in the darkening street, and the lights fade, and the long night falls, you know, beyond all doubt or contradiction, that you have listened to one of the supreme confessions of all music.

---

heard in connection
and action than whe
in the concert room.
sounded yesterday me
purposeless, even incohe
doubt have amused,
pressed, when they
episodes in the bal
Andersen'

t tal
the ent na—most sym-
Chie fu-wish-rer by rogres-n, was eautiful
dmirably st trumntingales,
Bladet,
ll oppor-
ical pro-
a was se-stood the

ve been reed Stravin-
ther Ameri-
t not led by
is, brought it
A work of this plexing when it
the first time,
ed again. It is
on will know it
the pity, for not-y's present belief
in reality "abso-
the Nightingale"
and peradventure
re enjoyable in the h the story of the dim light of Sym-

id of the other Rus
"Battle" serves as a sky's opera "The Tal
City of Kitesch." Thi
t of great importanc pictorially. Rimsky or oussorgsgy's "Persian in the opera "Khovan rformed for the pleasu
ble and irritated Prince.
section is charmingly

ssevitzky caught Weber's irit, and gave a legitimately eading of the overture. We hat when Mr. Koussevitzky
of twelve, he happened to be atre or a concert hall where uctor was missing or incapaci-
d then and there Mr. Kousse-conducted this overture. The mysterious measures of the Largo were exquisitely played.

Especially noteworthy in the performances of the symphony were the Romanza and the Scherzo. It might be interesting to hear the song in the former movement accompanied by a guitar as Schumann originally intended. We have not heard the haunting Trio of the Scherzo read and played so poetically since the time of Arthur Nikisch. The other conductors in turn treated this music in a perfunctory, matter-of-fact manner.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will visit Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Ithaca and Pittsburgh next week. The program of the concerts Nov. 13, 14 is announced as follows: Tansman, Sinfonietta for a small orchestra (first time in America); Satie-[illegible]ussy, Gymnopedies; Chabrier—Mottl, [illegible] Fantasque; Rimsky—Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

Koussevitzky was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. As a young man he toured the continent surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. Giving all his career to conducting, he assembled an orchestra in his own country. At Moscow and Leningrad he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older masters, and also championing the young creative genius of the day. With this same orchestra he travelled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard outside of Russia in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" which have come to be an annual institution. In London every season, Koussevitzky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra. He has conducted Opera with a similar distinction in the Old World.

Coming to America a year ago Koussevitzky has quickly become an outstanding figure in the musical world.

Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889, and again from 1898 to 1906, died Tuesday in Vienna. All who have followed the career of the orchestra from the beginning are agreed that he, more than any other one man, save only Maj Higginson, made it. At the beginning of yesterday's concert, orchestra and audience stood while the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was played in memory of Wilhelm Gericke.

Many in the audience and not a few in the orchestra must remember Mr Gericke vividly. One of a younger generation, to whom he has been but a name, need only record the quiet solemnity of yesterday's tribute as an honor well deserved. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a performance of unusual beauty, as befitted the occasion.

Yesterday's concert was the best of the Symphony season to date. It began, after the tribute to Gericke, with an admirable performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in which Mr Koussevitzky made the ghostly largo mysterious enough to have suited the romantic Weber and set it in a foil of brilliant rhythm.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony is music notoriously of uneven quality and not well fitted to its orchestral medium. Mr Koussevitzky managed to make most of it interesting and some of it thrilling, which is more than most conductors seem able to do with so baffling a piece.

After the intermission came three pieces new to Boston, all by Russian composers. Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," in the orchestral version made by the composer from a previous revision for ballet performance of what began life as an opera, was the most important of these novelties.

The composer now says that this piece is to be judged as absolute music, as a pattern in sound. He has, however, authorized a program note outlining the familiar story by Hans Andersen about the Chinese Emperor who discards a real nightingale for a mechanical one, only to realise his error later. Those who attempt to find this story in the music will, however, probably go astray as they read and listen, because there is no consistent use of leading motives in an intelligible dramatic sequence.

Stravinsky during the years 1909-18, in which this music was being written and rewritten, composed works in varying styles. He began with the ravel and rose water of the "Firebird," turned from that to the barbaric vigor of "The Rites of Spring" and to the peasant humors of "Petruchka." In his more recent work Stravinsky has gone back to Bach, somewhat complicated with jazz, and ceased to tell stories or paint pictures in his music.

This suite is influenced strongly by his early style and also by that of his middle or "Petruchka" period. Here and there one even caught echoes of the melodies of his teacher, Rimsky Korsakov, who certainly succeeded in teaching Stravinsky orchestration, by the way.

It is of course impossible to give more than a general impression of the music from a single hearing. But what one felt about "The Song of the Nightingale" yesterday was that it is the work of a prodigiously clever young man, who had rather be well bred than be earnest, rather be sophisticated than be emotional, rather withdraw to China and make believe than try honestly to tell his hearers what is really at the bottom of his heart as a great composer ought to do.

Perhaps the secret is that nothing is there. Perhaps Stravinsky is only shy. Perhaps his art is chiefly technique. Perhaps he as well as the listener would give a whole aviary full of nightingales like this for a single air by Mozart.

A vivid and remarkably impressive performance of a battle piece used as entr'acte in an opera "Khitesch" by Rimsky Korsakov, and of some ballet music from the fourth act of Musorgsky's "Khovantchina," another unfamiliar Russian opera, brought the concert to a close. Even a listener hostile to hearing fragments of operas at these concerts could not but enjoy these

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 29 1925

Recognition for Mr. Goossens

Eugene Goossens is to conduct three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has been known these many months that Rochester must spare its popular orchestra conductor to New York for a number of concerts with the New York Symphony. But New York orchestras have made somewhat of a practice of inviting conductors to come to them at stated periods as guests. The Boston Symphony has never been wont to do this.

The Boston Symphony was the first American orchestra to win world recognition. Through its years of excellence, it has been conducted by some of the most able men who have conducted orchestras and still conduct them. An invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony is an honor, and is so regarded by all people conversant with orchestral traditions and records. Rochester enjoys its major claim on Mr. Goossens's services. It will be interested as a musical community in the recognition of his worth made by this invitation from Boston and in the concerts which Mr. Goossens will conduct through acceptance of it.

Symphony Hall, Boston — Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, Mar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15

A NEW SERIES OF 5 TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS BY THE

Harvard Crimson Oct 31.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

All reserved seats for the four series of 62 concerts in Greater Boston this season were sold out by advance subscription. The Tuesday series has been added to meet in part the unfilled demand for concerts by the great orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky plans to make the programs particularly enjoyable, while giving them the further interest of historical sequence. Containing representative masterpieces from each important period, they will embrace the magnificent range of orchestral music.

SEASON PRICES, 5 CONCERTS—$4, $5, $7.50 and $9, no tax
Sale Opens at Symphony Hall, Monday, Nov. 2, 9 A. M.

Mail Orders Promptly Filled—Checks Payable to Symphony Hall.

Courier- 1925

repertory from Handel, and the early Italian masters to the music of today and tomorrow.

Coming to America a year ago, with this reputation to herald him, Koussevitzky, appearing over the famous orchestra which he still commands, more than fulfilled the highest expectation. He has quickly become the most outstanding figure in the musical world of those cities which the orchestra visits and his reputation extends the length and breadth of this country.

---

pit Topics in Our Congregational Churches." 5 p. m., C. E. meeting.

EPISCOPAL

St. Anne's: 7.30 a. m., Holy Communion; 9.30 a. m., Sunday school; 10.45 a. m., service and sermon; 7 p. m., evening service and address.

St. John's: 9.30 a. m., church school; 10.45 a. m., Holy Communion and sermon; 7 p. m., address on "Irving and the Irvingites."

EVANGELICAL

First: 10.30 a. m., "The Place of Evangelism in the Life of the Christian," sermon by Rev. A. L. Nash; 12 m., Sunday school; 6 p. m., Junior and Senior E. L. C. E.; 7 p. m., preaching service.

MINISTRY-AT-LARGE

Free Church: 10.45 a. m., "Favored of God," sermon by Rev. George C. Wright.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

Highland Union: 10 a. m., Sunday school; 11 a. m., morning worship and communion; 3 p. m., Junior League; 5.30 p. m., Epworth League; 6.30 p. m., "Judge Not, that Ye Be Not Judged."

Church of All Nations: 10.30 a. m., communion and sermon; 11 a. m.

Symphony Hall, B
A NEW SERIES OF 5
CONCER
BOSTON S
ORCH
Serge Kouss
All reserved seats for the fo
Boston this season were sold out Tuesday series has been added to for concerts by the great orchest
Mr. Koussevitzky plans to ma able, while giving them the furth Containing representative masterp they will embrace the magnificent
THIS ORCHESTRA WILL NOT
SEASON PRICES, 5 Concert
Sale Opens at Symphony, H
Mail Orders Promptly Filled—Ch

All the Great Chain of Eight Joyce Stores offer you equal values in latest Inc.

The Established 1

CAMBRIDG

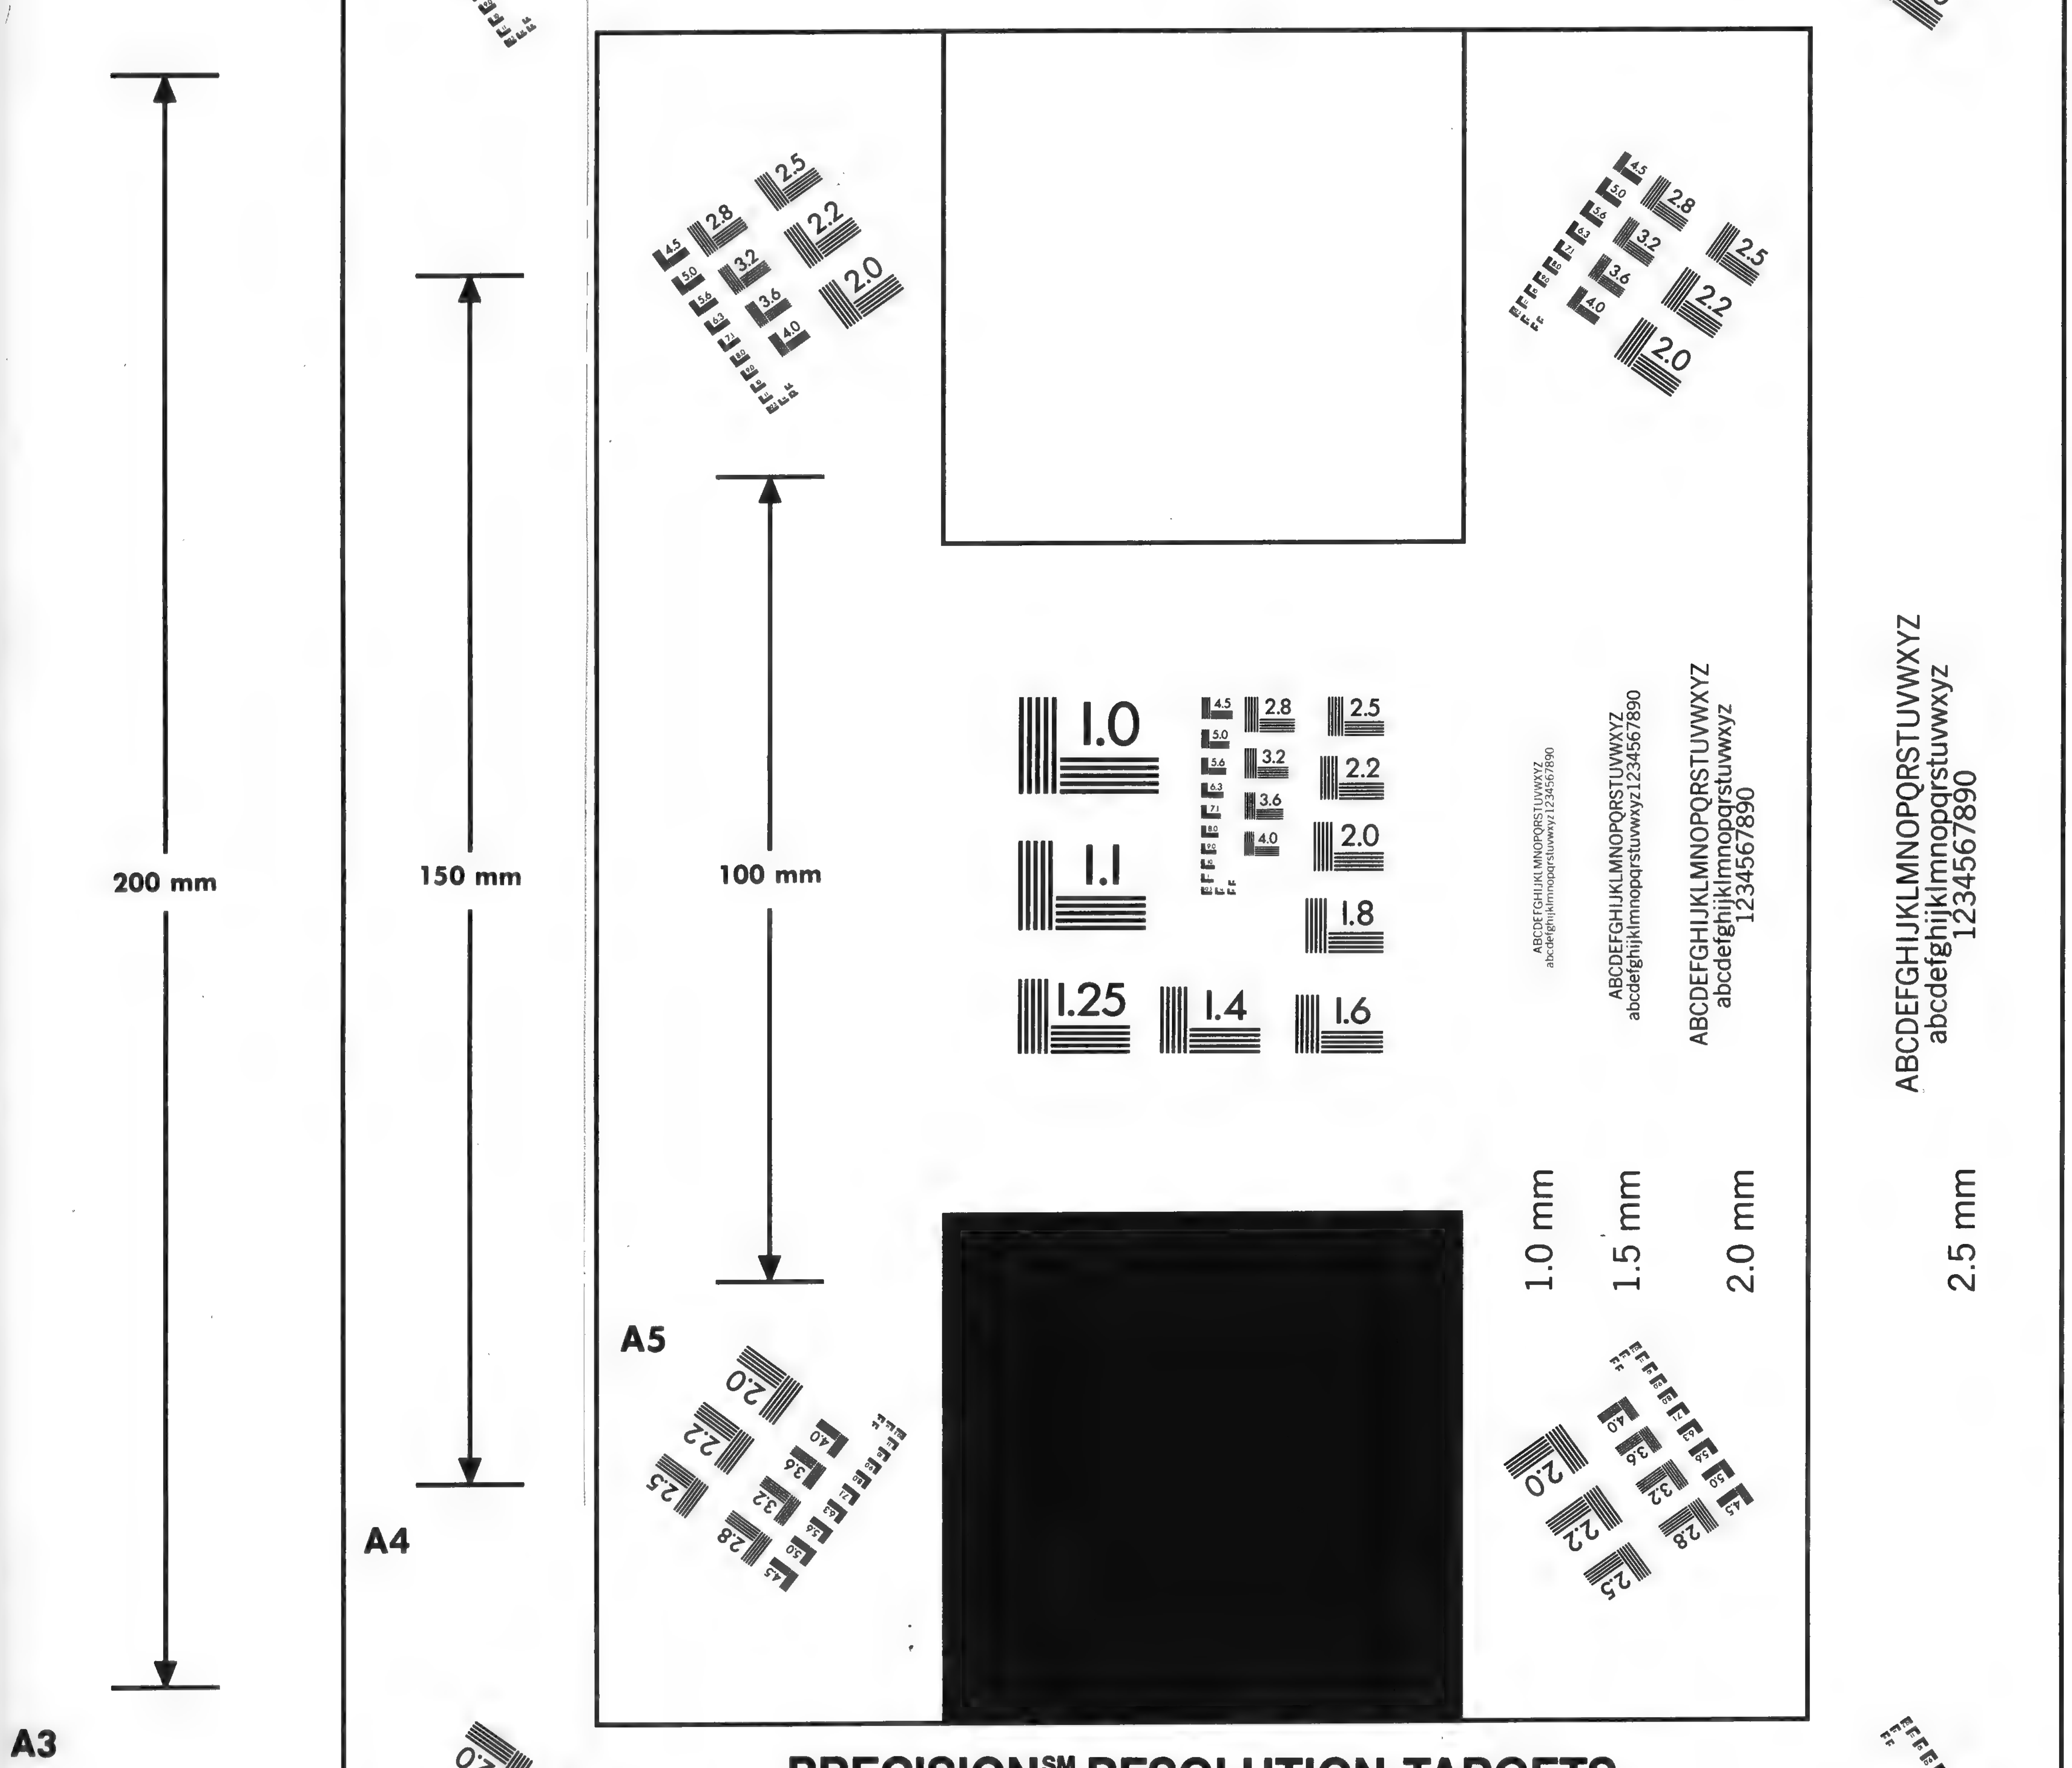
1XM "GETS" ENGLAND ON ITS FIRST NIGHT

Communication was established Tuesday night between Technology's

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9,
ar. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15
ONCERTS BY THE
~ Oct 31.
HONY
A
nductor
rts in Greater Bos-
n. The Tuesday
rmed for concerts particularly enjoy-
istorical sequence.
important period,
al music.
nd $9, no tax
. 1, 9 A. M.
mphony Hall.

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony

STRAVINSKY'S EXOTIC-LOVELY "NIGHTINGALE"

Trans — Oct 31

A MEMORABLE AFTERNOON AT THE SYMPHONY

The "Rossignol" for Flavorsome, Elusive Qualities—Oriental Shadings in Impeccable Performance — Rimsky and Musorgsky for Tid-Bits—Schumann in Renewed Beauty and Grace

THE same paper which on Thursday evening carried an advance account of the famous novelty that was to be played at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, carried also an account of the passing—more, of the life—of the great leader who twice headed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who first provided the magic that made out of a group of individual players, playing rather well together, that perfect unit for which the erm orchestra should be reserved. It was fitting, then, that the memory of that great leader should be honored. And thus the program books that announced the first performance in Boston of Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," contained also the little black-framed insert announcing that "In memory of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1884-1889 and 1898-1906, the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be performed at the beginning of the program." As is the custom in such cases, band and audience stood at the signal of the conductor. Reverently the orchestra played it, with an infinite and haunting tenderness, solemnly, yet without the feeling of undue gloom. The conductor departed. The assemblage sat. The Friday afternoon members of the Symphony family had paid their last formal tribute to the memory of Wilhelm Gericke.

It was a program in which the word "first" was much in evidence. In addition to the first Boston performance of Stravinsky's "Nightingale," there were also first performances in this city of pieces by Rimsky-Korsakov and Musorgsky—from the former "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" out of the opera "Kitesch"; from the latter, Persian Dances out of the opera "Khovántchina." But more, the program contained also Mr. Kousseвitzky's first Bostonian adventure with the composer Schumann. His fourth symphony, in D-minor, was the chosen work. Again, as novelties filled the last half of the program, so fmailiar pieces filled the first half—familiar Schumann was preceded by doubly familiar Weber, the Weber of the Overture to "Euryanthe."

The Stravnisky of the Suite, "Le Chant du Rossignol," is in many ways the same as the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre du Printemps"; not for nothing do both date from the same period of the composer's life. There are, of course, the obvious differences, differences due to the two kinds of subject matter. Primordial, life-consuming dances predicate brutal rhythms in "Le Sacre." "The Nightingale" makes equally insistent demands in its own peculiar way. Thus equally well has Stravinsky taken his cue for the underlying ground-mood of his piece about the Nightingale. We are told that the action of the diminutive opera from which sprang this ballet, then this suite, took place in the palace of the Chinese Emperor, which "had been elaborately decorated. The walls and floors, which were of porcelain, shone in the days of a hundred thousand golden lamps." Surely the cue to the underlying mood which binds together the many effects of grotesquerie to be found in this score is discoverable in the words "which were of porcelain." To be sure, of local "Chinese" color (secured by pentatonic scale formulas) there is plenty. But this is incidental just as the song of the Nightingale itself is a thrice-repeated incident. Beneath it all, through it all, at times in the background, at times almost invisible, yet always there is that feeling of "préciosité" whch is the exact counterpart of the porcelain walls. These walls in the story were not always in the foreground of the mind, yet they set the atmosphere for the whole thing; exactly so with the music. If the piece survives it is safe to say it will be because of the fact that Stravinsky has been so hugely successful in bringing into musical captivity, in then setting free, this highly elusive, this finely attenuated mood. Consider: there is scarcely a full fortissimo in the whole piece, from end to end; all the cacophany, all the musical "wise cracks," all the realism—attempted or successful—all the eerieness, all the niaiserie, is steeped in this atmosphere of the (no other word will fit) "precious."

Second only to this wonderful unifying element is the variety of incident, but second most decidedly it is, in spite of all the descriptive comment that has been given to it. What need to go into detail about the noisy bustling preparations for the emperor, the pentatonic Chinese march that marks his entry, the beautiful songs of the nightingale or the quackery of her imitation, the song of the fisherman or the description of the Emperor's anger, or of his tears, the funeral march or the harps' "Good morning"? The [illegible] much-quoted Mr Gilman has already done all this. And particularly why at this late date comment on the now known idiom of a piece over a decade old?

As to performance suffice it to say that it left nothing to be desired. If Stravinsky captured an elusive mood, Koussevitzky and a hundred and ten others made it real to their hearers; if he arranged the lines and the colors for the portrayal of the many unusual incidents, they flashed the picture. In a sense very specific, many of the men were soloists—the song passages of the nightingale alone required solo violin as well as solo flute, and some others; even the first contrabassist had his rather grateful solo passage. So that after continued applause, Mr. Koussevitzky, not able to bid the bevy of soloists to rise repeatedly, allowed his outstretched hand to rove past the whole orchestra.

It was clearly the misfortune of Rimsky-Korsakov's and Musorgsky's pieces to be played as novelties on the same program with the "Nightingale." Public interest, concerned with Stravinsky, recognizeed no other new pieces. In themselves these two pieces are but fragmnts taken out of operas. Mr. Koussevitzky has already played from the "Khovántchina" in Boston; "Kitesch" has remained entirely unheard. The title "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" must have aroused suspicion with many a music lover. For the experienced concert-goer knows that "battle music," even from the very best composers, is apt to be somewhat below the usual standard. Any who thought thus must have been agreeably surprised at this concert. For Rimsky did not stoop to the trickery or the realism that spoils such pieces. True, his music is the music of tumult, ascending in long cumulative waves, approaching a magnificent climax, receding therefrom. But it remains within the realm of the purely imaginative, it is recognizedly legitimate program-music. But after Stravinsky's music it seemed especially tame for battle music. In the opera it occurs while the city of Kitesch, hard pressed by the Tartars, is miraculously being lifted into the clouds. When the curtain is raised again after the battle, Kitesch has become for the Tartars the Invisible City, while for the two lovers about whom the opera revolves, has become the Celestial City.

The Dances of Persian Women from e fourth act of "Khovántchina" are used the opera merely as distraction for rince Khovantski, who is seated at a able. They begin slowly, with sensuous anguor; they maintain this mood, they ise to a point approaching frenzy, recede gain, finally reach greater heights. The hand of Rimsky-Korsakov, who completed Musorgsky's work, is evident in them. They are full of Rimsky's suavity rather than Musorgsky's barbarities. Their Orientalism is that of "Scheherezade." Both pieces apparently lose much from dissociation with the operas to which they belong. One can see that they fit their place admirably. Separate, as self-contained pieces, they—especially the battle scene—are none too significant. Splendor of performance scarcely rescued them.

Again, all the artistry that Mr. Koussevitzky lavished upon Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, could not hide the fact that at times Schumann's inventive power is not equal to the task of filling in a complete symphonic form. All too often do the joints creak, all to often is mere figure repetition substituted for thematic development. No performance can alter this. But there are compensations in the beauty of some of the themes, there were compensations yesterday afternoon in the beauty of Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Indeed, it was to the conductor rather than to the composer that chief honors must go for the pleasures derived from this symphony. With clear intent did he drive his band to provide continuity where Schumann was disjunct. And who can ever forget the mood he established with the chief theme of the Romanza? The program book calls it a "mournful melody," and so it has always seemed. But with Mr. Koussevitzky, playing it very slowly as is often his wont, adjusting its rhythms after his own fashion, it cut far, far more deeply than that. An indescribable pathos, the calm of infinite resignation was in it. So also the original and exhilarating rhythms of parts of the Scherzo were transformed through the power and insight and musical feeling of the conductor. The formal scheme of the whole, new with Schumann who was experimenting in the direction of the symphony in a single movement, stood clearly exposed. The bits of some of the harmonies that must have sounded over-dissonant to the ears of its first hearers, was brought fully into relief. Conductor had given composer every possible service, and more, too.

And at the beginning stood a glorified "Euryanthe." Flashing, tearing rhythms began it; with pomp and circumstance it was brought forth. It rose to the familiar crashing chord with the following cataclysmic strokes of the drum at the point of transition. And here Mr. Koussevitzky avoided one of the most dangerous pitfalls of the work. The second theme, often trivial, more often banal and trite, almost always taken light-heartedly, came forth with touching tenderness and seriousness, a thing of new and living beauty. And the measures of mystification were more uncanny than from many a hand. Again the extremely slow tempo, again the extremely soft pianissimo; but also the form of the conductor, creeping over it all, making the string chords slide all but imperceptibly into each other; all working toward the creation of perfect illusion. Then the final return with all its gorgeousness and splendor redoubled. Mr. Koussevitzky feels deeply what music is intended to mean. His resource often adds to that meaning—almost always without altering its essential content—almost always enforcing it marvellously upon his hearers.

A. H. M.

CHRISTMAS GREETING CARDS
Business and Personal Use
EVERSHARP PENCILS
J. L. Fairbanks & Co.
123 Franklin St. at Federal St.
swtc(R) s 26

HAND MADE SHOES
—artfully built for correct walking and standing
L. F. SMALL, Little Bldg. Boston.
Est. 1886 Beach 2180
stc(R) s 19

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS

NOV 20 1925

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The programmes are now announced for the new historical series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on the five Tuesday afternoons of December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2 and April 6 at 3.15.

The series, which should be of particular convenience of residents of outlying districts of Boston, is now mostly sold by subscription. A few season tickets, however, are available. These may be purchased by mail order.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following programme for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the Praeludium to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

…ollowing list of composers … represented)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

NOV 21 1925

SECOND CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The program was entirely orchestral and consisted of these numbers: Overture, "Euyanthe," Weber; Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Dukas; Fourth Symphony, "Pathetic," Tchaikovsky.

No novelties were presented on this program, but every number was a favorite with the patrons of these concerts. Probably the chief interest lay in the interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which Mr. Koussevitsky has not presented at these concerts previously, since he became conductor of the Boston orchestra.

Emil Paur was the first to present this work at a symphony concert late in 1893, not long after its first Russian performance shortly before Tchaikovsky passed away in November of that year. Mr. Paur was most successful in giving this work an adequate "first time" presentation, and the work even with its inherent melancholy became a favorite from the very first. For more than 30 years, the "Pathetic" symphony has made its remarkable appeal to music lovers, and today, as ever, it stands alone among works of its kind. There are some who think the work is aging, but the writer after hearing the symphony for more than 20 times since the first Boston performance, is unable to find any old age indications as yet.

Mr. Koussevitsky has his ideas concerning the "Pathetic" symphony. It was a most profound as well as convincing picture that he put before his audience, although the tempo of the second movement was a little slower than that noticed in previous performances by past conductors. This, however, was a small matter in the general result, which left an impression long to be remembered.

Of the other numbers, Dukas' brilliant 'Sorcerer's Apprentice" was given in a well-nigh ideal manner. Debussy's Faun did not have such a lively

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

NOV 27 1925

Boston

Kosawitsky, who was brought to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 27 1925

Boston Orchestra Opens Brooklyn Season To-night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conducting begins its annual series of five Brooklyn concerts to-night at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The programme includes: "Pathetique" Symphony (Tschaikowsky), Third Brandenburg Concerto (Bach), Prelude to "The Afternoon in the Life of a Faun" (Debussy), "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (Dukas).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Times
Montclair NJ

NOV 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Heard in Unity Course on Wednesday Evening.

If Unity Institute did nothing more than bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town it would have justified its existence by the presentation of that fine band of musicians at the Montclair High School Auditorium on Wednesday night in the Unity concert course. A large audience heard this incomporable orchestra distill the music of four composers into a ravishing two-hour program with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. This is the third time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been heard in Unity course. Two years ago it was directed by Pierre Monteaux and last season it performed here under the aegis of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Wednesday night's concert comprised the works of four composers—Bach, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakow and Brahms. The program opened with the Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra by Bach. There is much of sober beauty in this concerto, and the smooth harmony of the stringed instruments served as a delightful introduction to the more elaborate numbers that comprised the remainder of the program.

In direct contrast to the Bach monotone was the rendition of "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," musical interpretation by Debussy of the Mallarme eclogue. Debussy in this number has undertaken to make intelligible a poem that is described as being a harmonious combination designed to suggest a mood or condition not mentioned in the text and succeeds admirably. The piece is one that employs the wind instruments to good effect, and the dainty pipings of the faun suggest the forest fairy land, the play of sunshine through the trees and the tender, quirky emotions of a creature who is kindred to goddesses and nymphs. It is a wistful, appealing musical poem, and presents Debussy at his best.

Rimsky-Korsakov was represented on the program by the suite from the "Tsar Saltan," which was played with warm feeling and, in some of the passages, with much gusto by the orchestra. The suite is full of contrasts, the martial fan fare of trumpets that opens each movement being succeeded by tenderer motifs which tell of the vicissitudes of the forlorn queen and the maligned prince who [illegible] attains to triumph and glory. Conducting this number, Mr. Koussevitzky displayed a supreme control, the full resources of the band being felicitously evoked in superb climaxes of expression.

However, it was the final number of the evening, the Symphony in C Minor, No. 1, that the conductor demonstrated most impressively the great art of his leadership and the superb musicianship of his band. This Brahms symphony has evoked varying criticisms, and comparisons with the symphonies of other master composers have not always been to the credit of Brahms, but as played on Wednesday night by Mr. Koussevitzky and his band it could not be denied a claim to greatness. Especially impressive were the third and final movements, which were of dazzling beauty, with distinct intonation, despite the complex emotions that the music expressed in the gradual approach to the crashing crescendo that brought the symphony to a close.

Given a good band, any conductor might achieve a triumph in symphonic concertization, but not every leader can take even such an efficient organization as is the Boston Symphony orchestra and achieve the masterful effects that Mr. Koussevitzky produced on Thursday night. He invested every number with the distinction that only a big leaguer can give to the job in hand, and he and his orchestra fully deserved the unstinted applause that was accorded them by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
HERALD

NOV 28 1925

Goossens To Lead Boston Symphony

Striking recognition of the ability of Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has just been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ~~has invited him~~ to conduct three concerts with that famous organization in January. Mr. Goossens has accepted the invitation, given personally by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Goossens had previously accepted an invitation to be guest conductor of the New York Symphony for six concerts and his Boston engagement will immediately follow. The distinction of conducting three of the major orchestras of the country in a matinees, but it was felt that holders of series tickets would gladly acquiesce in the arrangement. The concert of January 21 will be changed to February 11 with the same program. Tickets dated for the former afternoon will be good on the latter date. Formal notification of the change will be mailed to every series subscriber later.

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 28 1925

The Boston Symphony Orchestra that comes here later in the season for the second concert in the Civic Course has been in New York this week, winning fresh plaudies. For example, Olin Downes in the New York Times, writing of the Thanksgiving Day concert says:

> Aside from these reservations the playing of the orchestra was of surprising merit. It is a better body of musicians than it was last season, and it has more brilliancy, precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 28 1925

GOOSENS CONDUCTS IN BOSTON

British Leader Accepts Invitation to Follow Six New York Concerts

Rochester, N. Y., Nov. 28 (AP).—Eugene Goossens, British composer-conductor, who for the third season is directing the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts in January. Mr. Goossens previously had accepted an invitation to be guest conductor of the New York Symphony for six concerts in ~~January~~, and the Boston engagement will follow immediately. The distinction of conducting three of the major orchestras of the country in a single season is an unusual one.

Mr. Goossens will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts. The first will be given in Providence on January 19, and the other two in Boston the same week.

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony

STRAVINSKY'S EXOTIC-LOVELY "NIGHTINGALE"

Trans — Oct 31

A MEMORABLE AFTERNOON AT THE SYMPHONY

The "Rossignol" for Flavorsome, Elusive Qualities—Oriental Shadings in Impeccable Performance — Rimsky and Musorgsky for Tid-Bits—Schumann in Renewed Beauty and Grace

THE same paper which on Thursday evening carried an advance account of the famous novelty that was to be played at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, carried also an account of the passing—more, of the life—of the great leader who twice headed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who first provided the magic that made out of a group of individual players, playing rather well together, that perfect unit for which the term orchestra should be reserved. It was fitting, then, that the memory of that great leader should be honored. And thus the program books that announced the first performance in Boston of Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," contained also the little black-framed insert announcing that "In memory of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1884-1889 and 1898-1906, the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be performed at the beginning of the program." As is the custom in such cases, band and audience stood at the signal of the conductor. Reverently the orchestra played it, with an infinite and haunting tenderness, solemnly, yet without the feeling of undue gloom. The conductor departed. The assemblage sat. The Friday afternoon members of the Symphony family had paid their last formal tribute to the memory of Wilhelm Gericke.

It was a program in which the word "first" was much in evidence. In addition to the first Boston performance of Stravinsky's "Nightingale," there were also first performances in this city of pieces by Rimsky-Korsakov and Musorgsky—from the former "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" out of the opera "Kitesch"; from the latter, Persian Dances out of the opera "Khovántchina." But more, the program contained also Mr. Koussevitzky's first Bostonian adventure with the composer Schumann. His fourth symphony, in D-minor, was the chosen work. Again, as novelties filled the last half of the program, so fmailiar pieces filled the first half—familiar Schumann was preceded by doubly familiar Weber, the Weber of the Overture to "Euryanthe."

The Stravnisky of the Suite, "Le Chant du Rossignol," is in many ways the same as the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre du Printemps"; not for nothing do both date from the same period of the composer's life. There are, of course, the obvious differences, differences due to the two kinds of subject matter. Primordial, life-consuming dances predicate brutal rhythms in "Le Sacre." "The Nightingale" makes equally insistent demands in its own peculiar way. Thus equally well has Stravinsky taken his cue for the underlying ground-mood of his piece about the Nightingale. We are told that the action of the diminutive opera from which sprang this ballet, then this suite, took place in the palace of the Chinese Emperor, which "had been elaborately decorated. The walls and floors, which were of porcelain, shone in the days of a hundred thousand golden lamps." Surely the cue to the underlying mood which binds together the many effects of grotesquerie to be found in this score is discoverable in the words "which were of porcelain." To be sure, of local "Chinese" color (secured by pentatonic scale formulas) there is plenty. But this is incidental just as the song of the Nightingale itself is a thrice-repeated incident. Beneath it all, through it all, at times in the background, at times almost invisible, yet always there is that feeling of "préciosité" whch is the exact counterpart of the porcelain walls. These walls in the story were not always in the foreground of the mind, yet they set the atmosphere for the whole thing; exactly so with the music. If the piece survives it is safe to say it will be because of the fact that Stravinsky has been so hugely successful in bringing into musical captivity, in then setting free, this highly elusive, this finely attenuated mood. Consider: there is scarcely a full fortissimo in the whole piece, from end to end; all the cacophany, all the musical "wise cracks," all the realism—attempted or successful—all the eerieness, all the niaiserie, is steeped in this atmosphere of the (no other word will fit) "precious."

Second only to this wonderful unifying element is the variety of incident, but second most decidedly it is, in spite of all the descriptive comment that has been given to it. What need to go into detail about the noisy bustling preparations for the emperor, the pentatonic Chinese march that marks his entry, the beautiful songs of the nightingale or the quackery of her imitation, the song of the fisherman or the description of the Emperor's anger, or of his tears, the funeral march or the harps' "Good morning"? The admirable and much-quoted Mr Gilman has already done all this. And particularly why at this late date comment on the now known idiom of a piece over a decade old?

As to performance suffice it to say that it left nothing to be desired. If Stravinsky captured an elusive mood, Koussevitzky and a hundred and ten others made it real to their hearers; if he arranged the lines and the colors for the portrayal of the many unusual incidents, they flashed the picture. In a sense very specific, many of the men were soloists—the song passages of the nightingale alone required solo violin as well as solo flute, and some others; even the first contrabassist had his rather grateful solo passage. So that after continued applause, Mr. Koussevitzky, not able to bid the bevy of soloists to rise repeatedly, allowed his outstretched hand to rove past the whole orchestra.

It was clearly the misfortune of Rimsky-Korsakov's and Musorgsky's pieces to be played as novelties on the same program with the "Nightingale." Public interest, concerned with Stravinsky, recognizeed no other new pieces. In themselves these two pieces are but fragmnts taken out of operas. Mr. Koussevitzky has already played from the "Khovántchina" in Boston; "Kitesch" has remained entirely unheard. The title "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" must have aroused suspicion with many a music lover. For the experienced concert-goer knows that "battle music," even from the very best composers, is apt to be somewhat below the usual standard. Any who thought thus must have been agreeably surprised at this concert. For Rimsky did not stoop to the trickery or the realism that spoils such pieces. True, his music is the music of tumult, ascending in long cumulative waves, approaching a magnificent climax, receding therefrom. But it remains within the realm of the purely imaginative, it is recognizedly legitimate program-music. But after Stravinsky's music it seemed especially tame for battle music. In the opera it occurs while the city of Kitesch, hard pressed by the Tartars, is miraculously being lifted into the clouds. When the curtain is raised again after the battle, Kitesch has become for the Tartars the Invisible City, while for the two lovers about whom the opera revolves, it has become the Celestial City.

The Dances of Persian Women from the fourth act of "Khovántchina" are used in the opera merely as distraction for Prince Khovantski, who is seated at a table. They begin slowly, with sensuous languor; they maintain this mood, they rise to a point approaching frenzy, recede again, finally reach greater heights. The hand of Rimsky-Korsakov, who completed Musorgsky's work, is evident in them. They are full of Rimsky's suavity rather than Musorgsky's barbarities. Their Orientalism is that of "Scheherezade." Both pieces apparently lose much from dissociation with the operas to which they belong. One can see that they fit their place admirably. Separate, as self-contained pieces, they—especially the battle scene—are none too significant. Splendor of performance scarcely rescued them.

Again, all the artistry that Mr. Koussevitzky lavished upon Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, could not hide the fact that at times Schumann's inventive power is not equal to the task of filling in a complete symphonic form. All too often do the joints creak, all to often is mere figure repetition substituted for thematic development. No performance can alter this. But there are compensations in the beauty of some of the themes, there were compensations yesterday afternoon in the beauty of Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Indeed, it was to the conductor rather than to the composer that chief honors must go for the pleasures derived from this symphony. With clear intent did he drive his band to provide continuity where Schumann was disjunct. And who can ever forget the mood he established with the chief theme of the Romanza? The program book calls it a "mournful melody," and so it has always seemed. But with Mr. Koussevitzky, playing it very slowly as is often his wont, adjusting its rhythms after his own fashion, it cut far, far more deeply than that. An indescribable pathos, the calm of infinite resignation was in it. So also the original and exhilarating rhythms of parts of the Scherzo were transformed through the power and insight and musical feeling of the conductor. The formal scheme of the whole, new with Schumann who was experimenting in the direction of the symphony in a single movement, stood clearly exposed. The bite of some of the harmonies that must have sounded over-dissonant to the ears of its first hearers, was brought fully into relief. Conductor had given composer every possible service, and more, too.

And at the beginning stood a glorified "Euryanthe." Flashing, tearing rhythms began it; with pomp and circumstance it was brought forth. It rose to the familiar crashing chord with the following cataclysmic strokes of the drum at the point of transition. And here Mr. Koussevitzky avoided one of the most dangerous pitfalls of the work. The second theme, often trivial, more often banal and trite, almost always taken light-heartedly, came forth with touching tenderness and seriousness, a thing of new and living beauty. And the measures of mystification were more uncanny than from many a hand. Again the extremely slow tempo, again the extremely soft pianissimo; but also the form of the conductor, creeping over it all, making the string chords slide all but imperceptibly into each other; all working toward the creation of perfect illusion. Then the final return with all its gorgeousness and splendor redoubled. Mr. Koussevitzky feels deeply what music is intended to mean. His resource often adds to that meaning—almost always without altering its essential content—almost always enforcing it marvellously upon his hearers.

A. H. M.

CHRISTMAS GREETING CARDS
Business and Personal Use
EVERSHARP PENCILS
J. L. Fairbanks & Co.
123 Franklin St. at Federal St.
SWto(R) s 26

HAND MADE SHOES
—artfully built for correct walking and standing
L. F. SMALL, Little Bldg. Boston.
Est. 1886 Beach 2180
Stc(R) s 19

CLIPPING FROM THE NEWS

NOV 20 1925

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The programmes are now announced for the new historical series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given ~~in Symphony~~ Hall on the five Tuesday afternoons of December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2 and April 6 at 3.15.

The series, which should be of particular convenience of residents of outlying districts of Boston, is now mostly sold by subscription. A few season tickets, however, are available. These may be purchased by mail order.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following programme for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the Praeludium to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The following list of composers (most of whom will be represented) will indicate the nature and period of the remaining programmes:—

The second programme—Weber. Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz.

The third programme—Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Franck, Saint-Saens.

The fourth programme—Strauss, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Sibelius, Moussorgsky, Glinka, Grieg.

The fifth programme—Schoenberg. Ravel, Honegger, Bax, MacDowell, Stravinsk.y Prokovieff.

---

years, the "P... Symphony has made its remarkable appeal to music lovers, and today, as ever, it stands alone among works of its kind. There are some who think the work is aging, but the writer after hearing the symphony for more than 20 times since the first Boston performance, is unable to find any old age indications as yet.

Mr. Koussevitsky has his ideas concerning the "Pathetic" symphony. It was a most profound as well as convincing picture that he put before his audience, although the tempo of the second movement was a little slower than that noticed in previous performances by past conductors. This, however, was a small matter in the general result, which left an impression long to be remembered.

Of the other numbers, Dukas' brilliant 'Sorcerer's Apprentice" was given in a well-nigh ideal manner. Debussy's Faun did not have such a lively kowsky), Third Brandenb... certo (Bach), Prelude to "The Afternoon in the Life of a Faun" (Debussy), "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (Dukas).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

NOV 27 1925

Boston

Kosawitsky, who was brought to this country to conduct modern music with the Boston Symphony orchestra, is playing two numbers by Liadow. These pieces have the Russian names "Kikamora" and "Baba Yaga." The Allen theater symphony programs last spring includes one Liadow pieve called "The Enchanted Lake."

THIS CLIPPING FROM Times Montclair NJ

NOV 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Heard in Unity Course on Wednesday Evening.

If Unity Institute did nothing more than bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town it would have justified its existence by the presentation of that fine band of musicians at the Montclair High School Auditorium on Wednesday night in the Unity concert course. A large audience heard this incomparable orchestra distill the music of four composers into a ravishing two-hour program with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. This is the third time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been heard in Unity course. Two years ago it was directed by Pierre Monteaux and last season it performed here under the aegis of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Wednesday night's concert comprised the works of four composers—Bach, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov and Brahms. The program opened with the Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra by Bach. There is much of sober beauty in this concerto, and the smooth harmony of the stringed instruments served as a delightful introduction to the more elaborate numbers that comprised the remainder of the program.

In direct contrast to the Bach monotone was the rendition of "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a musical interpretation by Debussy of the Mallarme eclogue. Debussy in this number has undertaken to make intelligible a poem that is described as being a harmonious combination designed to suggest a mood or condition not mentioned in the text and succeeds admirably. The piece is one that employs the wind instruments to good effect, and the dainty pipings of the faun suggest the forest fairy land, the play of sunshine through the trees and the tender, quirky emotions of a creature who is kindred to goddesses and nymphs. It is a wistful, appealing musical poem, and presents Debussy at his best.

Rimsky-Korsakov was represented on the program by the suite from the "Tsar Saltan," which was played with warm feeling and, in some of the passages, with much gusto by the orchestra. The suite is full of contrasts, the martial fan fare of trumpets that opens each movement being succeeded by tenderer motifs which tell of the vicissitudes of the forlorn queen and the maligned prince who ultimately attains to triumph and glory. Conducting this number, Mr. Koussevitzky displayed a supreme control, the full resources of the band being felicitously evoked in superb climaxes of expression.

However it was the final number of the evening, the Symphony in C Minor, No. 1, that the conductor demonstrated most impressively the great art of his leadership and the superb musicianship of his band. This Brahms symphony has evoked varying criticisms, and comparisons with the symphonies of other master composers have not always been to the credit of Brahms, but as played on Wednesday night by Mr. Koussevitzky and his band it could not be denied a claim to greatness. Especially impressive were the third and final movements, which were of dazzling beauty, with distinct intonation, despite the complex emotions that the music expressed in the gradual approach to the crashing crescendo that brought the symphony to a close.

Given a good band, any conductor might achieve a triumph in symphonic concertization, but not every leader can take even such an efficient organization as is the Boston Symphony orchestra and achieve the masterful effects that Mr. Koussevitzky produced on Thursday night. He invested every number with the distinction that only a big leaguer can give to the job in hand, and he and his orchestra fully deserved the unstinted applause that was accorded them by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
HERALD

NOV 28 1925

Goossens To Lead Boston Symphony

Striking recognition of the ability of Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has just been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ~~has invited him~~ to conduct three concerts with that famous organization in January. Mr. Goossens has accepted the invitation, given personally by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Goossens had previously accepted an invitation to be guest conductor of the New York Symphony for six concerts and his Boston engagement will immediately follow. The distinction of conducting three of the major orchestras of the country in a single season is a most unusual one and demonstrates the place which Mr. Goossens is coming to occupy in American musical circles.

Mr. Goossens will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts. The first will be given at Providence, Tuesday, January 19, and the other two in Boston.

To permit acceptance of the Boston invitation it will be necessary to make a slight change in the schedule of the Rochester Philharmonic matinees, but it was felt that holders of series tickets would gladly acquiesce in the arrangement. The concert of January 21 will be changed to February 11 with the same program. Tickets dated for the former afternoon will be good on the latter date. Formal notification of the change will be mailed to every series subscriber later.

---

season, and it has ... precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, who fills a position that cannot quite be filled—that vacated by Georges Longy—but showed himself last night an admirable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso orchestra, whether or not one always agrees with the conceptions of its virtuoso leader.

Mr. ... conduct the Boston Sympho... Orchestra in three concerts. The first will be given in Providence on January 19, and the other two in Boston the same week.

---

c. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9,
r. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15
ONCERTS BY THE
Oct 31.
HONY
A
nductor
ts in Greater Boston. The Tuesday
nated for concerts
articularly enjoy-
storical sequence.
mportant period,
l music.
and $9, no tax
2, 9 A. M.
mphony Hall.

c. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9,
r. 2, Apr. 6 at 3.15
CONCERTS BY THE
Oct 31.
HONY
A onductor
ts in Greater Bos-
n. The Tuesday
nand for concerts particularly enjoy-
storical sequence.
mportant period,
music.
and $9, no tax
2, 9 A. M.
mphony Hall.

BOSTON EVENING

Symphony

STRAVINSKY'S EXOTIC-LOVELY "NIGHTINGALE"

TRANS — Oct 31

A MEMORABLE AFTERNOON AT THE SYMPHONY

The "Rossignol" for Flavorsome, Elusive Qualities—Oriental Shadings in Impeccable Performance — Rimsky and Musorgsky for Tid-Bits—Schumann in Renewed Beauty and Grace

THE same paper which on Thursday evening carried an advance account of the famous novelty that was to be played at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, carried also an account of the passing—more, of the life—of the great leader who twice headed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who first provided the magic that made out of a group of individual players, playing rather well together, that perfect unit for which the erm orchestra should be reserved. It was fitting, then, that the memory of that great leader should be honored. And thus the program books that announced the first performance in Boston of Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," contained also the little black-framed insert announcing that "In memory of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1884-1889 and 1898-1906, the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be performed at the beginning of the program." As is the custom in such cases, band and audience stood at the signal of the conductor. Reverently the orchestra played it, with an infinite and haunting tenderness, solemnly, yet without the feeling of undue gloom. The conductor departed. The assemblage sat. The Friday afternoon members of the Symphony family had paid their last formal tribute to the memory of Wilhelm Gericke.

It was a program in which the word "first" was much in evidence. In addition to the first Boston performance of Stravinsky's "Nightingale," there were also first performances in this city of pieces by Rimsky-Korsakov and Musorgsky—from the former "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" out of the opera "Kitesch"; from the latter, Persian Dances out of the opera "Khovántchina." But more, the program contained also Mr. Koussevitzky's first Bostonian adventure with the composer Schumann. His fourth symphony, in D-minor, was the chosen work. Again, as novelties filled the last half of the program, so fmailiar pieces filled the first half—familiar Schumann was preceded by doubly familiar Weber, the Weber of the Overture to "Euryanthe."

The Stravnisky of the Suite, "Le Chant du Rossignol," is in many ways the same as the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre du Printemps"; not for nothing do both date from the same period of the composer's life. There are, of course, the obvious differences, differences due to the two kinds of subject matter. Primordial, life-consuming dances predicate brutal rhythms in "Le Sacre." "The Nightingale" makes equally insistent demands in its own peculiar way. Thus equally well has Stravinsky taken his cue for the underlying ground-mood of his piece about the Nightingale. We are told that the action of the diminutive opera from which sprang this ballet, then this suite, took place in the palace of the Chinese Emperor, which "had been elaborately decorated. The walls and floors, which were of porcelain, shone in the days of a hundred thousand golden lamps." Surely the cue to the underlying mood which binds together the many effects of grotesquerie to be found in this score is discoverable in the words "which were of porcelain." To be sure, of local "Chinese" color (secured by pentatonic scale formulas) there is plenty. But this is incidental just as the song of the Nightingale itself is a thrice-repeated incident. Beneath it all, through it all, at times in the background, at times almost invisible, yet always there is that feeling of "préciosité" whch is the exact counterpart of the porcelain walls. These walls in the story were not always in the foreground of the mind, yet they set the atmosphere for the whole thing; exactly so with the music. If the piece survives it is safe to say it will be because of the fact that Stravinsky has been so hugely successful in bringing into musical captivity, in then setting free, this highly elusive, this finely attenuated mood. Consider: there is scarcely a full fortissimo in the whole piece, from end to end; all the cacophany, all the musical "wise cracks," all the realism—attempted or successful—all the eerieness, all the niaiserie, is steeped in this atmosphere of the (no other word will fit) "precious."

Second only to this wonderful unifying element is the variety of incident, but second most decidedly it is, in spite of all the descriptive comment that has been given to it. What need to go into detail about the noisy bustling preparations for the emperor, the pentatonic Chinese march that marks his entry, the beautiful songs of the nightingale or the quackery of her imitation, the song of the fisherman or the description of the Emperor's anger, or of his funeral march or the harps' admirable and tears, the "Good morning"? The much-quoted Mr Gilman has already done all this. And particularly why at this late date comment on the now known idiom of a piece over a decade old?

As to performance suffice it to say that it left nothing to be desired. If Stravinsky captured an elusive mood, Koussevitzky and a hundred and ten others made it real to their hearers; if he arranged the lines and the colors for the portrayal of the many unusual incidents, they flashed the picture. In a sense very specific, many of the men were soloists—the song passages of the nightingale alone required solo violin as well as solo flute, and some others; even the first contrabassist had his rather grateful solo passage. So that after continued applause, Mr. Koussevitzky, not able to bid the bevy of soloists to rise repeatedly, allowed his outstretched hand to rove past the whole orchestra.

It was clearly the misfortune of Rimsky-Korsakov's and Musorgsky's pieces to be played as novelties on the same program with the "Nightingale." Public interest, concerned with Stravinsky, recognizeed no other new pieces. In themselves these two pieces are but fragmnts taken out of operas. Mr. Koussevitzky has already played from the "Khovântchina" in Boston; "Kitesch" has remained entirely unheard. The title "The Battle at Kerjenetzt" must have aroused suspicion with many a music lover. For the experienced concert-goer knows that "battle music," even from the very best composers, is apt to be somewhat below the usual standard. Any who thought thus must have been agreeably surprised at this concert. For Rimsky did not stoop to the trickery or the realism that spoils such pieces. True, his music is the music of tumult, ascending in long cumulative waves, approaching a magnificent climax, receding therefrom. But it remains within the realm of the purely imaginative, it is recognizedly legitimate program-music. But after Stravinsky's music it seemed especially tame for battle music. In the opera it occurs while the city of Kitesch, hard pressed by the Tartars, is miraculously being lifted into the clouds. When the curtain is raised again after the battle, Kitesch has become for the Tartars the Invisible City, while for the two lovers about whom the opera revolves, it has become the Celestial City.

The Dances of Persian Women from the fourth act of "Khovântchina" are used in the opera merely as distraction for Prince Khovantski, who is seated at a table. They begin slowly, with sensuous languor; they maintain this mood, they rise to a point approaching frenzy, recede again, finally reach greater heights. The hand of Rimsky-Korsakov, who completed Musorgsky's work, is evident in them. They are full of Rimsky's suavity rather than Musorgsky's barbarities. Their Orientalism is that of "Scheherezade." Both pieces apparently lose much from dissociation with the operas to which they belong. One can see that they fit their place admirably. Separate, as self-contained pieces, they—especially the battle scene—are none too significant. Splendor of performance scarcely rescued them.

Again, all the artistry that Mr. Koussevitzky lavished upon Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, could not hide the fact that at times Schumann's inventive power is not equal to the task of filling in a complete symphonic form. All too often do the joints creak, all to often is mere figure repetition substituted for thematic development. No performance can alter this. But there are compensations in the beauty of some of the themes, there were compensations yesterday afternoon in the beauty of Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. Indeed, it was to the conductor rather than to the composer that chief honors must go for the pleasures derived from this symphony. With clear intent did he drive his band to provide continuity where Schumann was disjunct. And who can ever forget the mood he established with the chief theme of the Romanza? The program book calls it a "mournful melody," and so it has always seemed. But with Mr. Koussevitzky, playing it very slowly as is often his wont, adjusting its rhythms after his own fashion, it cut far, far more deeply than that. An indescribable pathos, the calm of infinite resignation was in it. So also the original and exhilarating rhythms of parts of the Scherzo were transformed through the power and insight and musical feeling of the conductor. The formal scheme of the whole, new with Schumann who was experimenting in the direction of the symphony in a single movement, stood clearly exposed. The bite of some of the harmonies that must have sounded over-dissonant to the ears of its first hearers, was brought fully into relief. Conductor had given composer every possible service, and more, too.

And at the beginning stood a glorified "Euryanthe." Flashing, tearing rhythms began it; with pomp and circumstance it was brought forth. It rose to the familiar crashing chord with the following cataclysmic strokes of the drum at the point of transition. And here Mr. Koussevitzky avoided one of the most dangerous pitfalls of the work. The second theme, often trivial, more often banal and trite, almost always taken light-heartedly, came forth with touching tenderness and seriousness, a thing of new and living beauty. And the measures of mystification were more uncanny than from many a hand. Again the extremely slow tempo, again the extremely soft pianissimo; but also the form of the conductor, creeping over it all, making the string chords slide all but imperceptibly into each other; all working toward the creation of perfect illusion. Then the final return with all its gorgeousness and splendor redoubled. Mr. Koussevitzky feels deeply what music is intended to mean. His resource often adds to that meaning—almost always without altering its essential content—almost always enforcing it marvellously upon his hearers.

A. H. M.

CHRISTMAS
GREETING CARDS
Business and Personal Use
EVERSHARP PENCILS
J. L. Fairbanks & Co.
123 Franklin St. at Federal St.
SWto(R) s26

HAND MADE SHOES
—artfully built for correct
walking and standing
L. F. SMALL, Little Bldg, Boston.
Est. 1886 Beach 2180
Stc(R) s19

CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS

NOV 20 1925

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The programmes are now announced for the new historical series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given ~~in Symphony~~ Hall on the five Tuesday afternoons of December 1, January 5, February 9, March 2 and April 6 at 3.15.

The series, which should be of particular convenience of residents of outlying districts of Boston, is now mostly sold by subscription. A few season tickets, however, are available. These may be purchased by mail order.

Serge Koussevitzky has made the following programme for the opening concert: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the Praeludium to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

The following list of composers (most of whom will be represented) will indicate the nature and period of the remaining programmes:—

The second programme—Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz.

The third programme—Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Franck, Saint-Saens.

The fourth programme—Strauss, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Sibelius, Moussorgsky, Glinka, Grieg.

The fifth programme—Schoenberg, Ravel, Honegger, Bax, MacDowell, Stravinsky Prokovieff.

---

years, the "F ymphony has made its remarkable appeal to music lovers, and today, as ever, it stands alone among works of its kind. There are some who think the work is aging, but the writer after hearing the symphony for more than 20 times since the first Boston performance, is unable to find any old age indications as yet.

Mr. Koussevitsky has his ideas concerning the "Pathetic" symphony. It was a most profound as well as convincing picture that he put before his audience, although the tempo of the second movement was a little slower than that noticed in previous performances by past conductors. This, however, was a small matter in the general result, which left an impression long to be remembered.

Of the other numbers, Dukas' brilliant 'Sorcerer's Apprentice" was given in a well-nigh ideal manner. Debussy's Faun did not have such a lively afternoon after all, and while this work gives general pleasure nowadays, it does not impress one like the "sea pieces" in which one has always felt that Debussy did his best work. The "Euryanthe" overture, always popular, proved an acceptable first number to a most interesting program, probably one of the best that will be given this season.

The third concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, December 3rd.

H. J. Storer.

kowsky), Third Brandenburg concerto (Bach), Prelude to "The Afternoon in the Life of a Faun" (Debussy), "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (Dukas).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Times
Montclair NJ

NOV 28 1925

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Heard in Unity Course on Wednesday Evening.

If Unity Institute did nothing more than bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town it would have justified its existence by the presentation of that fine band of musicians at the Montclair High School Auditorium on Wednesday night in the Unity concert course. A large audience heard this incomporable orchestra distill the music of four composers into a ravishing two-hour program with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. This is the third time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been heard in Unity course. Two years ago it was directed by Pierre Monteaux and last season it performed here under the aegis of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Wednesday night's concert comprised the works of four composers—Bach, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov and Brahms. The program opened with the Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra by Bach. There is much of sober beauty in this concerto, and the smooth harmony of the stringed instruments served as a delightful introduction to the more elaborate numbers that comprised the remainder of the program.

In direct contrast to the Bach monotone was the rendition of "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," musical interpretation by Debussy of the Mallarme eclogue. Debussy in this number has undertaken to make intelligible a poem that is described as being a harmonious combination designed to suggest a mood or condition not mentioned in the text and succeeds admirably. The piece is one that employs the wind instruments to good effect, and the dainty pipings of the faun suggest the forest fairy land, the play of sunshine through the trees and the tender, quirky emotions of a creature who is kindred to goddesses and nymphs. It is a wistful, appealing musical poem, and presents Debussy at his best.

Rimsky-Korsakov was represented on the program by the suite from the "Tsar Saltan," which was played with warm feeling and, in some of the passages, with much gusto by the orchestra. The suite is full of contrasts, the martial fan fare of trumpets that opens each movement being succeeded by tenderer motifs which tell of the vicissitudes of the forlorn queen and the maligned prince who [illegible]ately attains to triumph and glory. Conducting this number, Mr. Koussevitzky displayed a supreme control, the full resources of the band being felicitously evoked in superb climaxes of expression.

However it was the final number of the evening, the Symphony in C Minor, No. 1, that the conductor demonstrated most impressively the great art of his leadership and the superb musicianship of his band. This Brahms symphony has evoked varying criticisms, and comparisons with the symphonies of other master composers have not always been to the credit of Brahms, but as played on Wednesday night by Mr. Koussevitzky and his band it could not be denied a claim to greatness. Especially impressive were the third and final movements, which were of dazzling beauty, with distinct intonation, despite the complex emotions that the music expressed in the gradual approach to the crashing crescendo that brought the symphony to a close.

Given a good band, any conductor might achieve a triumph in symphonic concertization, but not every leader can take even such an efficient organization as is the Boston Symphony orchestra and achieve the masterful effects that Mr. Koussevitzky produced on Thursday night. He invested every number with the distinction that only a big leaguer can give to the job in hand, and he and his orchestra fully deserved the unstinted applause that was accorded them by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
HERALD

NOV 28 1925

Goossens To Lead Boston Symphony

Striking recognition of the ability of Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has just been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ~~has invited him~~ to conduct three concerts with that famous organization in January. Mr. Goossens has accepted the invitation, given personally by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Goossens had previously accepted an invitation to be guest conductor of the New York Symphony for six concerts and his Boston engagement will immediately follow. The distinction of conducting three of the major orchestras of the country in a single season is a most unusual one and demonstrates the place which Mr. Goossens is coming to occupy in American musical circles.

Mr. Goossens will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts. The first will be given at Providence, Tuesday, January 19, and the other two in Boston.

To permit acceptance of the Boston invitation it will be necessary to make a slight change in the schedule of the Rochester Philharmonic matinees, but it was felt that holders of series tickets would gladly acquiesce in the arrangement. The concert of January 21 will be changed to February 11 with the same program. Tickets dated for the former afternoon will be good on the latter date. Formal notification of the change will be mailed to every series subscriber later.

---

season,

precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, who fills a position that cannot quite be filled—that vacated by Georges Longy—but showed himself last night an admirable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso orchestra, whether or not one always agrees with the conceptions of its virtuoso leader.

t
In ac
to con gag distin major season

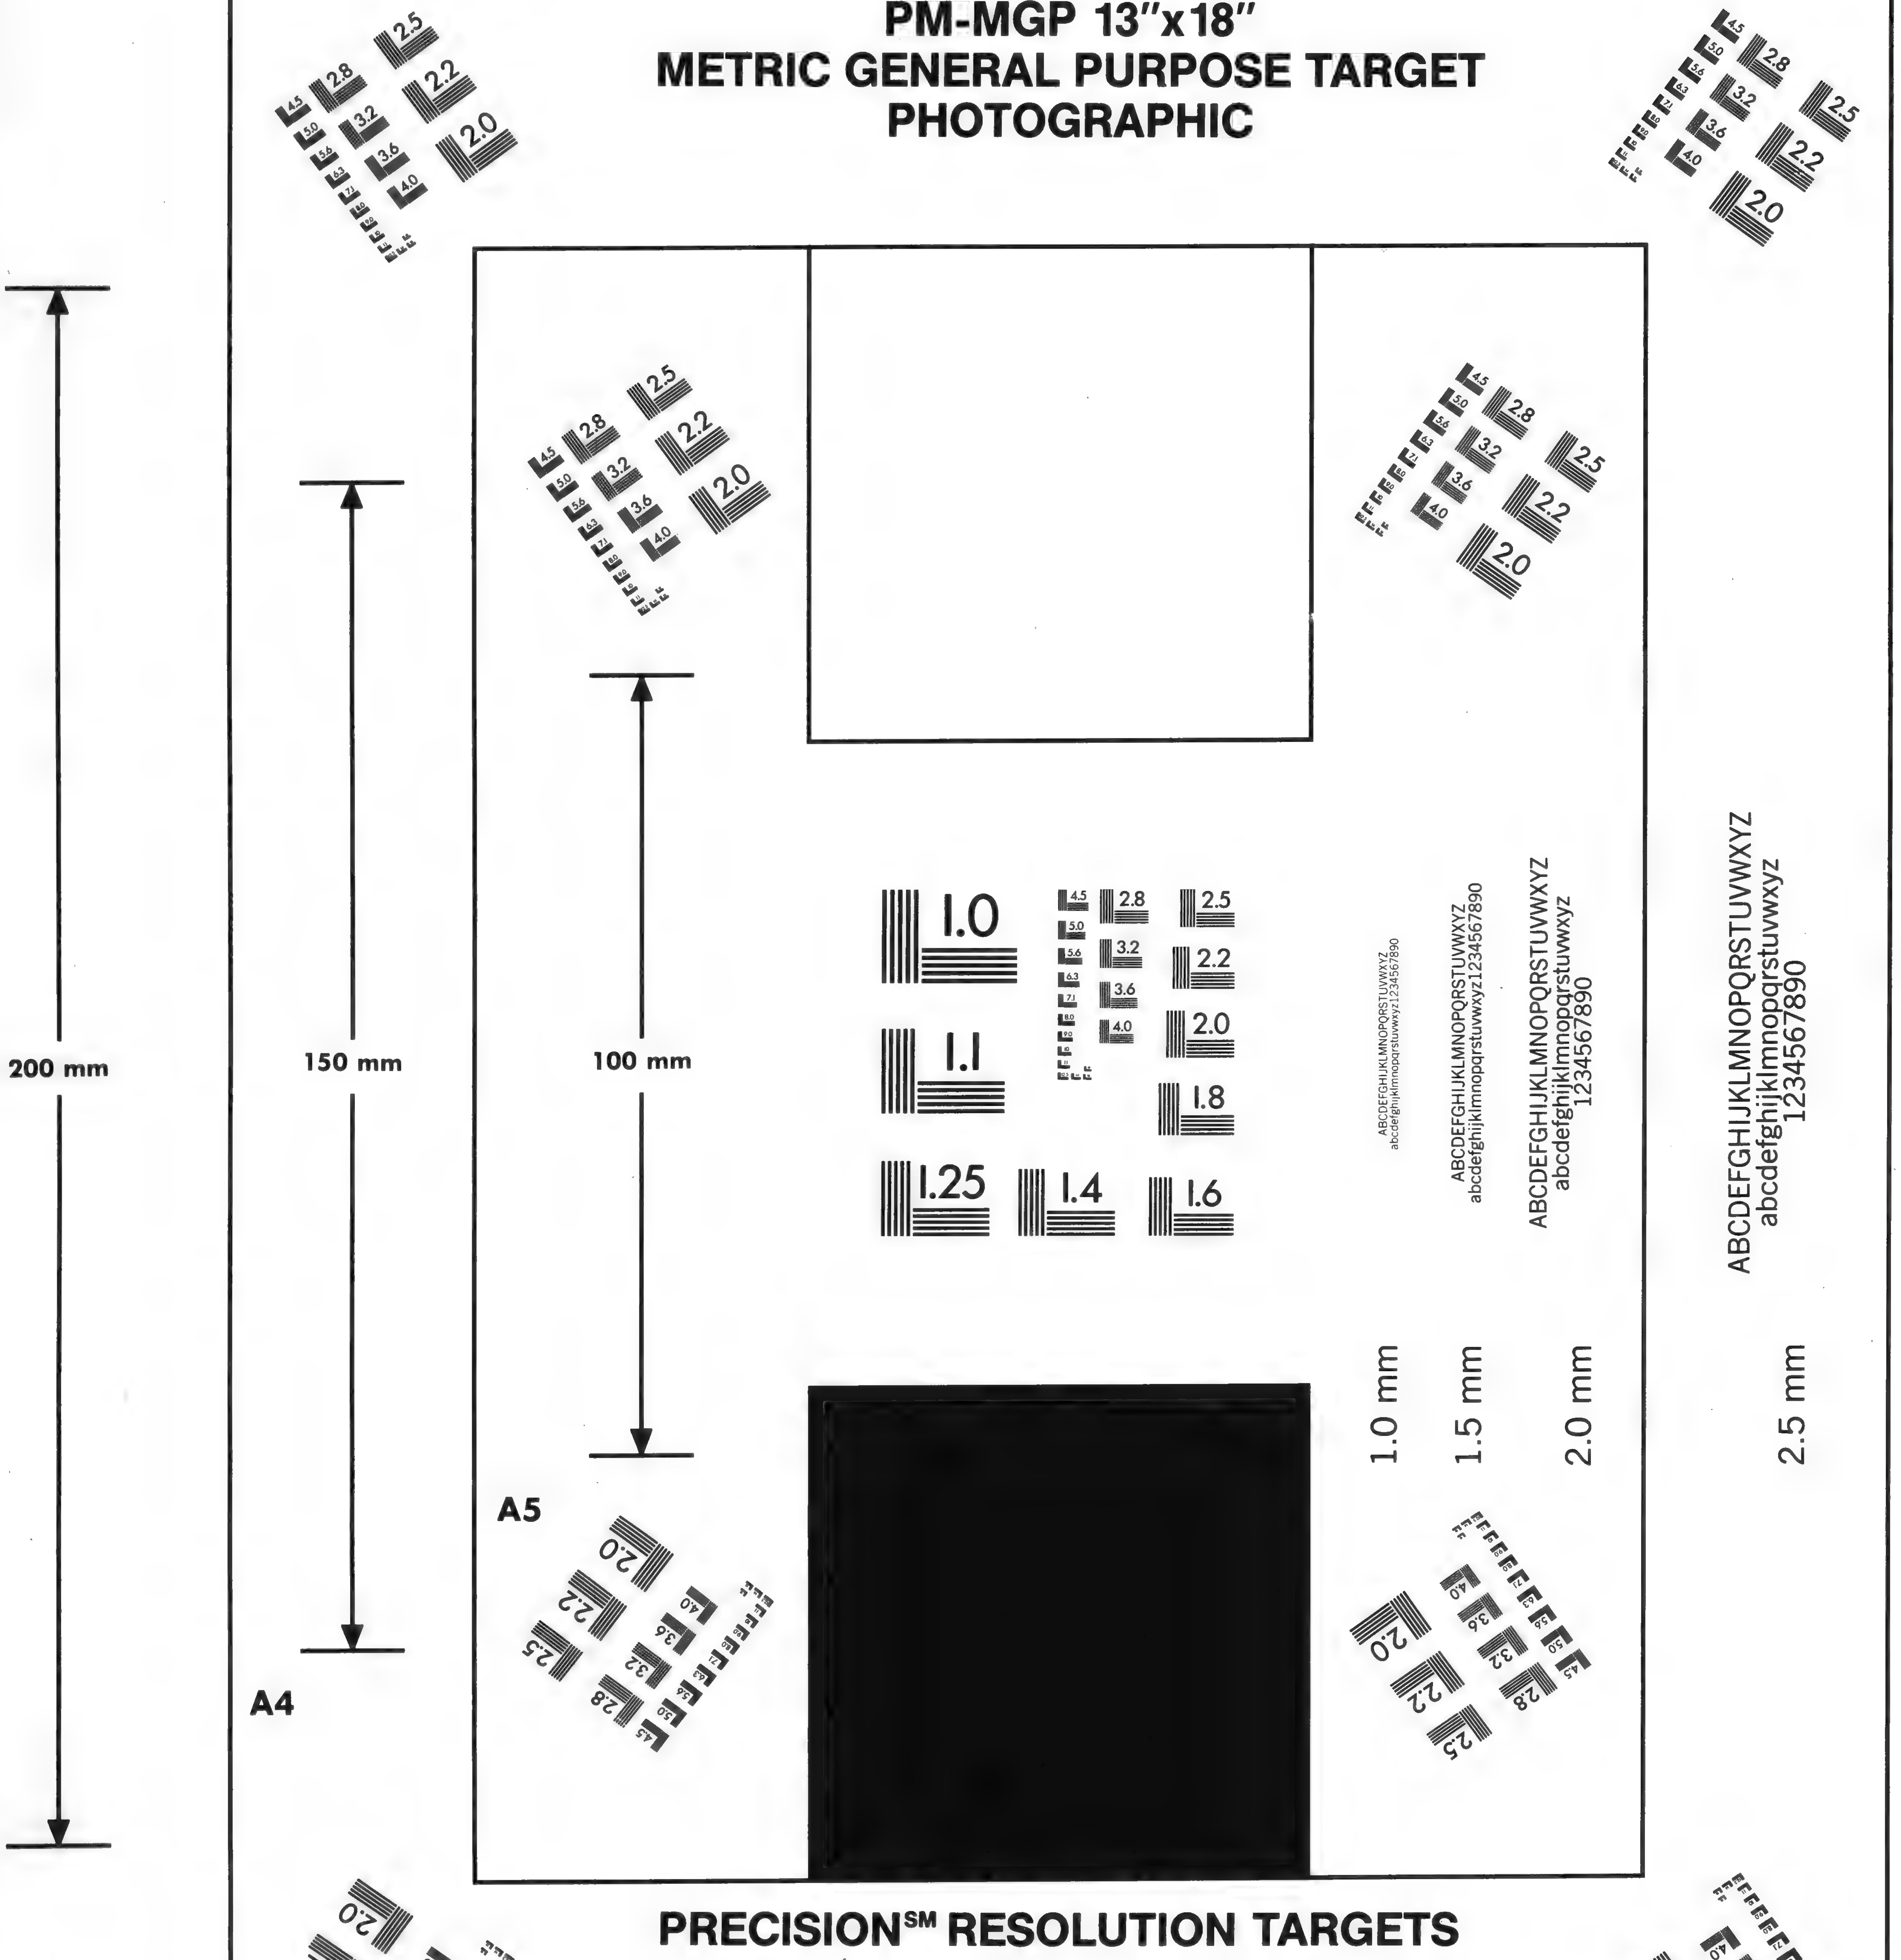
Mr. conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts. The first will be given in Providence on January 19, and the other two in Boston the same week.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
2.0
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Mr. Koussevitzky will bring out this week Tansman's Sinfonietta for a small orchestra. It will be the first performance in this country. Tansman is a Pole who has for some years made Paris his home.

Satie's piano pieces, "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, are on the program for the first time at these concerts. The Gymnopaedia was an annual festival of Sparta. Naked youths danced in honor of Apollo, Artemis and Leto, in memory of the Spartan victory over the Argives. The festival lasted several days. There were choral dances, wrestling matches, gymnastic exercises; noble deeds performed by the youths were celebrated in songs. Debussy orchestrated two of Satie's three pieces composed originally for the piano. They have been heard in Boston.

Satie, who died last July, was a singular apparition in the musical world, yet not without influence on Debussy and Ravel. He was first of all an ironist in life and speech. It may be questioned whether, strictly speaking, there can be any such thing as "ironic music." He gave strange titles to some of his earlier compositions: "Three Pieces in the Form of a Pear"; "Airs to make you run"; "The Dreamy Fish." He gave printed directions for the pianist to play "on yellow velvet, dry as a cuckoo, light as an egg," "in the most profound silence," "with hands in the pockets," "like a nightingale with the toothache." What is to be said of "This is the chase of a lobster; the hunters descend to the bottom of the water. They run. The sound of a horn is heard at the bottom of the sea. The lobster is tracked, the lobster weeps"?

But Satie was more than a mad humorist. He had decided talent, however some may think he abused it. He anticipated Debussy when the latter was still under the spell of Massenet. He was always poor and needy. He said not long before his death that 30 years before he was "terribly Impressionist . . . once even I was a humorist. Now I've given it up. It's too ugly. In life one must be serious." Among his later works were "Parade," "Relache" and, what is considered to be his chief work, "Socrates," a symphonic drama for voice and orchestra, based on Plato's dialogues. The irrepressible Jean Cocteau admired him greatly. It is said that the two were at work on an opera, "Paul and Virginia."

In short," once said Cocteau, "his music is a French music, a music so clear and delicate that one thinks one hears a phrase of Nietzsche: 'The ideas which change the face of things come as gently as doves.'"

P. H.

Herald Nov 8

First Symphony Programme Here

Journal. Prov. Nov 8.

Tchaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetique" is the principal number on the programme of the opening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, the 17th. This is the first of the series of five Providence concerts.

The Russian conductor will also present Debussy's symphonic tableau, "The Afternoon of a Faun." The programme will open with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." It will be further enlivened by a French number, Dukas's fantastical scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after the ballad of Goethe.

Single tickets for the first concert, if there are any left at the conclusion of the season sale, will be available beginning Saturday morning.

The Providence Public Library has in its music collection the numbers on the programme of the first concert by the Boston Symphony. It has Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," arranged for piano solo, four hands and eight hands, as well as the full score of the opera itself. Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," is arranged as a piano solo.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trav Nov 7

Tickets are still available for the second performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in aid of its pension fund, on Monday evening, Nov. 23. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the full orchestra and will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists.

Season tickets are still on sale for the historical series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts, to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall.

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will include Tansman's "Sinfonietta," Satie's "Gymnopedies," Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

NINTH SYMPHONY

Adv Nov 8

A few seats are left for the second performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place on Monday evening, November 23. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists.

NEW TUSEDAY SYMPHONY SERIES

Advertiser Nov 9

A few seats still remain for the new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open December 1. Serge Koussevitzky will arrange programs in chronological order, illustrating the development of symphonic music.

REPEAT 9TH SYMPHONY

A few seats are still available for the second performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, for the benefit of its pension fund. This second performance will take place on Monday evening, Nov. 23. All seats for the preceeding Sunday afternoon performance are taken. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a quartet of soloists.

Herald Nov 8

NEW SYMPHONY SERIES

Although a great number of seats have been taken, a few still remain for the pending new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. These concerts will be given on the following afternoons at 3:30: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 9, March 2, and April 6. Mr. Koussevitzky will arrange the programmes in chronological order, thus setting forth the various periods in the development of symphonic music.

Herald Nov 8

N.Y. Times.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky introduced two compositions new to this city, a "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of these works, indeed of the program as a whole, the orchestra gave the most brilliant performances that it has given here under its present conductorship.

Some of the music appeared to be chosen for virtuoso purposes and little else. There was a sound and safe beginning with the G major "Brandenburg" concerto of J. S. Bach, played ulstily and with a very brilliant sonorous tone by the strings. But the works upon which Mr. Koussevitsky trained his whole arsenal of effects were the aforesaid novelties and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The novelties proved of uneven value, though they conspicuously displayed the capacities of the orchestra. In the symphony the conductor showed by turns his fiery temperament and re-creative power and his passion for effect at any cost, whether or not this reacted to the benefit of the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt and dreamed, in the Far East. When he writes music suggested by Eastern impressions or age-old legends it is not with the purpose of showing how jolly Eastern he can be. He has lived that of which he speaks, and he has a particular gift of transcribing it. Whether the listener comes from Oshkosh or Jersey City the music has the right feel; there is no doubt that it is a genuine artistic result of first-hand contacts. And so with that heard last night—a score with evident dificiencies, but one genuinely expressive of the legends and spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from about the year 600, is that of the two Generals, enemies who fight until one is killed. The survivor faces his victim's widow, who is armed and determined upon revenge. The two join battle, only to realize that they love each other. At last, for honor's sake, they take death into their own hands. This story formed the basis of a ballet, "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Legend," performed with Mr. Eichheim's music, last January at the Eighth Street Theatre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim himself, whose works are quoted in the invaluable program notes of Philip Hale, that "the music of the drama begins with Chinese ceremonial music written by a Chinese Emperor about the year 700 A. D. in memory of a slain and beloved General." Thereafter is the thought of the fight, the voice of the young widow mourning, the beginnings of love between the pair, and the other principal phases of the story. It is a pity that, lacking the stage action, the music is too long and has no clear or well-balanced form; too bad, because this is among the most interesting music Mr. Eichheim has produced. It principally requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are often unprecedented and are wholly of the distant land of his legend. The music feels Chinese—as Chinese as a golden dragon or a pair of warriors fighting on a fan. There are sounds unprecedented in the orchestral repertory; there is genuine drama, expressed in musical terms that are not of the West. Only at the last is seen suddenly the cloven hoof of Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere is the consciousness of a composer who has really bridged the gap between oriental and occidental consciousness by means of translating the beauty created by one people into a message articulate and intelligible to the other.

This work should be cut and revised. It is eminently deserving of this, for it has material that should not be forgotten. The audience liked Mr. Eichheim's music, long, cut-up, superfluous as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. These places suggest characteristic rhythms and melodic turns utilized by the composer. And there one stops, with perhaps a single remark: that Mr. Ibert knows very well the art of instrumentation, and Mr. Koussevilsky the art of orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pieces and the everplayed symphony of Tchaikovsky emphasized the inalienable greatness of the Russian. Tchaikovsky is heard too often, but what a remarkable artist he is! His music is never less than flesh and blood, than poignant memories, intense feeling, the madness of despair, the resignation of the grave. The march is surely the wildest in symphonic literature. The symphony, no matter how overplayed or maltreated, is a work that commands admiration for its reckless sincerity and its musical inspiration. Tchaikovsky was not a little composer. Last night, it is true, he suffered frequently from the virtuosity and the officiousness of Mr. Koussevitsky.

The second theme of the first movement is sentimental enough without being dragged as it was. The same thing is true of the trio of the second movement—the passage with the recurrent drum-beat. It was anticipated that having taken the greater part of these two movements too slowly Mr. Koussevitsky would play the march very fast, which he did—so very fast that it was impossible for the superb orchestra to play it cleanly. There are rights that an individual interpreter may be expected to assume. The performance, however, went past this point. It emphasized some rather wanton eccentricities of Koussevitsky, and proved at the same time that Tchaikovsky is incontrovertibly a great composer.

Aside from these reservations the playing of the orchestra was of surprising merit. It is a better body of musicians than it was last season, and it has more brilliancy, precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, who fills a position that cannot quite be filled—that vacated by Georges Longy—but showed himself last night an admirable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso orchestra, whether or not one always agrees with the conceptions of its virtuoso leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
GRAPHIC

NOV 2 7 1925

People In MUSIC

By C MAJOR

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

When Serge Koussevitzky included the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" Symphony with two new tone poems last night in his program for the first of the Boston Symphony appearances for its forty-first New York season it might have been merely to satisfy those who demand a standard work at their concerts, but it proved to be a rediscovery of the Tchaikovsky score.

The familiar strains of the Sixth Symphony took on new meaning. They long have been favorites with American audiences, but seldom have they been so superbly played as they were last night. Koussevitzky carried his orchestra through the lighter second movement with grace and charm, led it on to a climax of energy and force in the third with equal skill, and then in the last movement brought out the tragic hopelessness which has given this symphony its name. Conductor and orchestra seemed merged into one being.

The two new offerings which Koussevitzky brought down from Boston were Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" and Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call). Each has the color of distant ports, and the Eichheim piece has that of a distant century. It is based on the story of a handsome general of 600 A. D. who kills an ugly general, and of the attempt which the murdered man's wife makes to reap her revenge, hampered by a sudden and unexpected attraction to the handsome general. The clash of their swords is interrupted by the discovery of their love, and, in the end, she kills herself with his spear, while he cuts his throat with her sword, and they die in each other's arms. Buddhist cymbals, temple bells and her lamentations are set off against the shrieking of the strings in the battle scenes.

"Escales" has some delightful moments, especially in the second movement, when the boat has called at Tunis-Nefta and the sound of African dances rises above the distant drumbeats. It was not necessary to label this movement tres rythme. There was no question about its light lilting and its mournful gayety. Sentimentality and the calm seas of southern Italy make up the first movement and the whirl of Spanish tarantellas the third. Both in this and in the "Pathetique" was the artistry of a restrained kettledrum ably demonstrated. Never once did this instrument intrude itself upon the ear, and yet its importance to the mood of the pieces was never doubted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 8 1925

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

FIRST Brooklyn concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky, conductor. Program: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G major; Debussy, Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune; Dukas, L'Apprenti Sorcier; Tschaikowsky, Sixth Symphony. At the Academy of Music, last evening.

* * *

IT was Virgil Thompson, I believe, who recently enlisted readers of the New Republic against the prima-donna conductor. I confess to having read not Mr. Thompson's piece but only its reaction upon the conscience of Samuel Chotzinoff, as expressed through the columns of the World. Mr. Thompson made a plea for less interpretation on the part of our fashionable conductors; Mr. Chotzinoff parried him with the statement that it is impossible to project a musical work from the printed page without interpretating it. Mr. Thompson opposed conducting for conducting's sake against conducting for art's sake; Mr. Chotzinoff affirmed, by inference, that you could not do one without doing the other. And there the matter rested.

One of the causes, direct or indirect, of this mimic controversy was Mr. Koussewitsky, the brilliant leader of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Koussewitsky more than any other conductor has glorified the prima-donna tradition. Not necessarily through any act of his own, but rather through the brass-band introduction to America arranged for him by the worthy directors of his orchestra. When Mr. Koussewitsky came to us from his Parisian haunts it was very much like the advent of an army with banners. The unsophisticated imagined him as anything from an ex-Tsar of Russia or an Emir of Persia to a pretender for Mr. Dempsey's title. But he disappointingly turned out to be a mere orchestral conductor.

Now that he is with us for a second year some of the glamour surrounding his personality has been dissipated. We no longer suspect in him the principal figure of an international romance temporarily courting oblivion as a musician in this dim corner of the world. Even if we wished to cling to such an illusion it is doubtful he would allow us to do so. Never was there a conductor more obviously a conductor.

* * *

ALL the music which Mr. Koussewitsky conducted at the Academy of Music last evening was familiar. None of it, however, had been played by him on the occasion of any previous visit to Brooklyn. That thrice-told tale of graveyard passions, the "Pathetic" Symphony, that most delicate of tonal aphrodisiacs, the "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune," the celebrated orchestral scherzo of M. Paul Dukas and the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach made up the complete list. The orchestra, I may note before I pass again to its director, played for the most part superbly. In the first movement only of the Tschaikowsky the string tone was noticeably marred by a persistent rasping of bows against strings—a defect due either to acoustics or to an attack more vigorous than necessary.

* * *

151

G FROM
N. Y.
LE

V 2 8 1925

E DAY

ING

cert of the oston Sym-
Serge Kous-~~Program~~: ncerto for ssy, Prelude ne; Dukas, chaikowsky,
Academy of n, I believe, readers of the prima-confess to Thompson's

on upon the Chotzinoff, columns of on made a on the part uctors; Mr.
with the possible to
from the terpretating conducting gainst con-
. Chotzinoff
t you could
g the other.
ted.
rect or inditroversy was he brilliant phony. Mr.
any other
the primanecessarily his own, but
-band introrranged for ectors of his Koussewitsky risian haunts the advent of
The unso-
im as anything
Russia or an pretender for
But he disap-
o be a mere

for a second our surround-been dissi-uspect in him
f an interna-rarily courting
ian in this dim
d. Even if we ch an illusion it allow us to do a conductor
ductor.

ich Mr. Kousse-ted at the Acad-evening was fat, however, had on the occasion
to Brooklyn.
le of graveyard
etic" Symphony.
l aphrodisl'apres-midi
ted orches-
Dukas and Concerto of ete list. The fore I pass yed for the in the first chaikowsky
noticeably rasping of defect due to an attack
essary.

Boston Symphony's 40th Season

Eichheim's 'A Chinese Legend' and Ibert's 'Escales' Included in Concert Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orch
in New York with the concert Hall. The program consisted concerto, Henry Eichheim's Ibert's "Escales" and the in Tschaikowsky. The second an this town.

Mr. Eichheim, an American, is not unknown to local concertgoers, who have made acquaintance with his talent and his inclination for eastern ideas. The work heard last evening was originally a ballet produced by the Bolm Ballet Intime in Chicago last January. There is a singularly interesting and dramatic story at the base of the music. The handsomest general in China slew the ugliest in combat. Immediately the wife of the ugly one, the most beautiful and popular woman in China, appeared on the scene, took up her dead husband's spear and fought the slayer.

They fought one another to a standstill and agreed to resume hostilities after a rest and the dead man's funeral. Beginning the fight again, they looked into each other's eyes and saw the light that never was on land or sea. Then the woman pushed the spear into her own breast and the general drew the sword across his throat. And they died in ecstatic embrace.

That is musical material of the first order. No composer could ask for anything better, and Mr. Eichheim has used his opportunities to excellent advantage. The music has sharply defined character, great opulence of color and graphic value. It is obviously episodic and asks plainly for the illustrative ballet of action. But it is none the less a brilliant and effective orchestral piece, in which melodies of Chinese contour, harmonies exotic and gorgeously modern, and splendors of orchestral sonority unite in producing an artistic result. Mr. Eichheim has added another to his list of Oriental impressions and one that promises to make the orchestral rounds of the country.

M. Ibert was born in 1890 in Paris and is still living there. His "Escales" ("Ports of Call") are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. Of course one expects local color mixed on the modern palette and one is not disappointed. In Palermo the hearer is reminded of Lola and Turiddu, though for the moment they seem to be wandering in citron groves. In Tunis one hears the pipe of the Mediterranean boatmen, which has strange memories of the moaning of the desert and the Muezzin's florid call to the faithful. And in Valencia one hears las malaguenas and the bolero and all the other familiars of King Alfonso's realm. At any rate one at last realizes the true purpose of Spain. It is for composers of other countries to steal tunes from.

M. Ibert's composition is not important. It is well orchestrated, but it would have sounded more ingenious if it had not followed the American's made.
mans
The umpin y—it g of con-the
ing.
rity
and con-abtar-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 2 7 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Two Novelties

INTERESTING rather than inspired are the two compositions which Koussevitsky sprang on this city at the season's opening concert of the Boston Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall. The first of the two novelties is about as new as anything can be, having had its initial performance at Chicago, its composer's birthplace, on New Year's Day of the present year. The piece is entitled "A Chinese Legend," and a parenthetical subtitle intimates that it goes back to 600 A. D., which is extremely modern for anything belonging to China.

The "Legend" is the work of Henry Eichheim, who shows what a native American can do with an Oriental theme. The music is thoroughly "programmed," being intended to represent the varying phases of a couple of duels and a violent love affair. The first duel is between the handsomest man and the ugliest man in the history of China—by an interesting coincidence they lived at the same time. The handsomest man triumphs, but the widow of his slain rival takes up the quarrel. The second duel does not get far, however, before the eyes of the two combatants meet. Thereafter, although they do their best to feel as deadly foes ought to feel, they are unable to fight effectively, and the strange combat ends by the lady seizing her opponent's spear and plunging it into her heart and the gentleman tearing the sword from her hands and passing it across his throat. They die in each other's arms in an ecstasy of passion.

Mr. Eichheim has dealt skillfully with the unusual musical requirements of this tragedy, but the result is rather a tour de force than a masterpiece. Echoes of the ceremonial music in memory of a beloved general, with which the composition opens, are heard at appropriate points throughout the piece and there are moments of the kind of music which is welcome to Occidental ears, but there is also a good deal of the uproar which the Occidental regards as the chief characteristic of Chinese melody. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with his usual finesse and brought out the meaning of the score with due impressiveness.

The second of the evening's novelties was rather more pleasing. This was Jacques Ibert's "Escales," first performed in Paris in January, 1924. The "ports of call" celebrated in the piece are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. The music varies from a limpid smoothness to a pulsating animation. It is distinctly appealing and was received with an enthusiasm which brought the members of the orchestra to their feet to share formally in the plaudits. Both these novelties made use of instruments not ordinarily called on to any great extent. The "Chinese Legend" required numerous small cymbals, gongs and other sound-producing devices, while the "Escales" demanded castanets and the tomtom.

The opening number was Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra. By comparison with the closing number this piece fared little better than the two novelties, but this is not surprising, for that closing number was Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. It was superbly played, as need not be said. An interesting, well-balanced program rendered after the Boston manner—what more could an audience ask for the beginning of this orchestra's forty-fifth season?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 2 7 1925

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

If ultra-modern music is to be played at symphonic concerts, and there can be no advancement unless encouragement is given to the experimenters and the tonal pioneers, I, for one, would like to have all of it conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Last night Mr. Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall for their first concert here this season. Two novelties were offered, the first an American work, Henry Eichelm's "A Chinese Legend," and the second a Parisian suite by Jacques Ibert called "Ports of Call." The Eichelm legend is an imperfect but interesting composition, full of enticing Oriental rhythms and orchestral color. The Ibert suite pictures in musical terms impressions of three Mediterranean ports, Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. It is music of real distinction, not very revolutionary, but pleasantly dissonant. As descriptive music, the three sketches are not notable, but the orchestration is admirable and the themes have been handled with great skill. Both works were superbly played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

NOV 2 7 1925

Boston Exports New Music.

"A Chinese Legend" by Henry Eichheim and "Ports of Call" by Jacques Ibert were introduced to New York at the season's first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. As bearer of musical tidings from the Far East Mr. Eichheim has done better by us than in this "Legend." Still, it was composed for a ballet which Adolf Bolm produced in Chicago on New Year's Day of this year, and doubtless fares more bravely when danced and mimed than when not. Yesterday it made a loud and Mongol noise in the land without proving otherwise particularly impressive. The story of the ballet might be that of Morold, Tristan and Isolde, had Isolde accepted the proffered sword and she and Tristan, despite discrepancy of sex, forthwith engaged in duel to the death.

Jacques Ibert is one of the younger composers of France whose music has not been exploited here. His "Ports of Call" are three. The first, Palermo, impressed him astonishingly little, and he takes a long time to tell us of his insensibility. Tunis-Nefta was more obliging. Mainly a wail for oboe (the solo was played admirably by F. Gillet, who has succeeded the illustrious Longy as first oboe of the Boston orchestra), this movement is interesting because of its unusual rhythm and its color.

The finale, a Spanish rhapsody relating to Valencia, is decidely the most effective of the three. Though by no means the best Spanish music composed out of Spain, it is good enough to demonstrate anew that the best Spanish music has not so far been composed in Spain. Ibert is evidently no revolutionary, no seeker after beauty or ugliness in unexplored thickets of poly-this-or-that, and so his compositions are scarce likely to figure on programs offered us by leagues or guilds. Nevertheless, one surmises from last night's exhibit that more of him might be heard with pleasure.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with a lively and respectable performance of Bach's third "Brandenburg" concerto. He closed it with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Nobody but a conductor from the land of vodka would dream of imposing that harrowing opus as postlude to Thanksgiving dinner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 2 9 1925

OTHER MUSIC

The Army-Navy production at the Polo Grounds yesterday afternoon did not interfere seriously with the year's first "Meistersinger" at the Polo Grounds on Broadway at 40th Street, for this merriest of grand operas proved to be a Red Grange in drawing power. The artists apparently had partaken not too well but wisely of Thanksgiving delicacies, for all sang with clarity of voice and acted in holiday humor. Elizabeth Rethberg was "Eva," Clarence Whitehill "Hans Sachs," Rudolph Laubenthal "Walther," George Meader "David," Gustav Schuetzendorf "Beekmesser," Marion Telva "Magdalene," Paul Bender "Pogner," and there was a list of secondary principals longer than you could shake a stick at. The stick-shaking, by the way, was done with musclanship and energy by Artur Bodanzky.

In honor of the day's football game the apprentices in the second act street-brawl performed a few flying tackles which may not have been in the Nuremberg University rule book but which broght down their man and the house to boot, as it were.

Three symphony orchestras gave concerts in New York yesterday. The Boston Symphony, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, played in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, presenting a program akin to that which was favorably received Thanksgiving evening. The tra gave one concerts in Ca while in the Symphony ga
dren

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

NOV 3 0 1925

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

The Russians had their innings at the Boston Symphony Orchestra program in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, the work of a student and his master delighting the large audience up to time for the symphony, when Mr. Koussevitzky switched to Brahms, giving the First, which he read nobly and which was played most admirably.

Liadow in two moods opened the afternoon, the first composition being a fragment from the large work of his later days, "The Apocalypse," which did not succeed in being so apocalyptic as his writer hoped it would be, although it has its stirring moments, and was played with great spirit. This was followed by a better known composition of his, "Kikimora," properly called a "fairy folk tale," and a charming piece done in a manner that was a credit to both conductor and orchestra.

Liadow's master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, contributed the next selection, which was that most gorgeously colorful suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," a work that imposes a severe test upon an orchestra with its frequent climaxes and terrific blasts of sound that threaten the very rafters. Mr. Koussevitzky kept every drop of the color and all the melodic pattern as well, and one had an excellent illustration in this number of just how far the work of individual players and the ensemble of the Boston orchestra has progressed recently.

Last season, there were Koussevitzky concerts that left nothing to be asked and others that were frankly disappointing; he took over an orchestra which Pierre Monteux had started on the up-grade, and judging by Saturday's performance, it is firmly fixed now at the top.

The Brahms wiped out whatever doubt of that fact there might have remained in one's mind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 2 9 1925

Koussevitzky Puts His Own Ideas Into Brahms Symphony

Boston Conductor at First Matinee in Carnegie Hall Wins Friends by Independence in Interpretations

Yesterday's first Boston Symphony matinee of the current season at Carnegie Hall was made noteworthy by Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Brahms's C minor Symphony, in which he had not before been heard here.

Mr. Koussevitzky has his own ideas concerning the interpretation of this symphony, as it is right that he should have. If he chooses to speed up or slacken the pace of the music in places where it had not occurred to Brahms to indicate such alterations of tempi, he does so. If he chooses to readjust Brahms's orchestral color scheme, he does so. And other modifications that evidently seem good to him he puts frankly into effect.

Doubtless there were stern symphonic detectives who followed Mr. Koussevitzky's performance with a metronome, stop watch and flashlight; and doubtless, if they were academically minded, they were not wholly content. But there were others in Carnegie Hall who relished this strongly individualized reading. They liked Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive phrasing at the end of the Andante, which was poetic without being sentimental. They liked his impressive conception of the slow introduction to the Finale; they were grateful to him for giving due weight and gravity to the magnificent chorale passage in the coda (even though his tempo here was not in accordance with the score). Above all, they liked Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony because it was untrammeled and alive. Not all of this conductor's floutings of tradition are persuasive; but on this occasion his indifferenec to the rules made many friends for him. Their testimony of approval at the close of the performance was unmistakable.

The other numbers on Mr. Koussevitzky's program were all Russian, all familiar, and all inconsequential. They consisted of Liadov's pretentiously trivial "Fragment From the Apocalypse" (played here by Damrosch three years ago); the same composer's amiably grotesque fairy tale, "Kikimora"; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from his opera, "The Tale of Czar Saltan."

151

FROM
N. Y.
E

2 8 1925

HE DAY CUSSING

concert of the ston Symrge Kous-
Program:
Concerto for y, Prelude e; Dukas, haikowsky,
the Academy of

I believe, readers of the prima-confess to Thompson's
upon the Chotzinoff,
columns of made a on the part conductors; Mr.
with the
possible to
from the interpreting conducting against con-
Mr. Chotzinoff
you could the other.
ed.
direct or indi-controversy was brilliant Symphony. Mr.
any other
the primanecessarily his own, but brass-band intro-arranged for directors of his
Mr. Koussewitsky
Parisian haunts
the advent of
The unso-
him as anything
Russia or an pretender for
But he disap-
to be a mere

for a second
our surround-has been dissisuspect in him of an internaarily courting
in this dim
Even if we uch an illusion it allow us to do
re a conductor
nductor.

hich Mr. Koussected at the Acad-
evening was fait, however, had
on the occasion
to Brooklyn. of graveyard
Symphony,
of tonal aphrodisl'apres-midi
ated orches-
Dukas and Concerto of ete list. The before I pass
ayed for the
In the first Tschaikowsky
noticeably rasping of a defect due on an attack ecessary.

Boston Symphony's 40th Season

Eichheim's 'A Chinese Legend' and Ibert's 'Escales' Included in Concert Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fortieth season in New York with the concert given last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, Henry Eichheim's "A Chinese Legend," Jamques Ibert's "Escales" and the irrepressible sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. The second and third numbers were new to this town.

Mr. Eichheim, an American, is not unknown to local concertgoers, who have made acquaintance with his talent and his inclination for eastern ideas. The work heard last evening was originally a ballet produced by the Bolm Ballet Intime in Chicago last January. There is a singularly interesting and dramatic story at the base of the music. The handsomest general in China slew the ugliest in combat. Immediately the wife of the ugly one, the most beautiful and popular woman in China, appeared on the scene, took up her dead husband's spear and fought the slayer.

They fought one another to a standstill and agreed to resume hostilities after a rest and the dead man's funeral. Beginning the fight again, they looked into each other's eyes and saw the light that never was on land or sea. Then the woman pushed the spear into her own breast and the general drew the sword across his throat. And they died in ecstatic embrace.

That is musical material of the first order. No composer could ask for anything better, and Mr. Eichheim has used his opportunities to excellent advantage. The music has sharply defined character, great opulence of color and graphic value. It is obviously episodic and asks plainly for the illustrative ballet of action. But it is none the less a brilliant and effective orchestral piece, in which melodies of Chinese contour, harmonies exotic and gorgeously modern, and splendors of orchestral sonority unite in producing an artistic result. Mr. Eichheim has added another to his list of Oriental impressions and one that promises to make the orchestral rounds of the country.

M. Ibert was born in 1890 in Paris and is still living there. His "Escales" ("Ports of Call") are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. Of course one expects local color mixed on the modern palette and one is not disappointed. In Palermo the hearer is reminded of Lola and Turiddu, though for the moment they seem to be wandering in citron groves. In Tunis one hears the pipe of the Mediterranean boatmen, which has strange memories of the moaning of the desert and the Muezzin's florid call to the faithful. And in Valencia one hears las malaguenas and the bolero and all the other familiars of King Alfonso's realm. At any rate one at last realizes the true purpose of Spain. It is for composers of other countries to steal tunes from.

M. Ibert's composition is not important. It is well orchestrated, but it would have sounded more ingenious if it had not followed the American's work, which was so much better made. In both compositions the Bostonians covered themselves with glory. The Chinese ballet was a veritable triumph of orchestral virtuosity. It may—it should—be added that the playing of the youthful and invigorating concerto of Master Bach was not the least of the delights of the evening. The strings displayed a muscularity and a fine sonority in this music, and Mr. Koussevitky plainly enjoyed conducting it. Also there was no doubting that the audience enjoyed hearing it.

---

thing can be, having had its initial performance at Chicago, its composer's birthplace, on New Year's Day of the present year. The piece is entitled "A Chinese Legend," and a parenthetical subtitle intimates that it goes back to 600 A. D., which is extremely modern for anything belonging to China.

The "Legend" is the work of Henry Eichheim, who shows what a native American can do with an Oriental theme. The music is thoroughly "programmed," being intended to represent the varying phases of a couple of duels and a violent love affair. The first duel is between the handsomest man and the ugliest man in the history of China—by an interesting coincidence they lived at the same time. The handsomest man triumphs, but the widow of his slain rival takes up the quarrel. The second duel does not get far, however, before the eyes of the two combatants meet. Thereafter, although they do their best to feel as deadly foes ought to feel, they are unable to fight effectively, and the strange combat ends by the lady seizing her opponent's spear and plunging it into her heart and the gentleman tearing the sword from her hands and passing it across his throat. They die in each other's arms in an ecstasy of passion.

Mr. Eichheim has dealt skillfully with the unusual musical requirements of this tragedy, but the result is rather a tour de force than a masterpiece. Echoes of the ceremonial music in memory of a beloved general, with which the composition opens, are heard at appropriate points throughout the piece and there are moments of the kind of music which is welcome to Occidental ears, but there is also a good deal of the uproar which the Occidental regards as the chief characteristic of Chinese melody. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with his usual finesse and brought out the meaning of the score with due impressiveness.

The second of the evening's novelties was rather more pleasing. This was Jacques Ibert's "Escales," first performed in Paris in January, 1924. The "ports of call" celebrated in the piece are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. The music varies from a limpid smoothness to a pulsating animation. It is distinctly appealing and was received with an enthusiasm which brought the members of the orchestra to their feet to share formally in the plaudits. Both these novelties made use of instruments not ordinarily called on to any great extent. The "Chinese Legend" required numerous small cymbals, gongs and other sound-producing devices, while the "Escales" demanded castanets and the tomtom.

The opening number was Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra. By comparison with the closing number this piece fared little better than the two novelties, but this is not surprising, for that closing number was Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. It was superbly played, as need not be said. An interesting, well-balanced program rendered after the Boston manner—what more could an audience ask for the beginning of this orchestra's forty-fifth season?

---

ques

Ibert called "Ports of Call." The Eichelm legend is an imperfect but interesting composition, full of enticing Oriental rhythms and orchestral color. The Ibert suite pictures in musical terms impressions of three Mediterranean ports, Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. It is music of real distinction, not very revolutionary, but pleasantly dissonant. As descriptive music, the three sketches are not notable, but the orchestration is admirable and the themes have been handled with great skill. Both works were superbly played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

NOV 2 7 1925

Boston Exports New Music.

"A Chinese Legend" by Henry Eichheim and "Ports of Call" by Jacques Ibert were introduced to New York at the season's first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. As bearer of musical tidings from the Far East Mr. Eichheim has done better by us than in this "Legend." Still, it was composed for a ballet which Adolf Bolm produced in Chicago on New Year's Day of this year, and doubtless fares more bravely when danced and mimed than when not. Yesterday it made a loud and Mongol noise in the land without proving otherwise particularly impressive. The story of the ballet might be that of Morold, Tristan and Isolde, had Isolde accepted the proffered sword and she and Tristan, despite discrepancy of sex, forthwith engaged in duel to the death.

Jacques Ibert is one of the younger composers of France whose music has not been exploited here. His "Ports of Call" are three. The first, Palermo, impressed him astonishingly little, and he takes a long time to tell us of his insensibility. Tunis-Nefta was more obliging. Mainly a wail for oboe (the solo was played admirably by F. Gillet, who has succeeded the illustrious Longy as first oboe of the Boston orchestra), this movement is interesting because of its unusual rhythm and its color.

The finale, a Spanish rhapsody relating to Valencia, is decidely the most effective of the three. Though by no means the best Spanish music composed out of Spain, it is good enough to demonstrate anew that the best Spanish music has not so far been composed in Spain. Ibert is evidently no revolutionary, no seeker after beauty or ugliness in unexplored thickets of poly-this-or-that, and so his compositions are scarce likely to figure on programs offered us by leagues or guilds. Nevertheless, one surmises from last night's exhibit that more of him might be heard with pleasure.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with a lively and respectable performance of Bach's third "Brandenburg" concerto. He closed it with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Nobody but a conductor from the land of vodka would dream of imposing that harrowing opus as postlude to Thanksgiving dinner.

Without benefit of caviar.

PITTS SANBORN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 2 9 1925

OTHER MUSIC

The Army-Navy production at the Polo Grounds yesterday afternoon did not interfere seriously with the year's first "Meistersinger" at the Polo Grounds on Broadway at 40th Street, for this merriest of grand operas proved to be a Red Grange in drawing power. The artists apparently had partaken not too well but wisely of Thanksgiving delicacies, for all sang with clarity of voice and acted in holiday humor. Elizabeth Rethberg was "Eva," Clarence Whitehill "Hans Sachs," Rudolph Laubenthal "Walther," George Meader "David," Gustav Schuetzendorf "Beekmesser," Marion Telva "Magdalene," Paul Bender "Pogner," and there was a list of secondary principals longer than you could shake a stick at. The stick-shaking, by the way, was done with muscianship and energy by Artur Bodanzky.

In honor of the day's football game the apprentices in the second act street-brawl performed a few flying tackles which may not have been in the Nuremberg University rule book but which brought down their man and the house to boot, as it were.

Three symphony orchestras gave concerts in New York yesterday. The Boston Symphony, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, played in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, presenting a program akin to that which was favorably received Thanksgiving evening. The Philharmonic Orchestra gave one of its poular students' concerts in Carnegie Hall last night, while in the morning the New York Symphony gave a concert for children.

NOV 3 0 1925

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

The Russians had their innings at the Boston Symphony Orchestra program in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, the work of a student and his master delighting the large audience up to time for the symphony, when Mr. Koussevitzky switched to Brahms, giving the First, which he read nobly and which was played most admirably.

Liadow in two moods opened the afternoon, the first composition being a fragment from the large work of his later days, "The Apocalypse," which did not succeed in being so apocalyptic as his writer hoped it would be, although it has its stirring moments, and was played with great spirit. This was followed by a better known composition of his, "Kikimora," properly called a "fairy folk tale," and a charming piece done in a manner that was a credit to both conductor and orchestra.

Liadow's master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, contributed the next selection, which was that most gorgeously colorful suite from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," a work that imposes a severe test upon an orchestra with its frequent climaxes and terrific blasts of sound that threaten the very rafters. Mr. Koussevitzky kept every drop of the color and all the melodic pattern as well, and one had an excellent illustration in this number of just how far the work of individual players and the ensemble of the Boston orchestra has progressed recently.

Last season, there were Koussevitzky concerts that left nothing to be asked and others that were frankly disappointing; he took over an orchestra which Pierre Monteux had started on the up-grade, and judging by Saturday's performance, it is firmly fixed now at the top.

The Brahms wiped out whatever doubt of that fact there might have remained in one's mind.

H as Into Br ms Symphony

Boston Conductor at First Matinee in Carnegie Hall Wins Friends by Independence in Interpretations

Yesterday's first Boston Symphony matinee of the current season at Carnegie Hall was made noteworthy by Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Brahms's C minor Symphony, in which he had not before been heard here.

Mr. Koussevitzky has his own ideas concerning the interpretation of this symphony, as it is right that he should have. If he chooses to speed up or slacken the pace of the music in places where it had not occurred to Brahms to indicate such alterations of tempi, he does so. If he chooses to readjust Brahms's orchestral color scheme, he does so. And other modifications that evidently seem good to him he puts frankly into effect.

Doubtless there were stern symphonic detectives who followed Mr. Koussevitzky's performance with a metronome, stop watch and flashlight; and doubtless, if they were academically minded, they were not wholly content. But there were others in Carnegie Hall who relished this strongly individualized reading. They liked Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive phrasing at the end of the Andante, which was poetic without being sentimental. They liked his impressive conception of the slow introduction to the Finale; they were grateful to him for giving due weight and gravity to the magnificent chorale passage in the coda (even though his tempo here was not in accordance with the score). Above all, they liked Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony because it was untrammeled and alive. Not all of this conductor's floutings of tradition are persuasive; but on this occasion his indifferenec to the rules made many friends for him. Their testimony of approval at the close of the performance was unmistakable.

The other numbers on Mr. Koussevitzky's program were all Russian, all familiar, and all inconsequential. They consisted of Liadow's pretentiously trivial "Fragment From the Apocalypse" (played here by Damrosch three years ago); the same composer's amiably grotesque fairy tale, "Kikimora"; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from his opera, "The Tale of Czar Saltan."

NOV 2 9 1925

157

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Season's First "Meistersinger."

DIE MEISTERSINGER VON NUERNBERG, lyric comedy in three acts and four scenes. German text and music by Richard Wagner. At the Metropolitan Opera House.

Eva....................Elisabeth Rethberg
Magdalene....................Marion Telva
Walter von Stolzing.....Rudolph Laubenthal
Hans Sachs..............Clarence Whitehill
Beckmesser............Gustav Schuetzendorf
Pogner..........................Paul Bender
Kothner.......................Carl Schlegel
David.......................George Meader
A Night Watchman............Arnold Gabor
Master Singers—Max Bloch, Angelo Bada, Max Altglass, Giordano Paltrinieri, Frederick Vajda, Paolo Ananian, James Wolfe, William Gustafson.
Conductor—Artur Bodanzky.

If there is a last act in opera greater than that of "Die Meistersinger" it is the last act of "Tristan." Some would say the same thing of the end of "Götterdämerung." As a matter of fact none of these passages are to be compared; they only differ from each other, as one star differeth from another in glory. But if it is true that a creative artist is greatest when he reveals the common heart of humanity page by page then the finale of "Die Meistersinger" is the supreme achievement of its kind in music-drama.

The performance of "Die Meistersinger" which occasioned these reflections took place yesterday afternoon in the Metropolitan Opera House. It employed a familiar cast, with an Eva of the vocal gifts and the charm of Miss Rothberg; the eloquent and authoritative, if sometimes short-breathed and false-pitched Mr. Whitehall as Sachs, the lively and expressive impersonations of David and Magdalene by Mr. Meader and Miss Telva, and Mr. Schuetzendorf for an amusing Beckmesser. Little can be said in a kindly vein of Mr. Laubenthal's Walter, save that perhaps it was no worse than another German tenor's impersonation would have been, or than many inferior interpretations of the rôle to be heard week in and week out in German opera houses; and that, finally, if it is desired to hear "Die Meistersinger" at the Metropolitan it is at present necessary to contemplate one of two mediocrities in this part.

There is no question that there is a strong public demand for this opera. The repertory and even the experiences of the hardworking reviewers would be much the poorer for lack of it. "Meistersinger" is capable of carrying lesser talent than was in evidence yesterday. The character of the ensemble and the general ability of the cast made it possible to derive much pleasure and inspiration from a glorious masterwork. Nor is it the least of consolations that Mr. Bodanzky is especially fortunate in his reading of this score. It is, indeed, for us, his best "rôle," his best impersonation, through his orchestra and singers, of Wagner. He conducts with a feeling for the music that equals his technical preparation. Therefor the opera lived and was surcharged with feeling. When a singer fell short the baton of the conductor—at least for that last act, which has been so frequently mentioned—projected the music, and the music of "Die Meistersinger," once grasped, sincerely and competently interpreted, has the inherent power to overwhelm any other considerations. So conducted, with a cast of intelligent and well trained singers, we would rather hear this work than the whole of a lesser one with a star of international renown in every part.

The impression of Wagner's score was marred yesterday by those who rose and crowded the aisles as they filed out, while the music was sounding. But these things, too, must be accepted philosophically, if there is the wish to hear "Die Meistersinger" at the Metropolitan. They were endured, and if there was deprivation there was also rich reward for the faithful Wagnerite. A lute-harp after the model of the instrument employed at Baireuth suggested Beckmesser's plucking of strings. The audience as a majority sat absorbed in the music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This writer, reviewing the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday ~~night in this city~~ and failing to examine a proof, was made to say of the performances that they were of "surprising merit." He did not mean to say "surprising." He meant to say "surpassing." The performances were of surpassing merit, but that did not take the commentator by surprise. The way had been prepared and such performances had been drawing nearer for two seasons. Mr. Monteux, before Mr. Koussevitsky, found much to do in the musical reorganization of the Boston Symphony and a return to the standards attained by that body prior to the war and the strike for unionism.

Mr. Koussevitsky, when he arrived in Boston, found things still to be done—among them the infusing of fresh blood into the orchestra. The fresh blood is felt in the playing this season. There is a more vital response to the wishes of a brilliant and temperamental leader. The playing has vividness, precision and electricity. The tone has not only body; it glows and shimmers. The Boston Symphony is again in the position where served as the program of Thursday served to display to the utmost the capacities of the orchestra.

The music of Liadoff for the Apocalypse could hardly be called apocalyptical, and one can only wonder why any composer pretends to such things. It is music of dramatic or melo-dramatic tone, scenic in character and not cheap or insincere. It was superbly played. "Kikimora" has no more substance than Laidoff's "Baba-yaga." It is one of his excursions into Russian folk-lore and has charm of an ephemeral kind. Nor was there evident profound originality of invention in Rimsky's music of the suite from "Tsar Saltan," but here is inexhaustible ingenuity, freshness and imagination in the instrumentation.

It is not enough, in order to know Rimsky-Korsakoff, the master of orchestral effect, to be acquainted with only his most popular achievements. "Scheherazade," the "Spanish Caprice," the "Antar" symphony—less mature and more original in certain pages than the other two works—are only representative pages. Yesterday Rimsky-Korsakoff flung open another door of his treasure house, and out tumbled an immense glowing mass of jewels of every tint and color. His invention with the orchestra is endless, his most modest page is likely to astonish the listener.

Brahms's symphony gave substance to a program, but the earlier part of the concert would itself alone have sufficed for a memorable exhibition of tonal magic and virtuosity in performance.

Koussevitsky in Modern Music.

Sergei Koussevitsky, by special dispensation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as the leader of a small chamber orchestra of his own players at the concert given by the League of Composers last night in Town Hall. This concert was notable because of the presence of Mr. Koussevitsky. That is a matter of topical interest, and he conducted every composition as if his career were at stake on the issue. But the music was not of importance, if one accepts, partially, the "concertino" for piano and orchestra of Arthur Honegger and the three songs, settings of curious poems of Stéphane Mallarmé, by Maurice Ravel. They were sung by Miss Maria Dormont, who discharged a very difficult task.

As a matter of record it may be stated that there were first performances here of a "Sinfonietta" by Alexandre Tansman; the Honegger "Concertino," in which Jesus Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took the piano part; of Serge Prokofieff's quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass, and of Aarom Coplan's Music of the Theatre. Concerning this last, one finds on consulting program notes that Mr. Copland's music after all was not for the theatre. It might have served for the theatre if the right play had been at hand. But, failing the existence of the play, it is not for the theatre. It is only called "for the theatre." It is just to be understood like that by the enlightened and blessed who listen and very solemnly swallow everything that appertains to new music.

"Sinfoniettas!" "Concertinos!" Music-that-might-have-been "for the theatre"! Of such futilities was this program principally made. Out of it all emerged Ravel's songs and a really amusing final movement of Honegger's Concertino, which parodies jazz with delightful irony and extravagance, and a middle movement which amuses until the joke gets stale—the joke being a soulful theme played with gushing expression by the pianist, with burlesque rejoinders by the orchestra. It is a little flat, but much more genuine than Mr. Copland's "Burlesque," for example, from the precious "theatre music"; it towers high by the labored infantilism of Tansman's "Sinfonietta," and it made the more empty the Prokofieff quintet.

The striking and disheartening fact about the concert heard last night was the evident intention to be new and original by young musicians, most of them hopelessly alike in their standpoint and their lack of conviction about anything. The sheer flatness of the music it would be hard to excel. Mr. Copland's score, after the Dance, was wildly applauded and Mr. Koussevitsky beckoned to the composer in the gallery. Why? Because this movement, like that of Honegger, smacked of jazz, and the audience, responding to this subtle hint, believed that it had individually and collectively recognized a new, towering genius.

Well, it may be that this genius is among us, disguised as Mr. Copeland; but we are not convinced, we are not convinced—at least by this effusion. We are suspicious, fault-finding, perhaps "reactionary." We do not care if a long time elapses before we listen again to

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 7 1925

AT Carnegie Hall last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussewitsky, made its first appearance of the season in New York. Mr. Koussewitsky's program for the occasion being almost identical with that which he will present this evening in the Academy of Music, I reserve comment in for the Brooklyn event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

NOV 3 0 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra In Concert at Carnegie Hall

Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie ~~Hall~~ Saturday afternoon was devoted to Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from the opera "Tsar Saltan," two compositions by Liadev, including a fragment of the Apocalypse, op. 66, and the fairy folk tale. "Kikinora," and the monumental first symphony of Brahms.

The Russian numbers were charmingly played, of course, but interest was centered in Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Brahms. It was obviously not one to which staid Brahmins are accustomed and commingled with fervent applause were a number of dissenting murmurs. The first movement was conducted quite in accord with conservative custom. But commencing with the second movement the Boston conductor gradually developed an extensive range of tempi, an elasticity of rhythm, that mounted through a crescendo that accumulated an immense store of emotional force and burst with dramatic and tempestuous emphasis in the climax of the last movement. It was a thrilling stroke and a strangely individual reading that achieved its purpose.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

A Week End With the Moderns, Chaperoned by Koussevitzky and Damrosch

Concert by the League of Composers, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players; soloists, Jesus Sanroma, pianist, and Maria Dormont, soprano. At the Town Hall, Saturday night.

PROGRAM

1. Sinfonietta.........Alexander Tansman
2. Concertino, for piano and orchestra, Honegger
   Mr. Sanroma, pianist.
3. Quintet, for wind and strings. Prokofieff
4. Trois Poemes......................Raval
   Maria Dormont
5. Music for the theater....Aaron Copland

Concert of "Modern Music, Pleasant and Unpleasant," by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, with explanatory remarks by Mr. Damrosch; soloist, Paul Kochanski. At Mecca Temple, Sunday afternoon.

PROGRAM

1. Memories of My Childhood (Life in a Russian village)..............Loeffler
2. Motion—
   (a) On the Rails—Pacific 231..Honegger
   (b) Through the Air.
   By an older modern composer
3. Three of the "Five Orchestral Pieces." Schoenberg
4. Sonata for two clarinets........Poulenc
   Messrs. Williams and Duques
5. Concerto for violin and orchestra. Prokofieff
   Mr. Kochanski
6. Dances—
   (a) Ragtime ....Stravinsky
   (b) "Nusch-Nuschi" dances...Hindemith
   (c) Waltz. By an older modern composer

If it were ever permissible for one concert-giver to refer in public to the doings of another concert-giver, Mr. Walter Damrosch might possibly have felt inclined to use as a text for his lecture-concert yesterday afternoon at Mecca Temple the program which his esteemed colleague, Mr. Koussevitzky, had played at the Town Hall the night before. But of course those things are never done. So it was left for such music-lovers as may have heard both concerts, and for those irresponsible gadflies, the reviewers, to make the suggested application.

Mr. Damrosch (who was at the top of his form) explained to his audience that his original purpose had been to hold a clinic on "ultra-modern music, pleasant and unpleasant," with the intention of exhibiting those modernists whom he respects as being sincerely desirous of extending the expressional boundaries of music, and those others whom he regards as merely imitators, having nothing to say, and using the fomulas of ultra-modernism without originality or conviction.

* * *

We suspect that some, at least, of the music performed by Mr. Koussevitzky at the League of Composers' concert would not have pleased Mr. Damrosch—that he would have seized upon it, if the conventions had allowed, as illustrating his point about the difference between the real and the imitation. For to tell the truth, the works disclosed by the League via Mr. Koussevitzky were unnourishing, to say the least. We suspect that Alexander Tansman, for example, does not realize how soon a formula becomes stale and intolerable unless it is continually revitalized by imagination.

Richard Strauss, let us say, could take over certain of the formulas which the music of the eighties and nineties

Stravinsky could do superb things with it—as in the middle section of the "Rondes Printanieres" from the "Sacre." Prokofieff was once able to exert it with amazing eloquence, as in the Finale of the Scythian Suite. Schönberg in "Pierrot Lunaire" and in the "Five Orchestra Pieces" (which Mr. Damrosch disappointingly reduced to three at yesterday's concert) has wrought marvelous effects by the imaginative use of opposed tonalities.

* * *

No, our too facile friends from Paris and their cronies and adherents cannot much longer get away with this trite conventionalism which they offer to us as "ultra-modernism." It isn't ultra-modernism at all. It isn't even modern. One of the few things that we regretted in Mr. Damrosch's lecture yesterday (which on the whole was admirably shrewd and tolerant) was his failure to make the very vital point that practically none of the familiar elements of ultra-modernism are new—that most of them, in fact, are very old.

Mr. Damrosch, of course, does not need to be told this; but perhaps some of his hearers might profitably have been reminded of it. He might have told them, for example, that this very device of conflicting tonalities is a great deal older than Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (the famous instance in which he recalled). That favorite expedient of contemporary musical radicals, from Casella to Stravinsky, from Bartok to von Webern—the simultaneous employment of major and minor thirds—may be found again and again in the music of the Tudor composers: in, for instance, the church music of Tallis, who died in 1585; in both the vocal and instrumental music of Gibbons (1583-1625)—see, for instance, his anthem, "If Ye Be Risen Again With Christ," and the fifth of his Fantasies for three viols.

* * *

If Mr. Damrosch wishes to be reminded of an example of opposed tonalities which is at least as "agonizing" (to use his own word) as anything in Schonberg, let him look through the collections of Byrd's madrigals; for example, in No. 32 of the 1588 set, where that carefree Elizabethan has deliberately flung a major third into the arms of a minor. Also, in Byrd's "Arise, Lord, Into Thy Rest" (1611), he overlays the key of A minor with the key of A major—exactly the trick that the ultra-modernists use with so glad a cry of discovery. And in order that no one may put such things down to an error, Byrd specifically gives warning in an "Epistle to the Reader," dated 1588, that his hearers may expect certain effects involving "jarre or dissonance," and conjures them not to account for such discords as misprints. It might be Stravinsky himself, or Schonberg, addressing the musical public of 1925 with a warning footnote. As for the notorious consecutive major sevenths of the clarinets in "Le Sacre du Printemps," another modernist formula, one will find them anticipated in music by the Restoration composers.

* * *

So we wish that Mr. Damrosch had taken time to make this essential point. It is true in music as in other fields that, as George Meredith succinctly remarked, "Our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms." No formula has merit in itself—neither the diminished seventh chord of Weber that Wagner transfigured, nor the chromaticisms that Strauss lifted out of "Tristan" and used in a new way, nor the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

NOV 3 0 1925

Saturday evening saw the inner brotherhood of ultra-modernites assembled at Town Hall, where the League of Composers held forth in a concert of works for small (chamber) orchestra, made up of Boston Symphony players under the ~~direction~~ of Sergei Koussevitzky. None of the music was downright unpleasant, but some of it seemed constrained, arbitrary, lacking in purely musical ideas, and not at all worth while, so far as public performance was concerned. All of it adhered to the manner and style called "ultra-modern," or "modernistic." Its idiom now is too familiar to need explanation.

Proceedings opened with "Sinfonietta," by Alexander Tausman, a young Pole living in Paris. The work had moments of thinly-disguised old-fashioned melody (considered a high crime among the modernists) and many compelling rhythms, which the drums did not allow one to forget. Arthur Honegger's "Concertino," for piano and orchestra, possessed a light and even witty touch, and revealed a slow movement of some lyrical appeal. The piano part was played sensitively by Jesus Sanroma.

Serge Prokofieff's quintet was beyond me, and to my benighted ears, "sound signifying nothing." Three songs by Ravel (set to Mallarme poems) proved to be delicate, hot-house music, somewhat on the order of Debussy.

"Music for the Theatre," a five-part suite by the young American, Aaron Copland, was, to my mind, the best number on the programme. It had atmosphere, feeling, imagination, technical skill—and a bully good idealized jazz movement recalling parts of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

* * *

Globe Nov 29

Music Notes and Comment

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts Jan 22 and 23 next, in the regular series. Mr Goossens will also conduct the concert Jan 18 in the Providence series, so that Mr Koussevitzky may enjoy a mid-season week of rest. Mr Goossens is a Belgian long settled in London as conductor and composer. Some of his music has figured on recital programs here in recent seasons.

◆◆◆◆◆

The program for the first Monday concert Dec 7 includes Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse," his "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan," and Brahms' First Symphony. There is no soloists, for the first time in this series.

◆◆◆◆◆

The new Tuesday series begins this week with almost every seat sold for the season in advance. The few remaining tickets go on public sale tomorrow morning. The first program brings the history down to Beethoven. It has been rumored that a lecturer would appear at these concerts to tell the audience what it ought to think. One hopes that this is erroneous. No lecturer can succeed in putting into words anything likely to be of use to people unable to like Mozart and Beethoven after hearing their music properly performed. No word of any lecturer has come from Symphony Hall.

◆◆◆◆◆

There are to be no soloists in the Tuesday series. Nor are any announced for later Monday concerts. In the regular series but six soloists are scheduled, of whom the first, Harold Bauer, will appear this week.

◆◆◆◆◆

Soloists have no place in a symphony concert, except when a work such as the Brahms piano concerto which Mr Bauer will play, demands an assisting artist. This is one of the very few concertos able to stand alone as music. It should appear from time to time on the programs like the other major works of Brahms, and when it does, a pianist is needed. But except in such cases as this soloists are needed at Symphony concerts only when the box office is in difficulties. Some people still fail to realize that the orchestra is itself the only solo instrument worth hearing.

◆◆◆◆◆

We are indebted to Mr Koussevitzky for banishing the superfluous soloists from Symphony concerts. This, like his prohibition of applause between the movements of symphonies and suites, is a great and long-needed improvement which no other conductor was able to bring about.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK

tempted in his c… getting … on it. … his c… with so… the Fre… alien vi… But t… young M… he didn… place t… way of … side hi… to pape… had no… they … wouldn…

…et is a… The Ta… around-… with him… abilities which, h… always quite eq… had to do. Je… …egger …ung pianist attach… …roi Dara, played the Hone… …ist. Y… very well and helpe… of his natters, Maria Do… …plexy who who was makin… effects …rance here, sang the… …l they with their excruciat… forth f… intervals, in a way… …ounteba…e's admiration. Sh… …e can thoice, light in calibre. …tzky …aptain touch of limpid this moghtful.

IRVING WEIL.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 29 1925

Stock's Word For Gericke

Chicago's Conductor Pays A Warm Tribute to Boston's Pioneer

To the Editor of The New York Times:

May I add a few words to the many tributes which have been paid to the memory of Wilhelm Gericke?

I have always regarded Gericke, like Theodore Thomas, as one of the pioneers who made possible the flawless playing which characterizes our American symphony orchestras. Like Thomas, Gericke had a most sensitive ear for beauty of tone and variety of color. With him in his conductorship of the Boston Orchestra were associated Kneisel as concert master, Loeffler, Longy, the great oboe player, and many other artists of the first rank, and when Nikisch came to succeed Gericke he could not say enough in praise of that well-trained body of musicians. "What an orchestra!" he so often exclaimed. "What beauty of tone and perfection of ensemble! All I have to do is 'poetize' and give it heart and soul."

And "poetize" he did, but it must have gladdened the heart of Colonel Higginson when Gericke returned to take charge of his orchestra!

It can truthfully be said that there never existed a more exacting drill-master than Gericke. His sense for balance of tone had become more acute as time went on; his discipline was so severe and restraining that the playing of the orchestra gave evidence of what might be termed "faultfully faultless."

Gericke would not tolerate anything that was not perfectly balanced and blended. If occasionally the orchestra felt like "cutting loose," up came Gericke's left hand with a gentle but firm sweep, and things died down again to tonal beauty and self-restraint.

He was very sensitive to the ever-varying conditions of acoustics which prevail in concert halls. In his opinion afternoon concerts sounded better than evening performances, because in the afternoons the concerts were attended largely by ladies whose garments effected a softer and more veiled quality of tone, as compared to the evening concerts when the gentlemen came, wearing stiff shirts which reflected sound more harshly and therefore helped to make the tone of the orchestra over-brilliant.

I have never known a conductor more devoted to the task of rehearsing. It became almost an obsession with Gericke, and often it would happen that after a rehearsal he would interrupt a conversation with: "I wonder what possessed that second violin player on the sixth stand to play F natural instead of F flat in the 'Fidelio.' It must not happen again." Or, a few minutes later: "I would like to know whether that man at the bass drum realized that he was much too loud in the final chord of the 'Preludes.'"

His devotion and sense of responsibility knew no bounds. It is for all of us to pay tribute to the artist and man who was so extraordinarily gifted in the making of a splendid orchestra and who did so much to raise music in America to the highest level of artistic refinement.

FREDERICK A. STOCK,
Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.
Chicago, Nov. 22, 1925.

NOV 29 1925

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

152

Season's First "Meistersinger."

DIE MEISTERSINGER VON NUERNBERG, lyric comedy in three acts and four scenes. German text and music by Richard Wagner. At the Metropolitan Opera House.

Eva	Elisabeth Rethberg
Magdalene	Marion Telva
Walter von Stolzing	Rudolph Laubenthal
Hans Sachs	Clarence Whitehill
Beckmesser	Gustav Schuetzendorf
Pogner	Paul Bender
Kothner	Carl Schlegel
David	George Meader
A Night Watchman	Arnold Gabor

Master Singers—Max Bloch, Angelo Bada, Max Altglass, Giordano Paltrinieri, Frederick Vajda, Paolo Ananian, James Wolfe, William Gustafson.

Conductor—Artur Bodanzky.

If there is a last act in opera greater than that of "Die Meistersinger" it is the last act of "Tristan." Some would say the same thing of the end of "Götterdämerung." As a matter of fact none of these passages are to be compared; they only differ from each other, as one star differeth from another in glory. But if it is true that a creative artist is greatest when he reveals the common heart of humanity page by page then the finale of "Die Meistersinger" is the supreme achievement of its kind in music-drama.

The performance of "Die Meistersinger" which occasioned these reflections took place yesterday afternoon in the Metropolitan Opera House. It employed a familiar cast, with an Eva of the vocal gifts and the charm of Miss Rothberg; the eloquent and authoritative, if sometimes short-breathed and false-pitched Mr. Whitehall as Sachs, the lively and expressive impersonations of David and Magdalene by Mr. Meader and Miss Telva, and Mr. Schuetzendorf for an amusing Beckmesser. Little can be said in a kindly vein of Mr. Laubenthal's Walter, save that perhaps it was no worse than another German tenor's impersonation would have been, or than many inferior interpretations of the rôle to be heard week in and week out in German opera houses; and that, finally, if it is desired to hear "Die Meistersinger" at the Metropolitan it is at present necessary to contemplate one of two mediocrities in this part.

There is no question that there is a strong public demand for this opera. The repertory and even the experiences of the hardworking reviewers would be much the poorer for lack of it. "Meistersinger" is capable of carrying lesser talent than was in evidence yesterday. The character of the ensemble and the general ability of the cast made it possible to derive much pleasure and inspiration from a glorious masterwork. Nor is it the least of consolations that Mr. Bodanzky is especially fortunate in his reading of this score. It is, indeed, for us, his best "rôle," his best impersonation, through his orchestra and singers, of Wagner. He conducts with a feeling for the music that equals his technical preparation. Therefor the opera lived and was surcharged with feeling. When a singer fell short the baton of the conductor—at least for that last act, which has been so frequently mentioned—projected the music, and the music of "Die Meistersinger," once grasped, sincerely and competently interpreted, has the inherent power to overwhelm any other considerations. So conducted, with a cast of intelligent and well trained singers, we would rather hear this work than the whole of a lesser one with a star of international renown in every part.

The impression of Wagner's score was marred yesterday by those who rose and crowded the aisles as they filed out, while the music was sounding. But these things, too, must be accepted philosophically, if there is the wish to hear "Die Meistersinger" at the Metropolitan. They were endured, and if there was deprivation there was also rich reward for the faithful Wagnerite. A lute-harp after the model of the instrument employed at Baireuth suggested Beckmesser's plucking of strings. The audience as a majority sat absorbed in the music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This writer, reviewing the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday night in this city and failing to examine a proof, was made to say of the performances that they were of "surprising merit." He did not mean to say "surprising." He meant to say "surpassing." The performances were of surpassing merit, but that did not take the commentator by surprise. The way had been prepared and such performances had been drawing nearer for two seasons. Mr. Monteux, before Mr. Koussevitsky, found much to do in the musical reorganization of the Boston Symphony and a return to the standards attained by that body prior to the war and the strike for unionism.

Mr. Koussevitsky, when he arrived in Boston, found things still to be done—among them the infusing of fresh blood into the orchestra. The fresh blood is felt in the playing this season. There is a more vital response to the wishes of a brilliant and temperamental leader. The playing has vividness, precision and electricity. The tone has not only body; it glows and shimmers. The Boston Symphony is again in the position where it has very few rivals, and their number is rapidly diminishing.

The performances yesterday showed that the demonstration of Thursday night was not a flash in the pan, but enduring accomplishment. The ter could not hear the performance e Brahms Symphony, which he had Mr. Koussevitsky play some previous in Boston, in a truly c spirit. He heard the first half program, consisting entirely of an compositions. It concluded the phonic picture, "From the Apocase," and "Kikimora," an instrumental folk-tale by Liadoff; also the ar Saltan," suite from Rimsky-rsakoff's opera. These compositions, a gorgeous and fantastical character, served as the program of Thursday served to display to the utmost the capacities of the orchestra.

The music of Liadoff for the Apocalypse could hardly be called apocalyptical, and one can only wonder why any composer pretends to such things. It is music of dramatic or melo-dramatic tone, scenic in character and not cheap or insincere. It was superbly played. "Kikimora" has no more substance than Laidoff's "Baba-yaga." It is one of his excursions into Russian folklore and has charm of an ephemeral kind. Nor was there evident profound originality of invention in Rimsky's music of the suite from "Tsar Saltan," but here is inexhaustible ingenuity, freshness and imagination in the instrumentation.

It is not enough, in order to know Rimsky-Korsakoff, the master of orchestral effect, to be acquainted with only his most popular achievements. "Scheherazade," the "Spanish Caprice," the "Antar" symphony—less mature and more original in certain pages than the other two works—are only representative pages. Yesterday Rimsky-Korsakoff flung open another door of his treasure house, and out tumbled an immense glowing mass of jewels of every tint and color. His invention with the orchestra is endless, his most modest page is likely to astonish the listener.

Brahms's symphony gave substance to a program, but the earlier part of the concert would itself alone have sufficed for a memorable exhibition of tonal magic and virtuosity in performance.

Koussevitsky in Modern Music.

Sergei Koussevitsky, by special dispensation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as the leader of a small chamber orchestra of his own players at the concert given by the League of Composers last night in Town Hall. This concert was notable because of the presence of Mr. Koussevitsky. That is a matter of topical interest, and he conducted every composition as if his career were at stake on the issue. But the music was not of importance, if one accepts, partially, the "concertino" for piano and orchestra of Arthur Honegger and the three songs, settings of curious poems of Stéphane Mallarmé, by Maurice Ravel. They were sung by Miss Maria Dormont, who discharged a very difficult task.

As a matter of record it may be stated that there were first performances here of a "Sinfonietta" by Alexandre Tansman; the Honegger "Concertino," in which Jesus Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took the piano part; of Serge Prokofieff's quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and double bass, and of Aarom Coplan's Music of the Theatre. Concerning this last, one finds on consulting program notes that Mr. Copland's music after all was not for the theatre. It might have served for the theatre if the right play had been at hand. But, failing the existence of the play, it is not for the theatre. It is only called "for the theatre." It is just to be understood like that by the enlightened and blessed who listen and very solemnly swallow everything that appertains to new music.

"Sinfoniettas!" "Concertinos!" Music-that-might-have-been "for the theatre"! Of such futilities was this program principally made. Out of it all emerged Ravel's songs and a really amusing final movement of Honegger's Concertino, which parodies jazz with delightful irony and extravagance, and a middle movement which amuses until the joke gets stale—the joke being a soulful theme played with gushing expression by the pianist, with burlesque rejoinders by the orchestra. It is a little flat, but much more genuine than Mr. Copland's "Burlesque," for example, from the precious "theatre music"; it towers high by the labored infantilism of Tansman's "Sinfonietta," and it made the more empty the Prokofieff quintet.

The striking and disheartening fact about the concert heard last night was the evident intention to be new and original by young musicians, most of them hopelessly alike in their standpoint and their lack of conviction about anything. The sheer flatness of the music it would be hard to excel. Mr. Copland's score, after the Dance, was wildly applauded and Mr. Koussevitsky beckoned to the composer in the gallery. Why? Because this movement, like that of Honegger, smacked of jazz, and the audience, responding to this subtle hint, believed that it had individually and collectively recognized a new, towering genius.

Well, it may be that this genius is among us, disguised as Mr. Copeland; but we are not convinced, we are not convinced—at least by this effusion. We are suspicious, fault-finding, perhaps "reactionary." We do not care if a long time elapses before we listen again to "Music for the Theatre," or the Sinfonietta, or the Proko Quintet. We could even do with a very little of Honegger, and would never miss the first movement of his concertino at all. The audience at this concert, notwithstanding Mr. Koussevitsky's presence, was not over large. But it listened deeply; now and again it bravoed, and all was sacrosanct.

Bost

including fragment of the Apocalypse, op. 6 and the fairy folk tale. "Kikinora, and the monumental first symphon of Brahms.

The Russian numbers were charr ingly played, of course, but inter was centered in Mr. Koussevitzk interpretation of Brahms. It was o viously not one to which st Brahmins are accustomed and co mingled with fervent applause w a number of dissenting murmurs. irst movement was conducted in accord with conservative cus But commencing with the s movement the Boston conductor ually developed an extensive ran tempi, an elasticity of rhythm, mounted through a crescendo th cumulated an immense store of emotional force and burst with dramatic and tempestuous emphasis in the climax of the last movement. It was a thrilling stroke and a strangely individual reading that achieved its purpose.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

A Week End With the Moderns, Chaperoned by Koussevitzky and Damrosch

Concert by the League of Composers, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players; soloists, Jesus Sanroma, pianist, and Maria Dormont, soprano. At the Town Hall, Saturday night.

PROGRAM

1. Sinfonietta.........Alexander Tansman
2. Concertino, for piano and orchestra, Honegger
   Mr. Sanroma, pianist.
3. Quintet, for wind and strings. Prokofieff
4. Trois Poemes....................Raval
   Maria Dormont
5. Music for the theater....Aaron Copland

Concert of "Modern Music, Pleasant and Unpleasant," by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, with explanatory remarks by Mr. Damrosch; soloist, Paul Kochanski. At Mecca Temple, Sunday afternoon.

PROGRAM

1. Memories of My Childhood (Life in a Russian village)..............Loeffler
2. Motion—
   (a) On the Rails—Pacific 231..Honegger
   (b) Through the Air.
   By an older modern composer
3. Three of the "Five Orchestral Pieces." Schoenberg
4. Sonata for two clarinets........Poulenc
   Messrs. Williams and Duques
5. Concerto for violin and orchestra. Prokofieff
   Mr. Kochanski
6. Dances—
   (a) Ragtime ....Stravinsky
   (b) "Nusch-Nuschi" dances...Hindemith
   (c) Waltz. By an older modern composer

If it were ever permissible for one concert-giver to refer in public to the doings of another concert-giver, Mr. Walter Damrosch might possibly have felt inclined to use as a text for his lecture-concert yesterday afternoon at Mecca Temple the program which his esteemed colleague, Mr. Koussevitzky, had played at the Town Hall the night before. But of course those things are never done. So it was left for such music-lovers as may have heard both concerts, and for those irresponsible gadflies, the reviewers, to make the suggested application.

Mr. Damrosch (who was at the top of his form) explained to his audience that his original purpose had been to hold a clinic on "ultra-modern music, pleasant and unpleasant," with the intention of exhibiting those modernists whom he respects as being sincerely desirous of extending the expressional boundaries of music, and those others whom he regards as merely imitators, having nothing to say, and using the fomulas of ultra-modernism without originality or conviction.

* * *

We suspect that some, at least, of the music performed by Mr. Koussevitzky at the League of Composers' concert would not have pleased Mr. Damrosch—that he would have seized upon it, if the conventions had allowed, as illustrating his point about the difference between the real and the imitation. For to tell the truth, the works disclosed by the League via Mr. Koussevitzky were unnourishing, to say the least. We suspect that Alexander Tansman, for example, does not realize how soon a formula becomes stale and intolerable unless it is continually revitalized by imagination.

Richard Strauss, let us say, could take over certain of the formulas which the music of the eighties and nineties had inherited from Liszt and Wagner, and could turn them into living images of beauty and expressiveness because of the intensity with which he reconceived and reanimated them. And to reach back only a little further into the past—to Richard the First himself—see what Wagner was able to do with that disreputable old cliché that Weber had worn threadbare, the chord of the diminished seventh, which in Wagner's hands became as a new thing. What miracles Wagner achieved with it!

* * *

But Mr. Tansman—and his associates on Saturday night's program, to a less extent: Messrs. Honegger, Prokofieff, Copland (Ravel is another story altogether)—are more easily satisfied. They appear to be quite content when they have taken the formula, now ancient and mildewed, of superposed keys (a tune or a chord in C, for example, played simultaneously with a tune or chord in D flat), and have exhibited it with the wide-eyed astonishment and infatuation of infant pianists discovering the delights of chopsticks.

But the trick is altogether too easy, too transparent; and, considered merely as a device, it is almost played out. Stravinsky could do superb things with it—as in the middle section of the "Rondes Printanieres" from the "Sacre." Prokofieff was once able to exert it with amazing eloquence, as in the Finale of the Scythian Suite. Schönberg in "Pierrot Lunaire" and in the "Five Orchestra Pieces" (which Mr. Damrosch disappointingly reduced to three at yesterday's concert) has wrought marvelous effects by the imaginative use of opposed tonalities.

* * *

No, our too facile friends from Paris and their cronies and adherents cannot much longer get away with this trite conventionalism which they offer to us as "ultra-modernism." It isn't ultra-modernism at all. It isn't even modern. One of the few things that we regretted in Mr. Damrosch's lecture yesterday (which on the whole was admirably shrewd and tolerant) was his failure to make the very vital point that practically none of the familiar elements of ultra-modernism are new—that most of them, in fact, are very old.

Mr. Damrosch, of course, does not need to be told this; but perhaps some of his hearers might profitably have been reminded of it. He might have told them, for example, that this very device of conflicting tonalities is a great deal older than Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (the famous instance in which he recalled). That favorite expedient of contemporary musical radicals, from Casella to Stravinsky, from Bartok to von Webern—the simultaneous employment of major and minor thirds—may be found again and again in the music of the Tudor composers: in, for instance, the church music of Tallis, who died in 1585; in both the vocal and instrumental music of Gibbons (1583-1625)—see, for instance, his anthem, "If Ye Be Risen Again With Christ," and the fifth of his Fantasies for three viols.

* * *

If Mr. Damrosch wishes to be reminded of an example of opposed tonalities which is at least as "agonizing" (to use his own word) as anything in Schonberg, let him look through the collections of Byrd's madrigals; for example, in No. 32 of the 1588 set, where that carefree Elizabethan has deliberately flung a major third into the arms of a minor. Also, in Byrd's "Arise, Lord, Into Thy Rest" (1611), he overlays the key of A minor with the key of A major—exactly the trick that the ultra-modernists use with so glad a cry of discovery. And in order that no one may put such things down to an error, Byrd specifically gives warning in an "Epistle to the Reader," dated 1588, that his hearers may expect certain effects involving "jarre or dissonance," and conjures them not to account for such discords as misprints. It might be Stravinsky himself, or Schonberg, addressing the musical public of 1925 with a warning footnote. As for the notorious consecutive major sevenths of the clarinets in "Le Sacre du Printemps," another modernist formula, one will find them anticipated in music by the Restoration composers.

* * *

So we wish that Mr. Damrosch had taken time to make this essential point. It is true in music as in other fields that, as George Meredith succinctly remarked, "Our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms." No formula has merit in itself—neither the diminished seventh chord of Weber that Wagner transfigured, nor the chromaticisms that Strauss lifted out of "Tristan" and used in a new way, nor the wholetone scale that Debussy derived from Dargomijsky and Glinka and made his own (though we think Mr. Damrosch exaggerated the degree of Debussy's affection for it—there are other scales of which Debussy made quite as extraordinary use, as the old church modes, in "Pelleas" and elsewhere).

* * *

The polytonal formula, likewise the atonal formula, and the various other formulas that are characteristic of contemporary music, are, potentially, valuable devices. But they cannot be made memorable or impressive simply by mechanical iteration or a merely derivative restatement. Like every other musical formula, from consecutive thirds to muted trumpets, they must be blown into flame by the breath of a creative artist who has, by some miracle that will forever remain mysterious, seen the phantoms of life and beauty through new eyes, and cannot rest until he has kindled his own fires on the altars of the dead.

---

was ghted hing." set to to be some- assy. tre," a young d, was, t number on the programme. It had atmosphere, feeling, imagination, technical skill—and a bully good idealized jazz movement recalling parts of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

* * *

The photoplay, "The Wife Who

'The Wife Who Wasn't Wanted' Tops Films at Scollay

3 o'clock.

Jack La Mont and Company at the Howard Athenaeum

Jack La Mont returns to town this week at the Howard Athenaeum with his "All Set To Go" combination of mirth and melody in which the principal scenes include "A Family Affair," and "The Vampire." La Mont is the leading comedian.

In the supporting cast are Chubby Drisdale, "The Girl with a Smile"; Jessie McDonald, Blanche Burnette, Joe West, Don Trent and Phil Young.

The "house" vaudeville includes Margaret Merrill, Reck and Rector and Brown and Davis.

In the picture program will be shown "It is the Law," "After Six Days," and Pathe News. Today's bill will begin at 3 o'clock.

corps de ballet.

An Arthur Martell organ solo, a news weekly and an overture by the orchestra, together with screen novelties, will complete the program.

We are indebted to Mr Koussevitzky for banishing the superfluous soloists from Symphony concerts. This, like his prohibition of applause between the movements of symphonies and suites, is a great and long-needed improvement which no other conductor was able to bring about.

IS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

IRVING WEIL.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

NOV 29 1925

Stock's Word For Gericke

Chicago's Conductor Pays A Warm Tribute to Boston's Pioneer

To the Editor of The New York Times:

May I add a few words to the many tributes which have been paid to the memory of Wilhelm Gericke?

I have always regarded Gericke, like Theodore Thomas, as one of the pioneers who made possible the flawless playing which characterizes our American symphony orchestras. Like Thomas, Gericke had a most sensitive ear for beauty of tone and variety of color. With him in his conductorship of the Boston Orchestra were associated Kneisel as concert master, Loeffler, Longy, the great oboe player, and many other artists of the first rank, and when Nikisch came to succeed Gericke he could not say enough in praise of that well-trained body of musicians. "What an orchestra!" he so often exclaimed. "What beauty of tone and perfection of ensemble! All I have to do is 'poetize' and give it heart and soul."

And "poetize" he did, but it must have gladdened the heart of Colonel Higginson when Gericke returned to take charge of his orchestra!

It can truthfully be said that there never existed a more exacting drillmaster than Gericke. His sense for balance of tone had become more acute as time went on; his discipline was so severe and restraining that the playing of the orchestra gave evidence of what might be termed "faultfully faultless."

Gericke would not tolerate anything that was not perfectly balanced and blended. If occasionally the orchestra felt like "cutting loose," up came Gericke's left hand with a gentle but firm sweep, and things died down again to tonal beauty and self-restraint.

He was very sensitive to the ever-varying conditions of acoustics which prevail in concert halls. In his opinion afternoon concerts sounded better than evening performances, because in the afternoons the concerts were attended largely by ladies whose garments effected a softer and more veiled quality of tone, as compared to the evening concerts when the gentlemen came, wearing stiff shirts which reflected sound more harshly and therefore helped to make the tone of the orchestra over-brilliant.

I have never known a conductor more devoted to the task of rehearsing. It became almost an obsession with Gericke, and often it would happen that after a rehearsal he would interrupt a conversation with: "I wonder what possessed that second violin player on the sixth stand to play F natural instead of F flat in the 'Fidelio.' It must not happen again." Or, a few minutes later: "I would like to know whether that man at the bass drum realized that he was much too loud in the final chord of the 'Preludes.'"

His devotion and sense of responsibility knew no bounds. It is for all of us to pay tribute to the artist and man who was so extraordinarily gifted in the making of a splendid orchestra and who did so much to raise music in America to the highest level of artistic refinement.

FREDERICK A. STOCK,
Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.
Chicago, Nov. 22, 1925.

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

A Week End With the Moderns, Chaperoned by Koussevitzky and Damrosch

Concert by the League of Composers, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players; soloists, Jesus San[redacted]t, and Maria Dormont, soprano. At the Town Hall, Saturday night.

PROGRAM

1. Sinfonietta.........Alexander Tansman
2. Concertino, for piano and orchestra, Honegger
   Mr. Sanroma, pianist.
3. Quintet, for wind and strings.Prokofieff
4. Trois Poemes.....................Raval
   Maria Dormont
5. Music for the theater....Aaron Copland

Concert of "Modern Music, Pleasant and Unpleasant," by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, with explanatory remarks by Mr. Damrosch; soloist, Paul Kochanski. At Mecca Temple, Sunday afternoon.

PROGRAM

1. Memories of My Childhood (Life in a Russian village)..............Loeffler
2. Motion—
   (a) On the Rails—Pacific 231..Honegger
   (b) Through the Air.
   By an older modern composer
3. Three of the "Five Orchestral Pieces." Schoenberg
4. Sonata for two clarinets........Poulenc
   Messrs. Williams and Duques
5. Concerto for violin and orchestra. Prokofieff
   Mr. Kochanski
6. Dances—
   (a) Ragtime ....Stravinsky
   (b) "Nusch-Nuschi" dances...Hindemith
   (c) Waltz.By an older modern composer

If it were ever permissible for one concert-giver to refer in public to the doings of another concert-giver, Mr. Walter Damrosch might possibly have felt inclined to use as a text for his lecture-concert yesterday afternoon at Mecca Temple the program which his esteemed colleague, Mr. Koussevitzky, had played at the Town Hall the night before. But of course those things are never done. So it was left for such music-lovers as may have heard both concerts, and for those irresponsible gadflies, the reviewers, to make the suggested application.

Mr. Damrosch (who was at the top of his form) explained to his audience that his original purpose had been to hold a clinic on "ultra-modern music, pleasant and unpleasant," with the intention of exhibiting those modernists whom he respects as being sincerely desirous of extending the expressional boundaries of music, and those others whom he regards as merely imitators, having nothing to say, and using the fomulas of ultra-modernism without originality or conviction.

* * *

We suspect that some, at least, of the music performed by Mr. Koussevitzky at the League of Composers' concert would not have pleased Mr. Damrosch—that he would have seized upon it, if the conventions had allowed, as illustrating his point about the difference between the real and the imitation. For to tell the truth, the works disclosed by the League via Mr. Koussevitzky were unnourishing, to say the least. We suspect that Alexander Tansman, for example, does not realize how soon a formula becomes stale and intolerable unless it is continually revitalized by imagination.

Richard Strauss, let us say, could take over certain of the formulas which the music of the eighties and nineties
Wagner, living eness ch he
And into nself do that hord
in new ner

Stravinsky could do superb things with it—as in the middle section of the "Rondes Printanieres" from the "Sacre." Prokofieff was once able to exert it with amazing eloquence, as in the Finale of the Scythian Suite. Schönberg in "Pierrot Lunaire" and in the "Five Orchestra Pieces" (which Mr. Damrosch disappointingly reduced to three at yesterday's concert) has wrought marvelous effects by the imaginative use of opposed tonalities.

* * *

No, our too facile friends from Paris and their cronies and adherents cannot much longer get away with this trite conventionalism which they offer to us as "ultra-modernism." It isn't ultra-modernism at all. It isn't even modern. One of the few things that we regretted in Mr. Damrosch's lecture yesterday (which on the whole was admirably shrewd and tolerant) was his failure to make the very vital point that practically none of the familiar elements of ultra-modernism are new—that most of them, in fact, are very old.

Mr. Damrosch, of course, does not need to be told this; but perhaps some of his hearers might profitably have been reminded of it. He might have told them, for example, that this very device of conflicting tonalities is a great deal older than Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (the famous instance in which he recalled). That favorite expedient of contemporary musical radicals, from Casella to Stravinsky, from Bartok to von Webern—the simultaneous employment of major and minor thirds—may be found again and again in the music of the Tudor composers: in, for instance, the church music of Tallis, who died in 1585; in both the vocal and instrumental music of Gibbons (1583-1625)—see, for instance, his anthem, "If Ye Be Risen Again With Christ," and the fifth of his Fantasies for three viols.

* * *

If Mr. Damrosch wishes to be reminded of an example of opposed tonalities which is at least as "agonizing" (to use his own word) as anything in Schonberg, let him look through the collections of Byrd's madrigals; for example, in No. 32 of the 1588 set, where that carefree Elizabethan has deliberately flung a major third into the arms of a minor. Also, in Byrd's "Arise, Lord, Into Thy Rest" (1611), he overlays the key of A minor with the key of A major—exactly the trick that the ultra-modernists use with so glad a cry of discovery. And in order that no one may put such things down to an error, Byrd specifically gives warning in an "Epistle to the Reader," dated 1588, that his hearers may expect certain effects involving "jarre or dissonance," and conjures them not to account for such discords as misprints. It might be Stravinsky himself, or Schonberg, addressing the musical public of 1925 with a warning footnote. As for the notorious consecutive major sevenths of the clarinets in "Le Sacre du Printemps," another modernist formula, one will find them anticipated in music by the Restoration composers.

* * *

So we wish that Mr. Damrosch had taken time to make this essential point. It is true in music as in other fields that, as George Meredith succinctly remarked, "Our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms." No formula has merit in itself—neither the diminished seventh chord of Weber that Wagner transfigured, nor the chromaticisms that Strauss lifted out of "Tristan" and used in a new way, nor the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

NOV 30 1925

Saturday evening saw the inner brotherhood of ultra-modernites assembled at Town Hall, where the League of Composers held forth in a concert of works for small (chamber) orchestra, made up of Boston Symphony players under the ~~direction~~ of Sergei Koussevitzky. None of the music was downright unpleasant, but some of it seemed constrained, arbitrary, lacking in purely musical ideas, and not at all worth while, so far as public performance was concerned. All of it adhered to the manner and style called "ultra-modern," or "modernistic." Its idiom now is too familiar to need explanation.

Proceedings opened with "Sinfonietta," by Alexander Tausman, a young Pole living in Paris. The work had moments of thinly-disguised old-fashioned melody (considered a high crime among the modernists) and many compelling rhythms, which the drums did not allow one to forget. Arthur Honegger's "Concertino," for piano and orchestra, possessed a light and even witty touch, and revealed a slow movement of some lyrical appeal. The piano part was played sensitively by Jesus Sanroma.

Serge Prokofieff's quintet was beyond me, and to my benighted ears, "sound signifying nothing." Three songs by Ravel (set to Mallarme poems) proved to be delicate, hot-house music, somewhat on the order of Debussy.

"Music for the Theatre," a five-part suite by the young American, Aaron Copland, was, to my mind, the best number on the programme. It had atmosphere, feeling, imagination, technical skill—and a bully good idealized jazz movement recalling parts of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

* * *

Globe Nov 29

Music Notes and Comment

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts Jan 22 and 23 next, in the regular series. Mr Goossens will also conduct the concert Jan 18 in the Providence series, so that Mr Koussevitzky may enjoy a mid-season week of rest. Mr Goossens is a Belgian long settled in London as conductor and composer. Some of his music has figured on recital programs here in recent seasons.

◆◆◆◆◆

The program for the first Monday concert Dec 7 includes Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse," his "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan," and Brahms' First Symphony. There is no soloists, for the first time in this series.

◆◆◆◆◆

The new Tuesday series begins this week with almost every seat sold for the season in advance. The few remaining tickets go on public sale tomorrow morning. The first program brings the history down to Beethoven. It has been rumored that a lecturer would appear at these concerts to tell the audience what it ought to think. One hopes that this is erroneous. No lecturer can succeed in putting into words anything likely to be of use to people unable to like Mozart and Beethoven after hearing their music properly performed. No word of any lecturer has come from Symphony Hall.

◆◆◆◆◆

There are to be no soloists in the Tuesday series. Nor are any announced for later Monday concerts. In the regular series but six soloists are scheduled, of whom the first, Harold Bauer, will appear this week.

◆◆◆◆◆

Soloists have no place in a symphony concert, except when a work such as the Brahms piano concerto which Mr Bauer will play, demands an assisting artist. This is one of the very few concertos able to stand alone as music. It should appear from time to time on the programs like the other major works of Brahms, and when it does, a pianist is needed. But except in such cases as this soloists are needed at Symphony concerts only when the box office is in difficulties. Some people still fail to realize that the orchestra is itself the only solo instrument worth hearing.

◆◆◆◆◆

We are indebted to Mr Koussevitzky for banishing the superfluous soloists from Symphony concerts. This, like his prohibition of applause between the movements of symphonies and suites, is a great and long-needed improvement which no other conductor was able to bring about.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

NOV 30 1925

MUSIC

Koussevitzky as a High Priest of Modernism at League Concert

Serge Koussevitzky, after a matinee at Carnegie Hall directing the Boston Orchestra in some Russian music and Brahms's C minor sy phony, dropped down to the To Hall on Saturday evening with large part of the band and off ated as high priest at the la orgy of modernism devised by League of Composers.

The League's whole program was made up of music new to town, and a very considerable of it had precious little more t that about it as a reason for performance. To list the futile items of the evening of community of emly to tempted in his getting on it.

---

EVENING Amer

with so the Fre alien vi
But t young M he didn place to way of side hi to pape had no they wouldn

---

as time went on; his discipline w so severe and restraining that t playing of the orchestra gave eviden of what might be termed "faultfu faultless."

Gericke would not tolerate anythi that was not perfectly balanced a blended. If occasionally the orches felt like "cutting loose," up ca Gericke's left hand with a gentle firm sweep, and things died do again to tonal beauty and self-straint.

He was very sensitive to the ev varying conditions of acoustics whi prevail in concert halls. In his opi ion afternoon concerts sounded bett than evening performances, because the afternoons the concerts were a tended largely by ladies whose ga ments effected a softer and mo veiled quality of tone, as compa to the evening concerts when the ge tlemen came, wearing stiff shi which reflected sound more hars and therefore helped to make the t of the orchestra over-brilliant.

I have never known a conduc more devoted to the task of rehea ing. It became almost an obsess with Gericke, and often it would h pen that after a rehearsal he wo interrupt a conversation with: "I wo der what possessed that second vio player on the sixth stand to play natural instead of F flat in the 'F delio.' It must not happen again." O a few minutes later: "I would like know whether that man at the ba drum realized that he was much t loud in the final chord of the 'Pr ludes.' "

His devotion and sense of responsi bility knew no bounds. It is for all o us to pay tribute to the artist and man who was so extraordinarily gifted in the making of a splendid orchestra and who did so much to raise music in America to the highest level of artistic refinement.

FREDERICK A. STOCK,
Conductor of the Chicago Symphony
Orchestra.
Chicago, Nov. 22, 1925.

sic—By Lawrence Gilman

the Moderns, Koussevitzky rosch ue of Composers,

y conducting a
Boston Symphony
Sanroma, pianist, soprano. At the ut.
M exander Tansman
nd orchestra,
Honegger
pianist.
strings. Prokofieff
............Raval
mont
...Aaron Copland

sic, Pleasant and York Symphony
rosch conducting,
ks by Mr. Dam-
anski. At Mecca
n.
M hood (Life in
..........Loeffler
fic 231..Honegger
modern composer
estral Pieces."
Schoenberg
ts.......Poulenc and Duques
nd orchestra.
Prokofieff
nski
.......Stravinsky
nces...Hindemith
modern composer

nissible for one in public to the ncert-giver, Mr.
t possibly have a text for his ay afternoon at gram which his
r. Koussevitzky,
Hall the night
e those things vas left for such ave heard both e irresponsible
, to make the

was at the top to his audience
he had been to
-modern music,
t," with the in-hose modernists being sincerely
he expressional
d those others
erely imitators, and using the ernism without at least, of the

r. Koussevitzky
posers' concert
Mr. Damrosch—zed upon it, if owed, as illus-
the difference imitation. For ne works dis-via Mr. Kous-ing, to say the hat Alexander oes not realize omes stale and continually re-
n.
us say, could formulas which s and nineties
FROM Wagner, living
eness ch he
And into nself
do that hord
in new ner

the inner modernites all, where osers held works for stra, made ny players of Sergei the music asant, but onstrained, arely musi-all worth ic perform-
All of it
r and style or "modern-ow is too nation.
with "Sin-
r Tausman,
Paris. The
thinly-dis-melody (con-among the ny compellthe drums to forget.
"Concertino," ra, possessed witty touch, movement of The piano nsitively by quintet was ny benighted ng nothing."

avel (set to roved to be music, some-
Debussy.
Theatre," a the young Copland, was, best number
It had at-imagination, a bully good rement recallwin's "Rhap-

Stravinsky could do superb things with it—as in the middle section of the "Rondes Printanieres" from the "Sacre." Prokofieff was once able to exert it with amazing eloquence, as in the Finale of the Scythian Suite. Schönberg in "Pierrot Lunaire" and in the "Five Orchestra Pieces" (which Mr. Damrosch disappointingly reduced to three at yesterday's concert) has wrought marvelous effects by the imaginative use of opposed tonalities.

* * *

No, our too facile friends from Paris and their cronies and adherents cannot much longer get away with this trite conventionalism which they offer to us as "ultra-modernism." It isn't ultra-modernism at all. It isn't even modern. One of the few things that we regretted in Mr. Damrosch's lecture yesterday (which on the whole was admirably shrewd and tolerant) was his failure to make the very vital point that practically none of the familiar elements of ultra-modernism are new—that most of them, in fact, are very old.

Mr. Damrosch, of course, does not need to be told this; but perhaps some of his hearers might profitably have been reminded of it. He might have told them, for example, that this very device of conflicting tonalities is a great deal older than Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (the famous instance in which he recalled). That favorite expedient of contemporary musical radicals, from Casella to Stravinsky, from Bartok to von Webern—the simultaneous employment of major and minor thirds—may be found again and again in the music of the Tudor composers: in, for instance, the church music of Tallis, who died in 1585; in both the vocal and instrumental music of Gibbons (1583-1625)—see, for instance, his anthem, "If Ye Be Risen Again With Christ," and the fifth of his Fantasies for three viols.

* * *

If Mr. Damrosch wishes to be reminded of an example of opposed tonalities which is at least as "agonizing" (to use his own word) as anything in Schonberg, let him look through the collections of Byrd's madrigals; for example, in No. 32 of the 1588 set, where that carefree Elizabethan has deliberately flung a major third into the arms of a minor. Also, in Byrd's "Arise, Lord, Into Thy Rest" (1611), he overlays the key of A minor with the key of A major—exactly the trick that the ultra-modernists use with so glad a cry of discovery. And in order that no one may put such things down to an error, Byrd specifically gives warning in an "Epistle to the Reader," dated 1588, that his hearers may expect certain effects involving "jarre or dissonance," and conjures them not to account for such discords as misprints. It might be Stravinsky himself, or Schonberg, addressing the musical public of 1925 with a warning footnote. As for the notorious consecutive major sevenths of the clarinets in "Le Sacre du Printemps," another modernist formula, one will find them anticipated in music by the Restoration composers.

* * *

So we wish that Mr. Damrosch had taken time to make this essential point. It is true in music as in other fields that, as George Meredith succinctly remarked, "Our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms." No formula has merit in itself—neither the diminished seventh chord of Weber that Wagner transfigured, nor the chromaticisms that Strauss lifted out of "Tristan" and used in a new way, nor the

ORK CAN
O 1925

Globe Nov 29

Music Notes and Comment

Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts Jan 22 and 23 next, in the regular series. Mr Goossens will also conduct the concert Jan 18 in the Providence series, so that Mr Koussevitzky may enjoy a mid-season week of rest. Mr Goossens is a Belgian long settled in London as conductor and composer. Some of his music has figured on recital programs here in recent seasons.

◆

The program for the first Monday concert Dec 7 includes Liadov's "Fragment from the Apocalypse," his "Kikimora," a suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan," and Brahms' First Symphony. There is no soloists, for the first time in this series.

◆

The new Tuesday series begins this week with almost every seat sold for the season in advance. The few remaining tickets go on public sale tomorrow morning. The first program brings the history down to Beethoven. It has been rumored that a lecturer would appear at these concerts to tell the audience what it ought to think. One hopes that this is erroneous. No lecturer can succeed in putting into words anything likely to be of use to people unable to like Mozart and Beethoven after hearing their music properly performed. No word of any lecturer has come from Symphony Hall.

◆

There are to be no soloists in the Tuesday series. Nor are any announced for later Monday concerts. In the regular series but six soloists are scheduled, of whom the first, Harold Bauer, will appear this week.

◆

Soloists have no place in a symphony concert, except when a work such as the Brahms piano concerto which Mr Bauer will play, demands an assisting artist. This is one of the very few concertos able to stand alone as music. It should appear from time to time on the programs like the other major works of Brahms, and when it does, a pianist is needed. But except in such cases as this soloists are needed at Symphony concerts only when the box office is in difficulties. Some people still fail to realize that the orchestra is itself the only solo instrument worth hearing.

◆

We are indebted to Mr Koussevitzky for banishing the superfluous soloists from Symphony concerts. This, like his prohibition of applause between the movements of symphonies and suites, is a great and long-needed improvement which no other conductor was able to bring about.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
NOV 30 1925

there were a sinfonietta by the young Pole, Alexandre Tansman; a concertino for piano and small orchestra by Arthur Honegger, the leading light of the former "Groupe des six," and a double quintet by the young Russian, Serge Prokofieff.

A young American was the real hero of the evening. This was Aaron Copland, born in Brooklyn some twenty-five years ago, but now domiciled on this side of the river. His "Music for the Theatre," a kind of cyclic suite had more ideas, more vitality and more spontaniety than all the Polish, French and Russian stuff put together. It was even far more interesting than three very labored songs by Maurice Ravel, which dated back to the hoary antiquity of pre-war Debussyanism.

It was rather too bad that Mr. Copland's piece came at the very end of this lengthy aggregation of first-rate impotence and tenth-rate modernism. By that time one had grown so irritantly bored that it took a great deal to bring one to. However, Mr. Copland did it and we sat up and enjoyed his music.

It was written as recently as this past Summer. He had no specific theatrical matter in mind whilst he was at it and the thing is doubtless the better for having no set programme. It consists of a Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue and there is a remark-bly skillful use of community of theme that binds them all firmly together. The symphonic suite—for that is about what it amounts to—is more romantic than dramatic in spirit. There is a fresh and excellently inventive gift for orchestration displayed in it, an assurance in the handling of instrumentation rather astonishing in any one so young and so little experienced.

He makes an excursion into the possibilities of adaptive jazz in the Dance and the Burlesque, and both were most effective. The thing was the more striking, since Honegger, the Frenchman, had attempted something of the same sort in his concertino and succeeded in getting only a very rheumatic grip on it. The American was dealing with something he knew about and the Frenchman was fumbling in an alien vineyard.

But the chief impression left by young Mr. Copland's suite was that he didn't have to grope all over the place to find something to say or a way of saying it. He had music inside him before he started to put it to paper. Prokofieff and Tansman had nothing whatever to say, but they were gosh-darned if they wouldn't say it differently. The Prokofieff quintet is antic pose and nothing more. The Tansman sinfonietta is all-around-the-mulberry-bush.

Honegger, in his concertino, is the same Honegger of "Pacific 231" and "Le roi David"—always the sensationalist. You don't believe a note of his music. He almost gets apoplexy working himself up to odd effects of one kind or another, and they are forever and always put forth for their own sake alone. Mountebank music is the best name we can think of for it.

Mr. Koussevitzky apparently did wonders for all this modernism and his men were with him most of their abilities which, however, were not always quite equal to what they had to do. Jesus Sanroma, a young pianist attached to the orchestra, played the Honegger concertino very well and helped out in other matters. Maria Dormont, a soprano who was making her first appearance here, sang the Ravel songs, with their excruciatingly difficult intervals, in a way to gather in one's admiration. She has a pretty voice, light in calibre, but with a certain touch of limpidity that is delightful.

IRVING WEIL.

B'way 52 & 53 St's

there never existed a more exacting drill master than Gericke. His sense f balance of tone had become more acu as time went on; his discipline w so severe and restraining that t playing of the orchestra gave eviden of what might be termed "faultfu faultless."

Gericke would not tolerate anythi that was not perfectly balanced a blended. If occasionally the orchest felt like "cutting loose," up ca Gericke's left hand with a gentle b firm sweep, and things died do again to tonal beauty and self- straint.

He was very sensitive to the ev varying conditions of acoustics whi prevail in concert halls. In his opi ion afternoon concerts sounded bett than evening performances, because the afternoons the concerts were a tended largely by ladies whose ga ments effected a softer and mo veiled quality of tone, as compar to the evening concerts when the ge tlemen came, wearing stiff shi which reflected sound more harsh and therefore helped to make the t of the orchestra over-brilliant.

I have never known a conduc more devoted to the task of rehea ing. It became almost an obsess with Gericke, and often it would ha pen that after a rehearsal he wo interrupt a conversation with: "I wo der what possessed that second vio player on the sixth stand to play natural instead of F flat in the 'F delio.' It must not happen again." O a few minutes later: "I would like know whether that man at the ba drum realized that he was much t loud in the final chord of the 'Pr ludes.'"

His devotion and sense of respons bility knew no bounds. It is for all o us to pay tribute to the artist an man who was so extraordinarily gifte in the making of a splendid orchestr and who did so much to raise musi in America to the highest level o artistic refinement.

FREDERICK A. STOCK,
Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.
Chicago, Nov. 22, 1925.

NOV 3 0 1925

Music

Mr. Damrosch Talks, but Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts

THE League of Composers' concert this week end differed vitally from the New York Symphony concert in that the first organization braved the snickering and produced some genuine music, while Mr. Damrosch catered to the snickering and played very little music.

Mr. Damrosch took it upon himself to lecture on the works of the ultra-moderns, and, after sprinkling his talk with a few witticisms demonstrated the priciples of polytonality and atonaltiy. Then, carefully making the gesture of impartial judgment and pointing out that for all he knew these modern compositions might become great and standard works of art, he proceeded to play them in a wooden, unthoughtful and unimaginative manner—a manner which if applied to Beethoven himself would leave the master's music meaningless.

To illustrate Honegger's work, Mr. Damrosch played "Pacific 231" and demonstrated that though he understood the simpler effort to portray the laborious, giant breath of a locomotive and its superficial rhythm he either did not understand or did not care to bring out the sharp, jarring, overwhelming rhythm the work develops. Last year Mr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Orchestra in the same work, and Honegger's conception of relentless, mechanical cruelty stood out alive and vital.

As though to prove his lack, Mr. Damrosch then played for contrast a work of "an older modern composer" designed to show the pupils in the audience that motion could be expressed just as well in a more conservative medium—and what do you think it was? Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries!" One might just as well point to Corot to prove that he could paint gardens as well as Monet—but the gesture would be pointless.

Honegger was represented on Mr. Koussevitzky's program at the League of Composers Saturday by a concertino for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Jesus Sanroma at the piano. This work, played subtly and conducted with finesse, illustrated a newer development in the composer which takes him away from heavier, slowly thoughtful composition to the lighter satirical vein of "The Six." He uses a banal, simply melodic figure on the piano and embroiders it with a hee-hawing, almost lewd orchestration in the jazz idiom.

Prokofieff was represented on both programs with equal futility. Mr. Paul Kochanski displayed some Manual fireworks as the soloist for this composer's Concerto in D at Mr. Damrosch's concert, but the work seemed just as vague and lacking in vibrancy as his Quintet on the League's program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program included also a new Sinfonietta by Alexandre Tansman in the usual polyphonic idiom. The first two movements, an Allegro and Scherzo, had very little to say. The Notturno began to develop an exotic theme and a strange, heavy perfume-laden mood and then was frittered away. The final Fugue and Toccata revealed a rather garish and cheap theme that grew into a brilliant design which seemed to require a larger orchestra for its full effect.

A series of songs by Ravel to poems of Mallarme were sung delicately, poignantly and with competent phrasing by Maria Dormont.

The finale of the League's concert was "Music for the Theatre" by Aaron Copland, a young American for whose work Mr. Damrosch has already graciously and superiorly apologized in public. Far from being ultra modern, this composition seems to revert to an impressionist mood, although it continues the polytonal tradition. If the work becomes famous, an entirely possible development, it will be due to the remarkable sense of the glamour, the golden, artificial glow of the theatre, the strident burlesque and the intense color and dance and motion it contains; for these all have the smell of the theatre, its foolish eagerness and its vitality. Mr. Copland does not hesitate to employ the most melodic orchestration at times—nor does he balk at the blaring trumpets of the "Burlesque" and the "Prologue."

Certainly Mr. Copland's versatility here should begin to make Mr. Damrosch suspect that he is not explaining the bite, the stinging, acid life of modern music by repeating "polytonal, atonal, polytonal, atonal."

For purposes of record the New York Symphony also played Schoenberg's "Five Orchestral Pieces," Poulenc's "Clarinet Sonata," Stravinsky's "Ragtime," Hindemuth's "Nusch-Nuschi Tanze," Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood" and, for some strange, weird reason, Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz.

EXALTED PENSION CONCERT

Post — Nov 23.

Great Choral Ninth Given as Never Before

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The greater the music, the greater is the opportunity of the interpreter, and never did Mr. Koussevitzky seem more the towering musical and personal figure than yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe through a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a performance given, together with its duplicate of this evening, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

CONTENTION OVER FINALE

For years has the Ninth Symphony been a bone of contention among musicians. Not a few have held it to be the crown of Beethoven's life-work, and indeed of all music. Others have granted the greatness of the three purely instrumental movements and yet have questioned the success of the choral Finale, urging that its adoption was but an after-thought on the part of the composer, and holding that the awkward writing for chorus and soloists as well as the somewhat fragmentary and episodic treatment of this final movement prevent it from taking rank with Beethoven's greatest achievements.

Hear the Ninth Symphony in the average performance, and the arguments of these objectors seem well founded. Yet to have heard the performance of yesterday, a performance in which the conductor's will and spirit as a scorching flame consumed all obstacles and difficulties, was to hear the choral Finale vested with all the greatness of Beethoven's conception, to hear it, not as an imperfectly realized effort, but as a triumphant accomplishment and to believe it to be after all, music's noblest and brightest page.

Singers and Players Sublime

To speak of the technical details of such a performance were almost an impertinence. It is more fitting merely to say that yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky recreated Beethoven's music. In doubt and mystery began the first movement; in triumph and in affirmation it ended. Irresistible was the rhythmic force and impulse of the Scherzo. The Adagio soared to heights of contemplative beauty while, to repeat, the Finale was for once the true capstone of the whole.

How meaningful and how significant was that celebrated récitative of the basses which rejects in turn the themes of the preceding three movements and accepts with delight the mighty, joyous melody of the choral conclusion. How subtly handled was the advent of the military music, how discreetly treated these martial measures, a passage often questioned, which yesterday seemed beyond reproach. And above all how successfully the chorus and the four soloists, Mesdames Vreeland and Van der Veer, Messrs. Stretton and Patton, coped with their often difficult and ungrateful measures.

Trained by Mr. Woodworth

Trained in Dr. Davison's absence by his temporary successor, Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth, and rehearsed and inspired by Mr. Koussevitzky, the chorus was yesterday a nobly sonorous body of singers who sang this music, not as a trying task, but as though it were but natural outlet for their own emotions and enthusiasms.

Throughout the performance an audience which completely filled the hall listened intent and absorbed, and at the end found release in long-continued applause for Mr. Koussevitzky and for the soloists, chorus and orchestra that had served him so well.

NEW SYMPHONY SERIES

Herald Nov 22

The first program announced for the new historical series of Boston Symphony concerts on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1. Including the first great symphonic composers, it will consist of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the prelude to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C minor of Beethoven.

The following list of composers (most of whom will be represented) will indicate the nature and period of the remaining programs. The second program—Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz; the third program—Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Franck, Saint-Saens; the fourth program—Strauss, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Sibelius, Moussorgsky, Glinka, Grieg the fifth program—Schoenberg, Ravel, Honegger, Bax, MacDowell, Stravinsky, Prokovieff.

Although these concerts are for the most part fully subscribed to, season tickets are still available for this series

---

MEMORANDA OF MUSIC

Transcript — Nov 30

Bettered Bostonians

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and Mr. Koussevitzky have made their first visit of the season to New York. They played there on Thursday and on Saturday last, traversing Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; Brahms's First Symphony, in C-minor; Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" from concerts of last winter in Boston; Monsieur Ibert's impressionistic "Escales"; Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major; Lyadov's "Apocalypse" and "Kikimora"; the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." To the more novel numbers of the two programs the reviewers gave short shrift. Only Mr. Eichheim's piece—and not always it—escapes rather scornful dismissal. About the performance of the two symphonies, however, The Herald-Tribune wrote with its usual discernment and discrimination:

> It would not be quite true to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's conveyance of the great score [Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"] fulfilled at every point our own notions as to how this or that passage should be read. There were many divergences from the normal in his treatment of tempi, of phrasing, of dynamics, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Koussevitzky did not intend his brasses to protrude so egregiously as they did in the approach to the climax of the Finale. But we are quite willing to forget a blemish or two of that sort. And as for the eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitzky's very personol interpretation, they do not really trouble us at all. If that is the way he feels it, well and good. The point is that he feels it, quite obviously, with consuming intensity; that he makes a superb and living thing of the music, an overwhelming communication. That is enough. . . .
>
> Doubtless there were stern symphonic detectives who followed Mr. Koussevitzky's performance [of Brahms's First Symphony] with a metronome, stop-watch and flashlight; and doubtless, if they were academically minded, they were not wholly content. But there were others in Carnegie Hall who relished this strongly individualized reading. They liked Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive phrasing at the end of the Andante, which was poetic without being sentimental. They liked his impressive conception of the slow introduction to the Finale; they were grateful to him for giving due weight and gravity to the magnificent chorale passage in the coda (even though his tempo here was not in accordance with the score). Above all, they liked Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony because it was untrammelled and alive. Not all of this conductor's floutings of tradition are persuasive; but on this occasion his indifference o the rules made many friends for him. Their testimony of approval at the close of the performance was unmistakable.

With one accord also, the reviewers were quick to discover the bettered quality of the orchestra. In the ears of The Tribune-Herald, "it played both novelties ['A Chinese Legend' and 'Escales'] exceedingly well—brilliantly, indeed; and in the second movement of Ibert's suite the new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, was able to disclose his skill, his taste, his beauty of tone." The Sun counted the performance of the Chinese ballet "a veritable triumph of orchestral virtuosity" and in the Brandenburg concerto noted "the fine sonority of the strings" and the evident enjoyment of all concerned. The World discovered the orchestra "much improved." The Times found the playing "more precise, vivid and electric." More than ever, it remarked, the Boston Orches-

Continued on Following Page

TO GIVE NINTH SYMPHONY SUNDAY

Traveler — Nov 21

Edmond Boucher to Sing with People's Orchestra

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund, in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon and Monday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Overture to Egmont. All reserved seats having been taken for both performances, the usual rule at Symphony concerts will be waived and standing room sold.

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 4 and 5. The program will include Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture; the same composer's First Pianoforte Concerto in D-minor, with Harold Mauer as the soloist; Loeffler's Symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood"; and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

The first program is announced for the new Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony concerts, for which season tickets are still available. It will include Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the Praeludium to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

Guest Conductor [illegible] Symphony

Traveler Nov 2

Eu[illegible], the celebrated Engli[illegible] composer, is to ap-p[illegible] gu[illegible]ductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will visit Boston for this purpose for the week of Jan. 17, thus giving Mr. Koussevitzky a mid-season rest, and conduct the regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Jan. 22 and 23, and the concert in Providence on the previous Tuesday. He is now in America as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra. It is by courtesy of Mr. Eastman, the director of the Eastman School of Music, that Mr. Goosens will visit Boston.

Of Belgian parentage, Mr. Goosens was born in England. He was associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham in the latter's orchestra from 1915-1920. Since then he has conducted the London Symphony orchestra on notable occasions, and likewise in opera and ballet. Goosens made his first visit to America to conduct the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra in 1923.

Advertiser Nov 21

AMERICAN MUSIC SCORES HIT ON SYMPHONY BILL

Aaron Copland, an American composer who writes in the ultra-modern style, but still apes none of his foreign contemporaries, was one of the heroes of yesterday's Symphony concert.

His "Music for the Theatre" suite, played here for the first time, was applauded until he had come forth three times to make his acknowledgments.

The novel, singular charm of the piece pleased the younger Symphony patrons particularly. The performance was the perfection of technic and sympathy. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with evident enjoyment.

After the performance of Bee- [illegible] fourth symphony

"SCHEHEREZADE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Nov 14

Rimsky Korsakov's Suite Delights Audience

The chief number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was Rimsky, Korsakov's familiar symphonic suite "Scheherezade." The audience was greatly pleased with a performance in which every point was overemphasized.

The novelty of the afternoon, a Sinfonietta for small orchestra by Alexander Tansman, played for the first time in America, proved uninteresting, not especially well written in a rather acrid modernist idiom. Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy and very romantically interpreted, had a substance as well as a glamour one would not expect from a professed ironist, the composer of other music to be played, according to his directions, "like a nightingale with the toothache," or "with hands in the pockets." But Satie presumably won the respect of his Parisian contemporaries such as Debussy and Ravel by something more musical than irony. Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," the remaining number, again seemed a noisy and not amusingly vulgar piece.

Tansman is a Pole, not yet out of his 20s, who has migrated from his native Lodz to Paris. He seems to have written almost as much as Schubert had produced at the same age. The sinfonietta heard yesterday lacks salient and individual themes. The development is occasionally ingenious, more often loose jointed and careless. It is clumsily scored, at least by comparison with such works for small orchestra as Richard Strauss' "Buerrger als Edelmann" suite. Why overwork the piano in a small orchestra, with which its tone does not blend? M Tansman might profit by careful study of the orchestration of Ravel and Stravinsky. If he would write less and polish more, his work might amount to something.

Satie's "Gymnopedies" are brief elegiac slow movements, with beautiful if rather shapeless melodies. Debussy's orchestration is miraculously skillful. The original piano pieces were writen in 1887, so that unless Debussy tampered with the harmonies in this version, they prove that Satie's harmonic originality must have influenced the composer of "The Afternoon of a Faun" strongly. The performance, at a tempo notably slower than Mr Mason used at the People's Symphony the other day, was impressive. But no doubt Koussevitzky was as usual making the indication "Lent" (slow) synonymous with a snail's pace.

Koussevitzky's version of "Scheherezade" is different from those of Muck and Monteux. He stresses the languors and emphasizes the frenzies of the music. He makes Rimsky Korsakov melodramatic, almost hysterical, in Tchaikovsky's vein. The finale at his hands becomes an orgy of rhythm, a brutal assault on the nervous system. The effect is thrilling, but is it art?

One had thought of this music as artificial, as hardly more emotional than the figures on a Chinese vase. But instead of charmingly sophisticated light music one heard yesterday a slice of life from "Arabian Nights." One prefers the less emotional and more graceful way of taking this music.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," written for piano and orchestrated noisily but effectively by his friend, the noted conductor Mottl, was presumably intended to recall to the hearer's mind pictures, almost caricatures, of rustic peasant revelry, after the fashion of the scherzo in Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." But the piece is a mere tour de force, full of sound and fury.

Next week the program announced includes Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Copland's "Theatre Music" and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan."

P. R.

SYMPHONY GIVES COPLAND SUIT

153

"Music for the Theatre Is Played Here for First Time

Herald Nov 21

YOUNG COMPOSER IS WARMLY APPLAUDE

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Bosto Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzk conductor, took place yesterday after noon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven Symphony No. 4; Copland, "Music fo the Theatre" in five movements (firs performance); Wagner, Prelude an "Love Death" from Tristan and Isolde

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony wa produced at Vienna in 1807. Those wh are now dismayed, not to say, disguste when they hear contemporaneous musi of an unusual character may like t know what was said about thi symphony by men of a certain authorit before Beethoven died.

The first movement wrote one disgruntled person is "full of short detached ideas without relation one to another—three or four notes every quarte hour,, which is interesting! Then muffled drum-roll and mysterious viol phrases all ornamented with a crow of general pauses and rests; then afte the hearer is resigned by long waiting the Allegro, a ferocious movement i which especial care is taken that n principal thought is exposed."

Who wrote so absurdly? He was no a reactionary; he was not a poor devi of a music critic, a hack reviewing concerts for a daily newspaper. H was no less a person than the grea

Carl Maria von Weber, who [illegible] a bit of a Philistine.

When this symphony was played a Cassel in the season of 1815-16, a accomplished critic thus freed hi mind: "It seems to me that the grea master, in this as in several of hi new works, is extremely bizarre an makes himself unintelligible and eve an object of terror to even cultivate dilettanti."

This leads us to consider the ca of Mr. Copland of New York, whos suite was performed for the first tim and from manuscript. The movement are entitled: Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. Mr. Coplan says that he had no play, no literar idea in mind when he composed th suite. "The title simply implies that, a times, this music has a quality whicl is suggestive of the theatre." The suit is for a small orchestra, curiously composed.

Mr. Copland is a young composer indisputable talent. He has the grea gift of imagination. He can be realisti in a wild way; he can be tenderly poeti If his "Dance" reminds one of Wa Whitman's line: "Onward we move, gay gang of blackguards! with mirt shouting music and wild-flapping pen nants of joy!" in his "Prologue," "Interlude" and "Epilogue" is the admir able expression of a contemplativ mood, music of pure beauty without th taint of sensuousness, without an in congruous episode of churned-up emo tion.

This suite is a more important wor than his symphony for orchestra organ played here last season. Th material has greater significance; th treatment is firmer, less experimental In the Suite Mr. Copland has much t say and he knows how he should say it. His instrumental combinations a well as his harmonic schemes were no put together at random; they were deliberately, knowingly planned.

But some one may object to the en trance of "jazz" in a symphonic con cert room. American life with its rest lessness, its haste, its snapping-of fingers at ideals and spiritual thing its extravagance is "jazz." Why shoul not one movement in a suite be sym bolic of American life as it now is? A for the "Burlesque," it is what its nam implies.

"Music for the theatre," one of th most interesting of the modern work that have been produced here, severel taxes the players in the matter of n trances and by the frequently shiftin rhythms. It makes unusual demand on solo players and on the ensembl One might mention by name and in tur Messrs. Gillet, Mager, Allegra, Speyer Laus, Battles, Vannoni, the busie player of percussion instruments an so on, but this would be invidious, f the small orchestra was collectively virtuoso. Mr. Koussevitsky had take infinite pains at rehearsal to ensure brilliant performance, for he think highly of the Suite and the composer future. The audience was enthusiast Mr. Copland was called to the platfo several times; he, Mr. Koussevitsky a the orchestra shared alike the long continued applause.

The overture was played in a mas terly manner, as was the symphon Even the most confident hearer wh knows how Beethoven wished his musi to be played, even the hearer in whos breast the spirit of Beethoven dwel lovingly and informingly, could not hav found fault with Mr. Koussevitzky's in terpretation. There is chatter, we be lieve, about "objective" and "subjec tive" readings of the classics. Give u a man who first of all imparts fres interest to that which is familiar wit out having recourse to extravagance willful vagaries.

An eloquent performance of Wagne music brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonig The orchestra will be out of town n week. The program of Dec. 4-5 will Brahms's "Academic Festival," o ture and piano concert. No. 1 Bauer, pianist); Loeffler, symp poem, "Memories of My Chi (first time here); Ravel, Su from "Daphnis and Chloe."

NOV 3 0 1925

Music

Mr. Damrosch Talks, but Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts

THE League of Composers' concert this week end differed vitally from the New York Symphony concert in that the first organization braved the snickering and produced some genuine music, while Mr. Damrosch catered to the snickering and played very little music.

Mr. Damrosch took it upon himself to lecture on the works of the ultra-moderns, and, after sprinkling his talk with a few witticisms demonstrated the priciples of polytonality and atonaltiy. Then, carefully making the gesture of impartial judgment and pointing out that for all he knew these modern compositions might become great and standard works of art, he proceeded to play them in a wooden, unthoughtful and unimaginative manner—a manner which if applied to Beethoven himself would leave the master's music meaningless.

To illustrate Honegger's work, Mr. Damrosch played "Pacific 231" and demonstrated that though he understood the simpler effort to portray the laborious, giant breath of a locomotive and its superficial rhythm he either did not understand or did not care to bring out the sharp, jarring, overwhelming rhythm the work develops. Last year Mr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Orchestra in the same work, and Honegger's conception of relentless, mechanical cruelty stood out alive and vital.

As though to prove his lack, Mr. Damrosch then played for contrast a work of "an older modern composer" designed to show the pupils in the audience that motion could be expressed just as well in a more conservative medium—and what do you think it was? Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries!" One might just as well point to Corot to prove that he could paint gardens as well as Monet—but the gesture would be pointless.

Honegger was represented on Mr. Koussevitzky's program at the League of Composers Saturday by a concertino for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Jesus Sanroma at the piano. This work, played subtly and conducted with finesse, illustrated a newer development in the composer which takes him away from heavier, slowly thoughtful composition to the lighter satirical vein of "The Six." He uses a banal, simply melodic figure on the piano and embroiders it with a hee-hawing, almost lewd orchestration in the jazz idiom.

Prokofieff was represented on both programs with equal futility. Mr. Paul Kochanski displayed some Manual fireworks as the soloist for this composer's Concerto in D at Mr. Damrosch's concert, but the work seemed just as vague and lacking in vibrancy as his Quintet on the League's program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program included also a new Sinfonietta by Alexandre Tansman in the usual polyphonic idiom. The first two movements, an Allegro and Scherzo, had very little to say. The Notturno began to develop an exotic theme and a strange, heavy perfume-laden mood and then was frittered away. The final Fugue and Toccata revealed a rather garish and cheap theme that grew into a brilliant design which seemed to require a larger orchestra for its full effect.

A series of songs by Ravel to poems of Mallarme were sung delicately, poignantly and with competent phrasing by Maria Dormont.

The finale of the League's concert was "Music for the Theatre" by Aaron Copland, a young American for whose work Mr. Damrosch has already graciously and superiorly apologized in public. Far from being ultra modern, this composition seems to revert to an impressionist mood, although it continues the polytonal tradition. If the work becomes famous, an entirely possible development, it will be due to the remarkable sense of the glamour, the golden, artificial glow of the theatre, the strident burlesque and the intense color and dance and motion it contains; for these all have the smell of the theatre, its foolish eagerness and its vitality. Mr. Copland does not hesitate to employ the most melodic orchestration at times—nor does he balk at the blaring trumpets of the "Burlesque" and the "Prologue."

Certainly Mr. Copland's versatility here should begin to make Mr. Damrosch suspect that he is not explaining the bite, the stinging, acid life of modern music by repeating "polytonal, atonal, polytonal, atonal."

For purposes of record the New York Symphony also played Schoenberg's "Five Orchestral Pieces," Poulenc's "Clarinet Sonata," Stravinsky's "Ragtime," Hindemuth's "Nusch-Nuschi Tanze," Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood" and, for some strange, weird reason, Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz.

EXALTED PENSION CONCERT

Post — Nov 23.

Great Choral Ninth Given as Never Before

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The greater the music, the greater is the opportunity of the interpreter, and never did Mr. Koussevitzky seem more the towering musical and personal figure than yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe through a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a performance given, together with its duplicate of this evening, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

CONTENTION OVER FINALE

For years has the Ninth Symphony been a bone of contention among musicians. Not a few have held it to be the crown of Beethoven's life-work, and indeed of all music. Others have granted the greatness of the three purely instrumental movements and yet have questioned the success of the choral Finale, urging that its adoption was but an after-thought on the part of the composer, and holding that the awkward writing for chorus and soloists as well as the somewhat fragmentary and episodic treatment of this final movement prevent it from taking rank with Beethoven's greatest achievements.

Hear the Ninth Symphony in the average performance, and the arguments of these objectors seem well founded. Yet to have heard the performance of yesterday, a performance in which the conductor's will and spirit as a scorching flame consumed all obstacles and difficulties, was to hear the choral Finale vested with all the greatness of Beethoven's conception, to hear it, not as an imperfectly realized effort, but as a triumphant accomplishment and to believe it to be after all, music's noblest and brightest page.

Singers and Players Sublime

To speak of the technical details of such a performance were almost an impertinence. It is more fitting merely to say that yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky recreated Beethoven's music. In doubt and mystery began the first movement; in triumph and in affirmation it ended. Irresistible was the rhythmic force and impulse of the Scherzo. The Adagio soared to heights of contemplative beauty while, to repeat, the Finale was for once the true capstone of the whole.

How meaningful and how significant was that celebrated récitative of the basses which rejects in turn the themes of the preceding three movements and accepts with delight the mighty, joyous melody of the choral conclusion. How subtly handled was the advent of the military music, how discreetly treated these martial measures, a passage often questioned, which yesterday seemed beyond reproach. And above all how successfully the chorus and the four soloists, Mesdames Vreeland and Van der Veer, Messrs. Stretton and Patton, coped with their often difficult and ungrateful measures.

Trained by Mr. Woodworth

Trained in Dr. Davison's absence by his temporary successor, Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth, and rehearsed and inspired by Mr. Koussevitzky, the chorus was yesterday a nobly sonorous body of singers who sang this music, not as a trying task, but as though it were but natural outlet for their own emotions and enthusiasms.

Throughout the performance an audience which completely filled the hall listened intent and absorbed, and at the end found release in long-continued applause for Mr. Koussevitzky and for the soloists, chorus and orchestra that had served him so well.

NEW SYMPHONY SERIES

Herald Nov 22

The first program announced for the new historical series of Boston Symphony concerts on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1. Including the first great symphonic composers, it will consist of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the prelude to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C minor of Beethoven.

The following list of composers (most of whom will be represented) will indicate the nature and period of the remaining programs. The second program—Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz; the third program—Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Franck, Saint-Saens; the fourth program—Strauss, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Sibelius, Moussorgsky, Glinka, Grieg the fifth program—Schoenberg, Ravel, Honegger, Bax, MacDowell, Stravinsky, Prokovieff.

Although these concerts are for the most part fully subscribed to, season tickets are still available for this series.

MEMORANDA OF MUSIC

Transcript — Nov 30

Bettered Bostonians

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and Mr. Koussevitzky have made their first visit of the season to New York. They played there on Thursday and on Saturday last, traversing Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; Brahms's First Symphony, in C-minor; Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" from concerts of last winter in Boston; Monsieur Ibert's impressionistic "Escales"; Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major; Lyadov's "Apocalypse" and "Kikimora"; the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." To the more novel numbers of the two programs the reviewers gave short shrift. Only Mr. Eichheim's piece—and not always it—escapes rather scornful dismissal. About the performance of the two symphonies, however, The Herald-Tribune wrote with its usual discernment and discrimination:

> It would not be quite true to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's conveyance of the great score [Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"] fulfilled at every point our own notions as to how this or that passage should be read. There were many divergences from the normal in his treatment of tempi, of phrasing, of dynamics, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Koussevitzky did not intend his brasses to protrude so egregiously as they did in the approach to the climax of the Finale. But we are quite willing to forget a blemish or two of that sort. And as for the eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitzky's very personol interpretation, they do not really trouble us at all. If that is the way he feels it, well and good. The point is that he feels it, quite obviously, with consuming intensity; that he makes a superb and living thing of the music, an overwhelming communication. That is enough. . . .
>
> Doubtless there were stern symphonic detectives who followed Mr. Koussevitzky's performance [of Brahms's First Symphony] with a metronome, stop-watch and flashlight; and doubtless, if they were academically minded, they were not wholly content. But there were others in Carnegie Hall who relished this strongly individualized reading. They liked Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive phrasing at the end of the Andante, which was poetic without being sentimental. They liked his impressive conception of the slow introduction to the Finale; they were grateful to him for giving due weight and gravity to the magnificent chorale passage in the coda (even though his tempo here was not in accordance with the score). Above all, they liked Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony because it was untrammelled and alive. Not all of this conductor's floutings of tradition are persuasive; but on this occasion his indifference o the rules made many friends for him. Their testimony of approval at the close of the performance was unmistakable.

With one accord also, the reviewers were quick to discover the bettered quality of the orchestra. In the ears of The Tribune-Herald, "it played both novelties ['A Chinese Legend' and 'Escales'] exceedingly well—brilliantly, indeed; and in the second movement of Ibert's suite the new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, was able to disclose his skill, his taste, his beauty of tone." The Sun counted the performance of the Chinese ballet "a veritable triumph of orchestral virtuosity" and in the Brandenburg concerto noted "the fine sonority of the strings" and the evident enjoyment of all concerned. The World discovered the orchestra "much improved." The Times found the playing "more precise, vivid and electric." More than ever, it remarked, the Boston Orches-

Continued on Following Page

TO GIVE NINTH SYMPHONY SUNDAY

Traveler — Nov 21

Edmond Boucher to Sing with People's Orchestra

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund, in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon and Monday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Overture to Egmont. All reserved seats having been taken for both performances, the usual rule at Symphony concerts will be waived and standing room sold.

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 4 and 5. The program will include Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture; the same composer's First Pianoforte Concerto in D-minor, with Harold Mauer as the soloist; Loeffler's Symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood"; and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

The first program is announced for the new Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony concerts, for which season tickets are still available. It will include Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the Praeludium to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

Guest Conductor for Symphony

Traveler Nov 21

Eu[illegible]s, the celebrated Engl[illegible] con[illegible]d composer, is to ap-p[illegible] gu[illegible]nductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will visit Boston for this purpose for the week of Jan. 17, thus giving Mr. Koussevitzky a mid-season rest, and conduct the regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Jan. 22 and 23, and the concert in Providence on the previous Tuesday. He is now in America as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra. It is by courtesy of Mr. Eastman, the director of the Eastman School of Music, that Mr. Goosens will visit Boston.

Of Belgian parentage, Mr. Goosens was born in England. He was associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham in the latter's orchestra from 1915-1920. Since then he has conducted the London Symphony orchestra on notable occasions, and likewise in opera and ballet. Goosens made his first visit to America to conduct the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra in 1923.

Advertiser Nov 21

AMERICAN MUSIC SCORES HIT ON SYMPHONY BILL

Aaron Copland, an American composer who writes in the ultra-modern style, but still apes none of his foreign contemporaries, was one of the heroes of yesterday's Symphony concert.

His "Music for the Theatre" suite, played here for the first time, was applauded until he had come forth three times to make his acknowledgments.

The novel, singular charm of the piece pleased the younger Symphony patrons particularly. The performance was the perfection of technic and sympathy. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with evident enjoyment.

After the performance of Bee- fourth symphony

"SCHEHEREZADE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Nov 14

Rimsky Korsakov's Suite Delights Audience

The chief number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was Rimsky Korsakov's familiar symphonic suite "Scheherezade." The audience was greatly pleased with a performance in which every point was overemphasized.

The novelty of the afternoon, a Sinfonietta for small orchestra by Alexander Tansman, played for the first time in America, proved uninteresting, not especially well written in a rather acrid modernist idiom. Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy and very romantically interpreted, had a substance as well as a glamour one would not expect from a professed ironist, the composer of other music to be played, according to his directions, "like a nightingale with the toothache," or "with hands in the pockets." But Satie presumably won the respect of his Parisian contemporaries such as Debussy and Ravel by something more musical than irony. Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," the remaining number, again seemed a noisy and not amusingly vulgar piece.

Tansman is a Pole, not yet out of his 20s, who has migrated from his native Lodz to Paris. He seems to have written almost as much as Schubert had produced at the same age. The sinfonietta heard yesterday lacks salient and individual themes. The development is occasionally ingenious, more often loose jointed and careless. It is clumsily scored, at least by comparison with such works for small orchestra as Richard Strauss' "Buerrger als Edelmann" suite. Why overwork the piano in a small orchestra, with which its tone does not blend? M Tansman might profit by careful study of the orchestration of Ravel and Stravinsky. If he would write less and polish more, his work might amount to something.

Satie's "Gymnopedies" are brief elegiac slow movements, with beautiful if rather shapeless melodies. Debussy's orchestration is miraculously skillful. The original piano pieces were writen in 1887, so that unless Debussy tampered with the harmonies in this version, they prove that Satie's harmonic originality must have influenced the composer of "The Afternoon of a Faun" strongly. The performance, at a tempo notably slower than Mr Mason used at the People's Symphony the other day, was impressive. But no doubt Koussevitzky was as usual making the indication "Lent" (slow) synonymous with a snail's pace.

Koussevitzky's version of "Scheherezade" is different from those of Muck and Monteux. He stresses the languors and emphasizes the frenzies of the music. He makes Rimsky Korsakov melodramatic, almost hysterical, in Tchaikovsky's vein. The finale at his hands becomes an orgy of rhythm, a brutal assault on the nervous system. The effect is thrilling, but is it art?

One had thought of this music as artificial, as hardly more emotional than the figures on a Chinese vase. But instead of charmingly sophisticated light music one heard yesterday a slice of life from "Arabian Nights." One prefers the less emotional and more graceful way of taking this music.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," written for piano and orchestrated noisily but effectively by his friend, the noted conductor Mottl, was presumably intended to recall to the hearer's mind pictures, almost caricatures, of rustic peasant revelry, after the fashion of the scherzo in Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." But the piece is a mere tour de force, full of sound and fury.

Next week the program announced includes Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Copland's "Theatre Music" and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan."

P. R.

SYMPHONY GIVES COPLAND SUIT

153

"Music for the Theatre Is Played Here for First Time

Herald Nov 21

YOUNG COMPOSER IS WARMLY APPLAUDE

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Bosto Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday after noon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven Symphony No. 4; Copland, "Music fo the Theatre" in five movements (firs performance); Wagner, Prelude an "Love Death" from Tristan and Isolde

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony wa produced at Vienna in 1807. Those wh are now dismayed, not to say, disguste when they hear contemporaneous musi of an unusual character may like t know what was said about thi symphony by men of a certain authorit before Beethoven died.

The first movement wrote one disgruntled person is "full of short detached ideas without relation one to another—three or four notes every quarte hour,, which is interesting! Then muffled drum-roll and mysterious viol phrases all ornamented with a crowd of general pauses and rests; then afte the hearer is resigned by long waiting the Allegro, a ferocious movement i which especial care is taken that n principal thought is exposed."

Who wrote so absurdly? He was no a reactionary; he was not a poor devi of a music critic, a hack reviewing concerts for a daily newspaper. H was no less a person than the grea Carl Maria von Weber, who w a bit of a Philistine.

When this symphony was played a Cassel in the season of 1815-16, a accomplished critic thus freed hi mind: "It seems to me that the grea master, in this as in several of hi new works, is extremely bizarre an makes himself unintelligible and eve an object of terror to even cultivate dilettanti."

This leads us to consider the ca of Mr. Copland of New York, whos suite was performed for the first tim and from manuscript. The movement are entitled: Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. Mr. Coplan says that he had no play, no literar idea in mind when he composed th suite. "The title simply implies that, a times, this music has a quality which is suggestive of the theatre." The suit is for a small orchestra, curiously composed.

Mr. Copland is a young composer c indisputable talent. He has the grea gift of imagination. He can be realisti in a wild way; he can be tenderly poeti If his "Dance" reminds one of Wal Whitman's line: "Onward we move, gay gang of blackguards! with mirth shouting music and wild-flapping pennants of joy!" in his "Prologue," "Interlude" and "Epilogue" is the admirable expression of a contemplativ mood, music of pure beauty without th taint of sensuousness, without an incongruous episode of churned-up emotion.

This suite is a more important work than his symphony for orchestra organ played here last season. Th material has greater significance; th treatment is firmer, less experimental in the Suite Mr. Copland has much to say and he knows how he should say it. His instrumental combinations as well as his harmonic schemes were not put together at random; they were deliberately, knowingly planned.

But some one may object to the entrance of "jazz" in a symphonic concert room. American life with its restlessness, its haste, its snapping-of fingers at ideals and spiritual things its extravagance is "jazz." Why shoul not one movement in a suite be symbolic of American life as it now is? As for the "Burlesque," it is what its name implies.

"Music for the theatre," one of the most interesting of the modern work that have been produced here, severel taxes the players in the matter of n trances and by the frequently shiftin rhythms. It makes unusual demand on solo players and on the ensembl One might mention by name and in tur Messrs. Gillet, Mager, Allegra, Speyer Laus, Battles, Vannoni, the busie player of percussion instruments an so on, but this would be invidious, f the small orchestra was collectively virtuoso. Mr. Koussevitsky had take infinite pains at rehearsal to ensure brilliant performance, for he think highly of the Suite and the composer future. The audience was enthusiasti Mr. Copland was called to the platfor several times; he, Mr. Koussevitsky a the orchestra shared alike the lon continued applause.

The overture was played in a masterly manner, as was the symphon Even the most confident hearer wh knows how Beethoven wished his musi to be played, even the hearer in whos breast the spirit of Beethoven dwel lovingly and informingly, could not hav found fault with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation. There is chatter, we believe, about "objective" and "subjective" readings of the classics. Give u a man who first of all imparts fres interest to that which is familiar with out having recourse to extravagance willful vagaries.

An eloquent performance of Wagne music brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonig The orchestra will be out of town n week. The program of Dec. 4-5 will Brahms's "Academic Festival," o ture and piano concert. No. 1 Bauer, pianist); Loeffler, symp poem, "Memories of My Chil (first time here); Ravel, Su from "Daphnis and Chloe."

NOV 3 0 1925

Music

Mr. Damrosch Talks, but Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts

THE League of Composers' concert this week end differed vitally from the New York Symphony concert in that the first organization braved the snickering and produced some genuine music, while Mr. Damrosch catered to the snickering and played very little music.

Mr. Damrosch took it upon himself to lecture on the works of the ultra-moderns, and, after sprinkling his talk with a few witticisms demonstrated the priciples of polytonality and atonaltiy. Then, carefully making the gesture of impartial judgment and pointing out that for all he knew these modern compositions might become great and standard works of art, he proceeded to play them in a wooden, unthoughtful and unimaginative manner—a manner which if applied to Beethoven himself would leave the master's music meaningless.

To illustrate Honegger's work, Mr. Damrosch played "Pacific 231" and demonstrated that though he understood the simpler effort to portray the laborious, giant breath of a locomotive and its superficial rhythm he either did not understand or did not care to bring out the sharp, jarring, overwhelming rhythm the work develops. Last year Mr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Orchestra in the same work, and Honegger's conception of relentless, mechanical cruelty stood out alive and vital.

As though to prove his lack, Mr. Damrosch then played for contrast a work of "an older modern composer" designed to show the pupils in the audience that motion could be expressed just as well in a more conservative medium—and what do you think it was? Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries!" One might just as well point to Corot to prove that he could paint gardens as well as Monet—but the gesture would be pointless.

Honegger was represented on Mr. Koussevitzky's program at the League of Composers Saturday by a concertino for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Jesus Sanroma at the piano. This work, played subtly and conducted with finesse, illustrated a newer development in the composer which takes him away from heavier, slowly thoughtful composition to the lighter satirical vein of "The Six." He uses a banal, simply melodic figure on the piano and embroiders it with a hee-hawing, almost lewd orchestration in the jazz idiom.

Prokofieff was represented on both programs with equal futility. Mr. Paul Kochanski displayed some Manual fireworks as the soloist for this composer's Concerto in D at Mr. Damrosch's concert, but the work seemed just as vague and lacking in vibrancy as his Quintet on the League's program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program included also a new Sinfonietta by Alexandre Tansman in the usual polyphonic idiom. The first two movements, an Allegro and Scherzo, had very little to say. The Notturno began to develop an exotic theme and a strange, heavy perfume-laden mood and then was frittered away. The final Fugue and Toccata revealed a rather garish and cheap theme that grew into a brilliant design which seemed to require a larger orchestra for its full effect.

A series of songs by Ravel to poems of Mallarme were sung delicately, poignantly and with competent phrasing by Maria Dormont.

The finale of the League's concert was "Music for the Theatre" by Aaron Copland, a young American for whose work Mr. Damrosch has already graciously and superiorly apologized in public. Far from being ultra modern, this composition seems to revert to an impressionist mood, although it continues the polytonal tradition. If the work becomes famous, an entirely possible development, it will be due to the remarkable sense of the glamour, the golden, artificial glow of the theatre, the strident burlesque and the intense color and dance and motion it contains; for these all have the smell of the theatre, its foolish eagerness and its vitality. Mr. Copland does not hesitate to employ the most melodic orchestration at times—nor does he balk at the blaring trumpets of the "Burlesque" and the "Prologue."

Certainly Mr. Copland's versatility here should begin to make Mr. Damrosch suspect that he is not explaining the bite, the stinging, acid life of modern music by repeating "polytonal, atonal, polytonal, atonal."

For purposes of record the New York Symphony also played Schoenberg's "Five Orchestral Pieces," Poulenc's "Clarinet Sonata," Stravinsky's "Ragtime," Hindemuth's "Nusch-Nuschi Tanze," Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood" and, for some strange, weird reason, Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz.

EXALTED PENSION CONCERT

Post — Nov 23.

Great Choral Ninth Given as Never Before

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The greater the music, the greater is the opportunity of the interpreter, and never did Mr. Koussevitzky seem more the towering musical and personal figure than yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe through a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a performance given, together with its duplicate of this evening, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

CONTENTION OVER FINALE

For years has the Ninth Symphony been a bone of contention among musicians. Not a few have held it to be the crown of Beethoven's life-work, and indeed of all music. Others have granted the greatness of the three purely instrumental movements and yet have questioned the success of the choral Finale, urging that its adoption was but an after-thought on the part of the composer, and holding that the awkward writing for chorus and soloists as well as the somewhat fragmentary and episodic treatment of this final movement prevent it from taking rank with Beethoven's greatest achievements.

Hear the Ninth Symphony in the average performance, and the arguments of these objectors seem well founded. Yet to have heard the performance of yesterday, a performance in which the conductor's will and spirit as a scorching flame consumed all obstacles and difficulties, was to hear the choral Finale vested with all the greatness of Beethoven's conception, to hear it, not as an imperfectly realized effort, but as a triumphant accomplishment and to believe it to be after all, music's noblest and brightest page.

Singers and Players Sublime

To speak of the technical details of such a performance were almost an impertinence. It is more fitting merely to say that yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky recreated Beethoven's music. In doubt and mystery began the first movement; in triumph and in affirmation it ended. Irresistible was the rhythmic force and impulse of the Scherzo. The Adagio soared to heights of contemplative beauty while, to repeat, the Finale was for once the true capstone of the whole.

How meaningful and how significant was that celebrated recitative of the basses which rejects in turn the themes of the preceding three movements and accepts with delight the mighty, joyous melody of the choral conclusion. How subtly handled was the advent of the military music, how discreetly treated these martial measures, a passage often questioned, which yesterday seemed beyond reproach. And above all how successfully the chorus and the four soloists, Mesdames Vreeland and Van der Veer, Messrs. Stretton and Patton, coped with their often difficult and ungrateful measures.

Trained by Mr. Woodworth

Trained in Dr. Davison's absence by his temporary successor, Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth, and rehearsed and inspired by Mr. Koussevitzky, the chorus was yesterday a nobly sonorous body of singers who sang this music, not as a trying task, but as though it were but natural outlet for their own emotions and enthusiasms.

Throughout the performance an audience which completely filled the hall listened intent and absorbed, and at the end found release in long-continued applause for Mr. Koussevitzky and for the soloists, chorus and orchestra that had served him so well.

NEW SYMPHONY SERIES

Herald Nov 22

The first program announced for the new historical series of Boston Symphony concerts on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1. Including the first great symphonic composers, it will consist of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the prelude to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C minor of Beethoven.

The following list of composers (most of whom will be represented) will indicate the nature and period of the remaining programs. The second program—Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz; the third program—Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Franck, Saint-Saens; the fourth program—Strauss, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Sibelius, Moussorgsky, Glinka, Grieg the fifth program—Schoenberg, Ravel, Honegger, Bax, MacDowell, Stravinsky, Prokovieff.

Although these concerts are for the most part fully subscribed to, season tickets are still available for this series

---

MEMORANDA OF MUSIC

Transcript — Nov 30

Bettered Bostonians

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and Mr. Koussevitzky have made their first visit of the season to New York. They played there on Thursday and on Saturday last, traversing Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; Brahms's First Symphony, in C-minor; Mr. Eichheim's "Chinese Legend" from concerts of last winter in Boston; Monsieur Ibert's impressionistic "Escales"; Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major; Lyadov's "Apocalypse" and "Kikimora"; the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." To the more novel numbers of the two programs the reviewers gave short shrift. Only Mr. Eichheim's piece—and not always it—escapes rather scornful dismissal. About the performance of the two symphonies, however, The Herald-Tribune wrote with its usual discernment and discrimination:

> It would not be quite true to say that Mr. Koussevitzky's conveyance of the great score [Chaikovsky's "Pathetic"] fulfilled at every point our own notions as to how this or that passage should be read. There were many divergences from the normal in his treatment of tempi, of phrasing, of dynamics, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Koussevitzky did not intend his brasses to protrude so egregiously as they did in the approach to the climax of the Finale. But we are quite willing to forget a blemish or two of that sort. And as for the eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitzky's very personol interpretation, they do not really trouble us at all. If that is the way he feels it, well and good. The point is that he feels it, quite obviously, with consuming intensity; that he makes a superb and living thing of the music, an overwhelming communication. That is enough. . . .
>
> Doubtless there were stern symphonic detectives who followed Mr. Koussevitzky's performance [of Brahms's First Symphony] with a metronome, stop-watch and flashlight; and doubtless, if they were academically minded, they were not wholly content. But there were others in Carnegie Hall who relished this strongly individualized reading. They liked Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitive phrasing at the end of the Andante, which was poetic without being sentimental. They liked his impressive conception of the slow introduction to the Finale; they were grateful to him for giving due weight and gravity to the magnificent chorale passage in the coda (even though his tempo here was not in accordance with the score). Above all, they liked Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony because it was untrammelled and alive. Not all of this conductor's floutings of tradition are persuasive; but on this occasion his indifference o the rules made many friends for him. Their testimony of approval at the close of the performance was unmistakable.

With one accord also, the reviewers were quick to discover the bettered quality of the orchestra. In the ears of The Tribune-Herald, "it played both novelties ['A Chinese Legend' and 'Escales'] exceedingly well—brilliantly, indeed; and in the second movement of Ibert's suite the new first oboe, Mr. Gillet, was able to disclose his skill, his taste, his beauty of tone." The Sun counted the performance of the Chinese ballet "a veritable triumph of orchestral virtuosity" and in the Brandenburg concerto noted "the fine sonority of the strings" and the evident enjoyment of all concerned. The World discovered the orchestra "much improved." The Times found the playing "more precise, vivid and electric." More than ever, it remarked, the Boston Orches-

Continued on Following Page

TO GIVE NINTH SYMPHONY SUNDAY

Traveler — Nov 21

Edmond Boucher to Sing with People's Orchestra

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund, in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon and Monday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Overture to Egmont. All reserved seats having been taken for both performances, the usual rule at Symphony concerts will be waived and standing room sold.

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 4 and 5. The program will include Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture; the same composer's First Pianoforte Concerto in D-minor, with Harold Mauer as the soloist; Loeffler's Symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood"; and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

The first program is announced for the new Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony concerts, for which season tickets are still available. It will include Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings in G-major; the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah"; the Praeludium to Haydn's "Creation"; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; and the Fifth Symphony in C-minor of Beethoven.

Guest Conductor [illegible]or Symphony

Traveler Nov 21

Eu[illegible]s, the celebrated Engli[illegible]d composer, is to ap-p[illegible] gu[illegible]nductor of the Boston Sym[illegible]ony orchestra. He will visit Boston for this purpose for the week of Jan. 17, thus giving Mr. Koussevitzky a mid-season rest, and conduct the regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Jan. 22 and 23, and the concert in Providence on the previous Tuesday. He is now in America as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra. It is by courtesy of Mr. Eastman, the director of the Eastman School of Music, that Mr. Goosens will visit Boston.

Of Belgian parentage, Mr. Goosens was born in England. He was associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham in the latter's orchestra from 1915-1920. Since then he has conducted the London Symphony orchestra on notable occasions, and likewise in opera and ballet. Goosens made his first visit to America to conduct the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra in 1923.

Advertiser Nov 21

AMERICAN MUSIC SCORES HIT ON SYMPHONY BILL

Aaron Copland, an American composer who writes in the ultra-modern style, but still apes none of his foreign contemporaries, was one of the heroes of yesterday's Symphony concert.

His "Music for the Theatre" suite, played here for the first time, was applauded until he had come forth three times to make his acknowledgments.

The novel, singular charm of the piece pleased the younger Symphony patrons particularly. The performance was the perfection of technic and sympathy. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with evident enjoyment.

After the performance of Beethoven's jocund fourth symphony the conductor and his men received the regular weekly ovation. Everyone was delighted with this number. The sparkle in Mozart's "Magic Flue" overture, which opens the program, and the Olympian eloquence of the prelude and love-death music from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" were equally delightful features of his sixth matinee.

WHOLE FLAKE

[illegible] other music [illegible] be played, according to his directions, "like a nightingale with the toothache," or "with hands in the pockets." But Satie presumably won the respect of his Parisian contemporaries such as Debussy and Ravel by something more musical than irony. Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," the remaining number, again seemed a noisy and not amusingly vulgar piece.

Tansman is a Pole, not yet out of his 20s, who has migrated from his native Lodz to Paris. He seems to have written almost as much as Schubert had produced at the same age. The sinfonietta heard yesterday lacks salient and individual themes. The development is occasionally ingenious, more often loose jointed and careless. It is clumsily scored, at least by comparison with such works for small orchestra as Richard Strauss' "Buerrger als Edelmann" suite. Why overwork the piano in a small orchestra, with which its tone does not blend? M Tansman might profit by careful study of the orchestration of Ravel and Stravinsky. If he would write less and polish more, his work might amount to something.

Satie's "Gymnopedies" are brief elegiac slow movements, with beautiful if rather shapeless melodies. Debussy's orchestration is miraculously skillful. The original piano pieces were writen in 1887, so that unless Debussy tampered with the harmonies in this version, they prove that Satie's harmonic originality must have influenced the composer of "The Afternoon of a Faun" strongly. The performance, at a tempo notably slower than Mr Mason used at the People's Symphony the other day, was impressive. But no doubt Koussevitzky was as usual making the indication "Lent" (slow) synonymous with a snail's pace.

Koussevitzky's version of "Scheherezade" is different from those of Muck and Monteux. He stresses the languors and emphasizes the frenzies of the music. He makes Rimsky Korsakov melodramatic, almost hysterical, in Tchaikovsky's vein. The finale at his hands becomes an orgy of rhythm, a brutal assault on the nervous system. The effect is thrilling, but is it art?

One had thought of this music as artificial, as hardly more emotional than the figures on a Chinese vase. But instead of charmingly sophisticated light music one heard yesterday a slice of life from "Arabian Nights." One prefers the less emotional and more graceful way of taking this music.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," written for piano and orchestrated noisily but effectively by his friend, the noted conductor Mottl, was presumably intended to recall to the hearer's mind pictures, almost caricatures, of rustic peasant revelry, after the fashion of the scherzo in Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." But the piece is a mere tour de force, full of sound and fury.

Next week the program announced includes Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Copland's "Theatre Music" and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan."

P. R.

SYMPHONY GIVES COPLAND SUIT

153

"Music for the Theatre Is Played Here for First Time

Herald Nov 21

YOUNG COMPOSER IS WARMLY APPLAUDE

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Bosto Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzk conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethove Symphony No. 4; Copland, "Music fo the Theatre" in five movements (firs performance); Wagner, Prelude an "Love Death" from Tristan and Isolde.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony wa produced at Vienna in 1807. Those wh are now dismayed, not to say, disguste when they hear contemporaneous musi of an unusual character may like t know what was said about thi symphony by men of a certain authorit before Beethoven died.

The first movement wrote one disgruntled person is "full of short detached ideas without relation one to another—three or four notes every quarte hour,, which is interesting! Then muffled drum-roll and mysterious viol phrases all ornamented with a crow of general pauses and rests; then afte the hearer is resigned by long waiting the Allegro, a ferocious movement i which especial care is taken that n principal thought is exposed."

Who wrote so absurdly? He was no a reactionary; he was not a poor devi of a music critic, a hack reviewin concerts for a daily newspaper. H was no less a person than the grea Carl Maria von Weber, who [illegible] a bit of a Philistine.

When this symphony was played a Cassel in the season of 1815-16, a accomplished critic thus freed hi mind: "It seems to me that the grea master, in this as in several of hi new works, is extremely bizarre an makes himself unintelligible and eve an object of terror to even cultivate dilettanti."

This leads us to consider the ca of Mr. Copland of New York, whos suite was performed for the first tim and from manuscript. The movement are entitled: Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. Mr. Coplan says that he had no play, no literar idea in mind when he composed th suite. "The title simply implies that, a times, this music has a quality whic is suggestive of the theatre." The suit is for a small orchestra, curiously composed.

Mr. Copland is a young composer indisputable talent. He has the grea gift of imagination. He can be realisti in a wild way; he can be tenderly poeti If his "Dance" reminds one of Wa Whitman's line: "Onward we move, ay gang of blackguards! with mirt houting music and wild-flapping pen ants of joy!" in his "Prologue," "In erlude" and "Epilogue" is the admir ble expression of a contemplativ ood, music of pure beauty without th taint of sensuousness, without an incongruous episode of churned-up emotion.

This suite is a more important wor than his symphony for orchestra organ played here last season. Th material has greater significance; th treatment is firmer, less experimental In the Suite Mr. Copland has much t say and he knows how he should sa it. His instrumental combinations a well as his harmonic schemes were no put together at random; they were deliberately, knowingly planned.

But some one may object to the entrance of "jazz" in a symphonic concert room. American life with its restlessness, its haste, its snapping-of fingers at ideals and spiritual thing its extravagance is "jazz." Why shoul not one movement in a suite be symbolic of American life as it now is? A for the "Burlesque," it is what its nam implies.

"Music for the theatre," one of th most interesting of the modern work that have been produced here, severel taxes the players in the matter of n trances and by the frequently shiftin rhythms. It makes unusual demand on solo players and on the ensembl One might mention by name and in tur Messrs. Gillet, Mager, Allegra, Speye Laus, Battles, Vannoni, the busie player of percussion instruments an so on, but this would be invidious, f the small orchestra was collectively virtuoso. Mr. Koussevitzky had take infinite pains at rehearsal to ensure brilliant performance, for he think highly of the Suite and the compose future. The audience was enthusiast Mr. Copland was called to the platfo several times; he, Mr. Koussevitzky a the orchestra shared alike the lon continued applause.

The overture was played in a masterly manner, as was the symphon Even the most confident hearer wh knows how Beethoven wished his mus to be played, even the hearer in whos breast the spirit of Beethoven dwell lovingly and informingly, could not hav found fault with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation. There is chatter, we believe, about "objective" and "subjective" readings of the classics. Give u a man who first of all imparts fres interest to that which is familiar without having recourse to extravagance willful vagaries.

An eloquent performance of Wagne music brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonig The orchestra will be out of town n week. The program of Dec. 4-5 will Brahms's "Academic Festival," o ture and piano concert. No. 1 [illegible] Bauer, pianist); Loeffler, symp poem, "Memories of My Chil[illegible] (first time here); Ravel, Su[illegible] from "Daphnis and Chloe."

154

Boston Symphony Concert

Monitor Nov 14

THE fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:—

Tansman
Sinfonietta for small orchestra
Satie
"Gymnopédies" (orchestrated by Debussy)
Chabrier
"Bourrée Fantasque" (orchestrated by Mottl)
Rimsky-Korsakoff ......"Schéhérazade"

Tansman's Sinfonietta was played for the first time in America. It runs in four short divisions—Allegro molto, Mazurka, Notturno and Fuga et Toccata. In this Sinfonietta Tansman, in spite of his heralded "modernity," does nothing to offend the taste of the most conservative so far as the actual sound of his music goes. To be sure, those who demand "melody" in music will perhaps find fault with the composer's somewhat slender material, but the work as a whole is so gracefully conceived and written and contains so many pleasing orchestral effects that even they will hardly fail to take pleasure in the greater part of the piece.

Shows Good Taste

This Sinfonietta is not in any sense a work to thrill an audience. In fact its intimacies might better be appreciated in surroundings less vast than those of Symphony Hall. Unfortunately many judge of the importance and value of a work by the size of the orchestra employed and oftentimes by its length. To these again this Sinfonietta will perhaps seem an agreeable trifle and nothing more. In reality, it seemed (to us at least) full of delightful combinations of color, harmony and rhythm; the work of a composer who has not perhaps fully decided on his style, but one giving evidence of that supreme essential in musical composition, good taste in the selection of materials. It is also the work of a well grounded musician who is master of the resources of his art, and one which is in no sense experimental. Mr. Koussevitzky has not always been so fortunate in his choice of novelties, but in this case he is thoroughly justified.

The two "Gymnopédies" of Erik Satie (orchestrated by Debussy) were doubtless played as a tribute to the composer's memory. These graceful pieces exhibit none of the eccentricities of that more than eccentric genius, who withal exerted such an important influence on the musical tendencies of his time. Alas for poor Satie; he will live in musical history rather for this influence than for any intrinsic merit to be found in his compositions. Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque" brought the first part of the program to a brilliant close.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations, as time goes on, seem to group themselves into three classes: those which are musically impossible as those which are possible but not altogether probable, as many of his readings of Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, and those in which he so accurately touches just the right note that any other eading would seem absolutely impossible, as his readings of Tchaikowsky, the Brahms symphonies and yesterday's "Schéhérazade."

Rimsky Eloquently

Never has it been our good fortune to assist at so remarkable a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece. Never within recent recollection has the orchestra played with such rare virtuosity, with such glowing tone, with such intelligence and verve. It would seem that each individual member of the band played with all his heart, and the result was a performance of "Schéhérazade" which it would be extremely difficult to equal, let alone surpass.

The credit for this overwhelmingly beautiful performance is due to Mr. Koussevitzky, for he played upon the orchestra with the freedom of a virtuoso playing upon an instrument. Of course, this music is pre-eminently suited to the qualities of his talent. Here was free play for that exuberance of imagination with which he is gifted and which is so often out of keeping with much of the music of the classical repertory. Here he allowed it free rein, and never once did it gain the upper hand of the music. For so often is the music greater than Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of it that many a time he cannot mold it to his fancy. Yesterday, however, composer and conductor were one and the result may hardly be overpraised. Orchestra and audience were warmed by the conductor's enthusiasm as rarely happens at a symphony concert.

S. M.

The Christian Science Benevolent Association
SANATORIUM
910 Boylston Street, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

A temporary home for those under Christian Science treatment and a resort where Christian Scientists may go and recruit. Staff of nurses and attendants available when this assistance is needed.

Address correspondence regarding admittance and requests for application blanks to: The Christian Science Benevolent Association, 236 Huntington Ave., Boston 17, Mass.

Advertiser Nov 14

ORIENTAL MUSIC BRILLIANTLY LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By E. F. HARKINS

Serge Koussevitzky's first Boston performance of "Scheherazade," the gorgeous Arabian Nights suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and forthwith took rank among the Russian conductor's finest achievements since he landed on these music-mad shores.

The "Scheherazade" music, depicting the adventures of Sinbad the Sailor, the Kalandar Prince, the gay picturesqueness of a Bagdad fete and other wonders of the ancient world, had not been played at Symphony concerts for well over three years.

BRILLIANT TONE DRAMA

Koussevitzky gave it new dramatic values—new languors, new glimpses of a musky, brilliantly-colored, semi-barbaric East, now throbs of excitement over the tone picture of the ship at sea, pitching and pounding in waves mountains high.

Not a measure of the magnificent score, with its unrivaled symphonic sketches of Arabian Nights drama, missed the revivifying touch of a master conductor tingling himself, as was evident, with the wonderful romantic mood of the music. He summoned his men to rise to the occasion, and they certainly did. It was a virtuoso performance, intensely thrilling, with glory for all. Mr. Burgin played the violin solos delightfully. He caught the glow of the music, too.

NOVEL SINFONIETTA.

This fifth Symphony program opens with the first American presentation of young Alexander Tansman's "Sinfonietta" for small orchestra. The Tansman music is caviare for the most part; experimental, yet showing melodic gifts and technical ingenuity. The audience liked the performance if not the music.

Two of Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," Greek festival pieces orchestrated by Debussy, were also played at the Symphony concerts for the first time yesterday, though they are by no means new. The themes are [illegible], and so is Debussy's or-

---

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Nov 15

The least memorable of Beethoven's symphonies, his fourth, is the chief item on the program of this week's Symphony concerts. Other repertory pieces by Mozart and Wagner and a novelty by Aaron Copland complete the announced list of numbers. Mr Koussevitzky has not this season been prone to alter his programs after announcing them, as he so often did last year.

It is especially gratifying to find the new piece on a Symphony program the work of an American and not of a Russian, a Frenchman or some other European. Other things being equal, American music should be given preference on American concert programs. This is not to favor the performance of music merely because it was composed in America by an American. Bad music is bad music and unworthy of performance no matter what its nationality. But such great and striking talent as that manifested in Mr Copland's organ symphony heard last season and in his Passacaglia, played last week by Mr. Leadb

---

ADVERTISER—Boston

Ninth Symphony Today and Monday

Nov 22

THIS afternoon and tomorrow evening, at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will perform Beethoven's ninth symphony, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van de Veer, Charles Stratton, and Fred Patton baritone. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture will open the program. Only standing room tickets remain for these two pension fund concerts.

KOUSSEVITZKY EXCELLS IN NEW WORK

Amer By Moses Smith Nov 14

Fresh from listening to a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," which is the final number on this week's Symphony program, one feels at a loss for words to describe its sheer magnificence. We shall undoubtedly cool down, but at present writing we feel secure in stating that in this piece Mr. Koussevitzky has done his finest work since he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course the playing of the men in the orchestra was superb in the Scheherazade, which is a virtuoso piece for display of orchestral technique, besides being gorgeous and colorful music. But that does not account for its immense success with the work. It was the directing genius of Koussevitzky, at home in a work of art that exactly meets his dynamic temperament, his Russian flare for color, and his brilliant imagination, that was most responsible for the artistic triumph.

Certainly this great Russian masterpiece has never sounded to any of the present generation as it sounded yesterday at Symphony Hall. Listening to it, one had little difficulty in visualizing the beauty and pageantry, the adventure and mystery of the Thousand and One Nights.

The opening Sinfonietta, by a new Parisian-Polish composer, Tansman, was played for the first time in America. It is not an imposing work, being written for a small chamber orchestra, and its four movements are very short. But they are packed full of meat, from the very opening measure, which breaks out into a delightful melody. This man has a rare talent for melody, his harmony is often revolutionary, and he uses the orchestra in marvellously economical fashion.

Harold Bauer will play at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Brahms's first piano concerto. He played it at his first appearance in America with the Boston orchestra 25 years ago, and he has played it twice at Symphony concerts since then. It is fair to presume that if he plays it two or three times more he will really like it. At the concerts this week we shall hear Mr. Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood," which has already been performed in Evanston, Ill.; Chicago, Cleveland, New York. It was high time for a performance in Boston.

P. H.

Herald Nov 29

American Nov 21

PENSION FUND

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Monday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Overture to Egmont. All reserved seats having been taken for both performances, the usual rule at Symphony concerts will be waived and standing room sold.

SYMPHONY AT ZENITH OF POWERS

Post — Nov 14

Dazzling Virtuosity Is Displayed in Playing "Scheherazade"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the portentous announcement of the opening phrase of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, it became immediately clear that something out of the ordinary in the way of orchestral performance was about to come to pass. And come to pass it did.

Surely never before had a Boston audience heard so brilliant, so fanciful, so gorgeously colored a performance of Rimsky's palace of enchantments as that of yesterday, a performance in which conductor and players gave all they had to give—and then, it would seem, more besides!

CAUSES WONDER

Already this year there had been reason to believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now at its tonal zenith. Yesterday in "Scheherazade" that belief was made a certainty. The singing strings, vibrant and full-throated, the dazzling, piercing trumpets, the horns that were as gold and steel, the plangent sonority of the trombones, the acid sweetness of the reeds, the stirring beat and beguiling tinkle of the percussion; these were things to make the listener to marvel alike at the mind which could conceive such sounds, at the conductor who could call them forth, and at the orchestra that, respondng, could produce them.

And no less remarkable than the orchestral virtuosity, the sheer tonal splendor of this performance, was its power of suggestion. As Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra realized to the full the gold and silver, the purple and crimson of Rimsky-Korsakov's marvellous intrumentation, so did they likewise call into being the rich imagery that lies within this music. Whether it was the mighty, swelling, sun-lit sea that bore the ship of Sinbad, the colors and odors of the bazaar where the mumbling crowd listened to the words of the narrator, the beauty of Kamar-al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, the riotous revelings of Bagdad, the crash of the ship against the rock or the poetry of the final closing, slow and reluctant, of ths book of wonders, Mr. Koussevitzky divined them in the score and brought them to wholly satisfying realization.

"Scheherazade" and the concert ended, the audience thrice recalled Mr. Koussevitzky, who bade the orchestra as a whole, and in particular Mr. Burgin whose violin had been voice to Scheherazade herself, share in the applause.

A "Sinfonietta" for small orchestra, practically a chamber-orchestra, by the Parisianized Pole, Alexander Tansman, a composer new to Boston, begins the programme of this fifth pair of Symphony Concerts. Between it and Rimsky's Suite come, for the first time in Symphony Hall, the two of the youthful Satie's unpretentious Gymnopedies," judiciously orchestrated by Debussy, and after them Mottl's orchestration of the brilliant and diverting "Bourree Fantasque" of Chabrier.

Refreshingly spontaneous, skilfully fashioned, daringly yet not perversely dissonant in harmony, abundantly melodious in the modern acceptance of the term, the four movements of Tansman's "Sinfonietta" gave immediate and decided pleasure. If Mr. Tansman has made more music of this calibre, by all means let us have it.

LAYING THE COURSE, TRYING THE TALENT, OVER THE CONCERTS

Transcript — Nov 20

ROOM AT LAST FOR MR. LOEFFLER IN RUSSIA

His "Memories of Childhood" in a Fortnight—Mr. Bauer's Quarter-Century—Paderewski's Pieces—The New York String Quartet and Chamber-Music Alive Again—A Pianist at Cambridge—Mr. Grainger's Return

WITHIN two weeks Mr. Loeffler's music, "Memories of My Childhood," will be heard in Boston. After many days, Mr. Koussevitzky has set the tone-poem on the program of the Symphony Concerts for Friday and Saturday, Dec. 4 and 5. Seldom, unless it was of his own will, has Mr. Loeffler waited so long for performance in his own city. . . . In 1924, the North Shore Music Festival, an annual series of concerts at Evanston, the suburb of Chicago, offered prizes for orchestral pieces written by American composers. For the symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood," Mr. Loeffler received first honors. The music was played at Evanston on May 29, in Chicago on Oct. 24-25, by Mr. Stock and his orchestra. In the intervening year, New York, Cleveland and other cities have heard and praised it. Now, belatedly, Boston may know and applaud.

Though, Mr. Loeffler was born in Alsace, his father's calling, as agricultural chemist and breeder of horses, led the family a wandering life. One of these migrations carried it to a country town in Russia. There the child, Charles Martin Tornov Loeffler, received on his eighth birthday the gift of a little violin. Soon a German musician who came from Petersburg to spend summers at this Smjela taught him to play it. Outside these lessons his education was home-gained; while before long the family removed to Hungary. According to Mr. Engel, writing a brief biography of the composer in The Musical Quarterly, "this sojourn in Russia was indelibly graved in the boy's mind." After fifty years and more these impressions were fresh enough to summon music.

To the tone-poem itself, Mr. Loeffler prefixes his own explanatory note:

> Many years ago the composer spent more than three years of his boyhood in a Russian village near the small town of Smjela, in the Government of Kiev. He now seeks to express by the following music what still lives in his heart and memory of those happy days. He recalls in the various strains of his music Russian peasant songs, the Yourod's Litany-prayer, "the happiest of days," fairy-tales and dance-songs. The closing movement of the symphonic poem commemorates the death of Vasinka, an elderly peasant, Bayan or story-teller, singer, maker of willow-pipes upon which he played tunes of weird intervals, and the companion and friend of the boy who now, later in life, notes down what he hopes these pages will tell.

Programs in Prospect

Besides Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, the program for these Symphony Concerts of Dec. 4 and 5 traverses: Brahms's "Academic Overture"; Brahms First Concerto, in D minor, for Piano and Orchestra; and the Second Suite of Dances from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." In the Concerto, Mr. Bauer will play the piano-part—as he did twenty-five years ago when he was first called to the Symphony Concerts.

In the supplementary afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to follow the course of symphonic music from the eighteenth century into the twentieth. The new series begins on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1, with an assortment of early masters and Beethoven for climax, viz.:

Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, No. 3, in G major ....Bach
Pastoral Symphony from "The Messiah" .Handel
Prelude to the Oratorio, "The Creation" ..Haydn
Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute" .Mozart
Symphony, No. 5, in C ....Beethoven

[illegible]rewski has assembled the following numbers for his concert of piano-

154

Boston Symphony Concert

Monitor — Nov 14

THE fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:—

Tansman
Sinfonietta for small orchestra
Satie
"Gymnopédies" (orchestrated by Debussy)
Chabrier
"Bourrée Fantasque" (orchestrated by Mottl)
Rimsky-Korsakoff ......"Schéhérazade"

Tansman's Sinfonietta was played for the first time in America. It runs in four short divisions—Allegro molto, Mazurka, Notturno and Fuga et Toccata. In this Sinfonietta Tansman, in spite of his heralded "modernity," does nothing to offend the taste of the most conservative so far as the actual sound of his music goes. To be sure, those who demand "melody" in music will perhaps find fault with the composer's somewhat slender material, but the work as a whole is so gracefully conceived and written and contains so many pleasing orchestral effects that even they will hardly fail to take pleasure in the greater part of the piece.

Shows Good Taste

This Sinfonietta is not in any sense a work to thrill an audience. In fact its intimacies might better be appreciated in surroundings less vast than those of Symphony Hall. Unfortunately many judge of the importance and value of a work by the size of the orchestra employed and oftentimes by its length. To these again this Sinfonietta will perhaps seem an agreeable trifle and nothing more. In reality, it seemed (to us at least) full of delightful combinations of color, harmony and rhythm; the work of a composer who has not perhaps fully decided on his style, but one giving evidence of that supreme essential in musical composition, good taste in the selection of materials. It is also the work of a well grounded musician who is master of the resources of his art, and one which is in no sense experimental. Mr. Koussevitzky has not always been so fortunate in his choice of novelties, but in this case he is thoroughly justified.

The two "Gymnopédies" of Erik Satie (orchestrated by Debussy) were doubtless played as a tribute to the composer's memory. These graceful pieces exhibit none of the eccentricities of that more than eccentric genius, who withal exerted such an important influence on the musical tendencies of his time. Alas for poor Satie; he will live in musical history rather for this influence than for any intrinsic merit to be found in his compositions. Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque" brought the first part of the program to a brilliant close.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations, as time goes on, seem to group themselves into three classes: those which are musically impossible as those which are possible but not altogether probable, as many of his readings of Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, and those in which he so accurately touches just the right note that any other reading would seem absolutely impossible, as his readings of Tchaikowsky, the Brahms symphonies and yesterday's "Schéhérazade."

Rimsky Eloquently

Never has it been our good fortune to assist at so remarkable a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece. Never within recent recollection has the orchestra played with such rare virtuosity, with such glowing tone, with such intelligence and verve. It would seem that each individual member of the band played with all his heart, and the result was a performance of "Schéhérazade" which it would be extremely difficult to equal, let alone surpass.

The credit for this overwhelmingly beautiful performance is due to Mr. Koussevitzky, for he played upon the orchestra with the freedom of a virtuoso playing upon an instrument. Of course, this music is pre-eminently suited to the qualities of his talent. Here was free play for that exuberance of imagination with which he is gifted and which is so often out of keeping with much of the music of the classical repertory. Here he allowed it free rein, and never once did it gain the upper hand of the music. For so often is the music greater than Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of it that many a time he cannot mold it to his fancy. Yesterday, however, composer and conductor were one and the result may hardly be overpraised. Orchestra and audience were warmed by the conductor's enthusiasm as rarely happens at a symphony concert.

S. M.

The Christian Science Benevolent Association
SANATORIUM
910 Boylston Street, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

A temporary home for those under Christian Science treatment and a resort where Christian Scientists may go and recruit. Staff of nurses and attendants available when this assistance is needed.

Address correspondence regarding admittance and requests for application blanks to: The Christian Science Benevolent Association, 236 Huntington Ave., Boston 17, Mass.

Advertiser Nov 14

ORIENTAL MUSIC BRILLIANTLY LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By E. F. HARKINS

Serge Koussevitzky's first Boston performance of "Scheherazade," the gorgeous Arabian Nights suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and forthwith took rank among the Russian conductor's finest achievements since he landed on these music-mad shores.

The "Scheherazade" music, depicting the adventures of Sinbad the Sailor, the Kalandar Prince, the gay picturesqueness of a Bagdad fete and other wonders of the ancient world, had not been played at Symphony concerts for well over three years.

BRILLIANT TONE DRAMA

Koussevitzky gave it new dramatic values—new languors, new glimpses of a musky, brilliantly-colored, semi-barbaric East, now throbs of excitement over the tone picture of the ship at sea, pitching and pounding in waves mountains high.

Not a measure of the magnificent score, with its unrivaled symphonic sketches of Arabian Nights drama, missed the revivifying touch of a master conductor tingling himself, as was evident, with the wonderful romantic mood of the music. He summoned his men to rise to the occasion, and they certainly did. It was a virtuoso performance, intensely thrilling, with glory for all. Mr. Burgin played the violin solos delightfully. He caught the glow of the music, too.

NOVEL SINFONIETTA.

This fifth Symphony program opens with the first American presentation of young Alexander Tansman's "Sinfonietta" for small orchestra. The Tansman music is caviare for the most part; experimental, yet showing melodic gifts and technical ingenuity. The audience liked the performance if not the music.

Two of Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," Greek festival pieces orchestrated by Debussy, were also played at the Symphony concerts for the first time yesterday, though they are by no means new. The themes are [illegible], and so is Debussy's or-

---

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Nov 15

The least memorable of Beethoven's symphonies, his fourth, is the chief item on the program of this week's Symphony concerts. Other repertory pieces by Mozart and Wagner and a novelty by Aaron Copland complete the announced list of numbers. Mr Koussevitzky has not this season been prone to alter his programs after announcing them, as he so often did last year.

It is especially gratifying to find the new piece on a Symphony program the work of an American and not of a Russian, a Frenchman or some other European. Other things being equal, American music should be given preference on American concert programs. This is not to favor the performance of music merely because it was composed in America by an American. Bad music is bad music and unworthy of performance no matter what its nationality. But such great and striking talent as that manifested in Mr Copland's organ symphony heard last season and in his Passacaglia, played last week by Mr

---

ADVERTISER—Boston

Ninth Symphony Today and Monday

Nov 22

THIS afternoon and tomorrow evening, at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will perform Beethoven's ninth symphony, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van de Veer, Charles Stratton, and Fred Patton baritone. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture will open the program. Only standing room tickets remain for these two pension fund concerts.

KOUSSEVITZKY EXCELLS IN NEW WORK

Amer By Moses Smith Nov 14

Fresh from listening to a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," which is the final number on this week's Symphony program, one feels at a loss for words to describe its sheer magnificence. We shall undoubtedly cool down, but at present writing we feel secure in stating that in this piece Mr. Koussevitzky has done his finest work since he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course the playing of the men in the orchestra was superb in the Scheherazade, which is a virtuoso piece for display of orchestral technique, besides being gorgeous and colorful music. But that does not account for its immense success with the work. It was the directing genius of Koussevitzky, at home in a work of art that exactly meets his dynamic temperament, his Russian flare for color, and his brilliant imagination, that was most responsible for the artistic triumph.

Certainly this great Russian masterpiece has never sounded to any of the present generation as it sounded yesterday at Symphony Hall. Listening to it, one had little difficulty in visualizing the beauty and pageantry, the adventure and mystery of the Thousand and One Nights.

The opening Sinfonietta, by a new Parisian-Polish composer, Tansman, was played for the first time in America. It is not an imposing work, being written for a small chamber orchestra, and its four movements are very short. But they are packed full of meat, from the very opening measure, which breaks out into a delightful melody. This man has a rare talent for melody, his harmony is often revolutionary, and he uses the orchestra in marvellously economical fashion.

Harold Bauer will play at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Brahms's first piano concerto. He played it at his first appearance in America with the Boston orchestra 25 years ago, and he has played it twice at Symphony concerts since then. It is fair to presume that if he plays it two or three times more he will really like it. At the concerts this week we shall hear Mr. Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood," which has already been performed in Evanston, Ill.; Chicago, Cleveland, New York. It was high time for a performance in Boston.

P. H.

Herald Nov 29

American Nov 21

PENSION FUND

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Monday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Overture to Egmont. All reserved seats having been taken for both performances, the usual rule at Symphony concerts will be waived and standing room sold.

SYMPHONY AT ZENITH OF POWERS

Post — Nov 14

Dazzling Virtuosity Is Displayed in Playing "Scheherazade"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the portentous announcement of the opening phrase of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, it became immediately clear that something out of the ordinary in the way of orchestral performance was about to come to pass. And come to pass it did.

Surely never before had a Boston audience heard so brilliant, so fanciful, so gorgeously colored a performance of Rimsky's palace of enchantments as that of yesterday, a performance in which conductor and players gave all they had to give—and then, it would seem, more besides!

CAUSES WONDER

Already this year there had been reason to believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now at its tonal zenith. Yesterday in "Scheherazade" that belief was made a certainty. The singing strings, vibrant and full-throated, the dazzling, piercing trumpets, the horns that were as gold and steel, the plangent sonority of the trombones, the acid sweetness of the reeds, the stirring beat and beguiling tinkle of the percussion; these were things to make the listener to marvel alike at the mind which could conceive such sounds, at the conductor who could call them forth, and at the orchestra that, respondng, could produce them.

And no less remarkable than the orchestral virtuosity, the sheer tonal splendor of this performance, was its power of suggestion. As Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra realized to the full the gold and silver, the purple and crimson of Rimsky-Korsakov's marvellous intrumentation, so did they likewise call into being the rich imagery that lies within this music. Whether it was the mighty, swelling, sun-lit sea that bore the ship of Sinbad, the colors and odors of the bazaar where the mumbling crowd listened to the words of the narrator, the beauty of Kamar-al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, the riotous revelings of Bagdad, the crash of the ship against the rock or the poetry of the final closing, slow and reluctant, of ths book of wonders, Mr. Koussevitzky divined them in the score and brought them to wholly satisfying realization.

"Scheherazade" and the concert ended, the audience thrice recalled Mr. Koussevitzky, who bade the orchestra as a whole, and in particular Mr. Burgin whose violin had been voice to Scheherazade herself, share in the applause.

A "Sinfonietta" for small orchestra, practically a chamber-orchestra, by the Parisianized Pole, Alexander Tansman, a composer new to Boston, begins the programme of this fifth pair of Symphony Concerts. Between it and Rimsky's Suite come, for the first time in Symphony Hall, the two of the youthful Satie's unpretentious Gymnopedies," judiciously orchestrated by Debussy, and after them Mottl's orchestration of the brilliant and diverting "Bourree Fantasque" of Chabrier.

Refreshingly spontaneous, skilfully fashioned, daringly yet not perversely dissonant in harmony, abundantly melodious in the modern acceptance of the term, the four movements of Tansman's "Sinfonietta" gave immediate and decided pleasure. If Tansman has made more music of this calibre, by all means let us have it.

LAYING THE COURSE, TRYING THE TALENT, OVER THE CONCERTS

Transcript — Nov 20

ROOM AT LAST FOR MR. LOEFFLER IN RUSSIA

His "Memories of Childhood" in a Fortnight—Mr. Bauer's Quarter-Century—Paderewski's Pieces—The New York String Quartet and Chamber-Music Alive Again—A Pianist at Cambridge—Mr. Grainger's Return

WITHIN two weeks Mr. Loeffler's music, "Memories of My Childhood," will be heard in Boston. After many days, Mr. Koussevitzky has set the tone-poem on the program of the Symphony Concerts for Friday and Saturday, Dec. 4 and 5. Seldom, unless it was of his own will, has Mr. Loeffler waited so long for performance in his own city. . . . In 1924, the North Shore Music Festival, an annual series of concerts at Evanston, the suburb of Chicago, offered prizes for orchestral pieces written by American composers. For the symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood," Mr. Loeffler received first honors. The music was played at Evanston on May 29, in Chicago on Oct. 24-25, by Mr. Stock and his orchestra. In the intervening year, New York, Cleveland and other cities have heard and praised it. Now, belatedly, Boston may know and applaud.

Though, Mr. Loeffler was born in Alsace, his father's calling, as agricultural chemist and breeder of horses, led the family a wandering life. One of these migrations carried it to a country town in Russia. There the child, Charles Martin Tornov Loeffler, received on his eighth birthday the gift of a little violin. Soon a German musician who came from Petersburg to spend summers at this Smjela taught him to play it. Outside these lessons his education was home-gained; while before long the family removed to Hungary. According to Mr. Engel, writing a brief biography of the composer in The Musical Quarterly, "this sojourn in Russia was indelibly graved in the boy's mind." After fifty years and more these impressions were fresh enough to summon music.

To the tone-poem itself, Mr. Loeffler prefixes his own explanatory note:

> Many years ago the composer spent more than three years of his boyhood in a Russian village near the small town of Smjela, in the Government of Kiev. He now seeks to express by the following music what still lives in his heart and memory of those happy days. He recalls in the various strains of his music Russian peasant songs, the Youro[illegible]s Litany-player, "[illegible] happiest of days," fairy-tales and [illegible] songs. The closing movement of the symphonic poem commemorates the death of Vasinka, an elderly peasant, Bayan or story-teller, singer, [illegible] of willow-pipes upon which he [illegible] tunes of weird intervals, and the companion and friend of the boy who now, later in life, notes down what he hopes these pages will tell.

Programs in Prospect

Besides Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem the program for these Symphony Concerts of Dec. 4 and 5 traverses Brahms's "Academic Overture"; Brahms's First Concerto in D minor, for Piano and Orchestra; and the Second Suite of Dances from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe." In the Concerto, Mr. Bauer will play the piano-part—as he did twenty-five years ago when he was first called to the Symphony Concerts.

In the supplementary afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to follow the course of symphonic music from the eighteenth century into the twentieth. The new series begins on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1, with an assortment of early masters and Beethoven for climax, viz.:

Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, No. 3, in G major .... Bach
Pastoral Symphony from "The Messiah" .... Handel
Prelude to the Oratorio, "The Creation" .... Haydn
Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute" .... Mozart
Symphony, No. 5, in C [illegible] .... Beethoven

[illegible] has assembled the following numbers for his concert of piano-

154

Boston Symphony Concert

Monitor Nov 14

THE fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:—

Tansman
Sinfonietta for small orchestra
Satie
"Gymnopédies" (orchestrated by Debussy)
Chabrier
"Bourrée Fantasque" (orchestrated by Mottl)
Rimsky-Korsakoff ......"Schéhérazade"

Tansman's Sinfonietta was played for the first time in America. It runs in four short divisions—Allegro molto, Mazurka, Notturno and Fuga et Toccata. In this Sinfonietta Tansman, in spite of his heralded "modernity," does nothing to offend the taste of the most conservative so far as the actual sound of his music goes. To be sure, those who demand "melody" in music will perhaps find fault with the composer's somewhat slender material, but the work as a whole is so gracefully conceived and written and contains so many pleasing orchestral effects that even they will hardly fail to take pleasure in the greater part of the piece.

Shows Good Taste

This Sinfonietta is not in any sense a work to thrill an audience. In fact its intimacies might better be appreciated in surroundings less vast than those of Symphony Hall. Unfortunately many judge of the importance and value of a work by the size of the orchestra employed and oftentimes by its length. To these again this Sinfonietta will perhaps seem an agreeable trifle and nothing more. In reality, it seemed (to us at least) full of delightful combinations of color, harmony and rhythm; the work of a composer who has not perhaps fully decided on his style, but one giving evidence of that supreme essential in musical composition, good taste in the selection of materials. It is also the work of a well grounded musician who is master of the resources of his art, and one which is in no sense experimental. Mr. Koussevitzky has not always been so fortunate in his choice of novelties, but in this case he is thoroughly justified.

The two "Gymnopédies" of Erik Satie (orchestrated by Debussy) were doubtless played as a tribute to the composer's memory. These graceful pieces exhibit none of the eccentricities of that more than eccentric genius, who withal exerted such an important influence on the musical tendencies of his time. Alas for poor Satie; he will live in musical history rather for this influence than for any intrinsic merit to be found in his compositions. Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque" brought the first part of the program to a brilliant close.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations, as time goes on, seem to group themselves into three classes: those which are musically impossible, as the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz; those which are possible but not altogether probable, as many of his readings of Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, and those in which he so accurately touches just the right note that any other reading would seem absolutely impossible, as his readings of Tchaikowsky, the Brahms symphonies and yesterday's "Schéhérazade."

Rimsky Eloquently

Never has it been our good fortune to assist at so remarkable a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece. Never within recent recollection has the orchestra played with such rare virtuosity, with such glowing tone, with such intelligence and verve. It would seem that each individual member of the band played with all his heart, and the result was a performance of "Schéhérazade" which it would be extremely difficult to equal, let alone surpass.

The credit for this overwhelmingly beautiful performance is due to Mr. Koussevitzky, for he played upon the orchestra with the freedom of a virtuoso playing upon an instrument. Of course, this music is pre-eminently suited to the qualities of his talent. Here was free play for that exuberance of imagination with which he is gifted and which is so often out of keeping with much of the music of the classical repertory. Here he allowed it free rein, and never once did it gain the upper hand of the music. For so often is the music greater than Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of it that many a time he cannot mold it to his fancy. Yesterday, however, composer and conductor were one and the result may hardly be overpraised. Orchestra and audience were warmed by the conductor's enthusiasm as rarely happens at a symphony concert.

S. M.

NOVEMBER 14, 1925

BRILLIANTLY LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By E. F. HARKINS

Serge Koussevitzky's first Boston performance of "Scheherazade," the gorgeous Arabian Nights suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and forthwith took rank among the Russian conductor's finest achievements since he landed on these music-mad shores.

The "Scheherazade" music, depicting the adventures of Sinbad the Sailor, the Kalandar Prince, the gay picturesqueness of a Bagdad fete and other wonders of the ancient world, had not been played at Symphony concerts for well over three years.

BRILLIANT TONE DRAMA

Koussevitzky gave it new dramatic values—new languors, new glimpses of a musky, brilliantly-colored, semi-barbaric East, now throbs of excitement over the tone picture of the ship at sea, pitching and pounding in waves mountains high.

Not a measure of the magnificent score, with its unrivaled symphonic sketches of Arabian Nights drama, missed the revivifying touch of a master conductor tingling himself, as was evident, with the wonderful romantic mood of the music. He summoned his men to rise to the occasion, and they certainly did. It was a virtuoso performance, intensely thrilling, with glory for all. Mr. Burgin played the violin solos delightfully. He caught the glow of the music, too.

NOVEL SINFONIETTA.

This fifth Symphony program opens with the first American presentation of young Alexander Tansman's "Sinfonietta" for small orchestra. The Tansman music is caviare for the most part; experimental, yet showing melodic gifts and technical ingenuity. The audience liked the performance if not the music.

Two of Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," Greek festival pieces orchestrated by Debussy, were also played at the Symphony concerts for the first time yesterday, though they are [illegible] no means new. The themes are [illegible] and so is Debussy's or-

---

The Christian Science Benevolent Association

SANATORIUM

910 Boylston Street, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

A temporary home for those under Christian Science treatment and a resort where Christian Scientists may go and recruit. Staff of nurses and attendants available when this assistance is needed.

Address correspondence regarding admittance and requests for application blanks to: The Christian Science Benevolent Association, 236 Huntington Ave., Boston 17, Mass.

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Nov 15

The least memorable of Beethoven's symphonies, his fourth, is the chief item on the program of this week's Symphony concerts. Other repertory pieces by Mozart and Wagner and a novelty by Aaron Copland complete the announced list of numbers. Mr Koussevitzky has not this season been prone to alter his programs after announcing them, as he so often did last year.

◆

It is especially gratifying to find the new piece on a Symphony program the work of an American and not of a Russian, a Frenchman or some other European. Other things being equal, American music should be given preference on American concert programs. This is not to favor the performance of music merely because it was composed in America by an American. Bad music is bad music and unworthy of performance no matter what its nationality. But such great and striking talent as that manifested in Mr Copland's organ symphony heard last season and in his Passacaglia, played last week by Mr Leedy, deserves every possible encouragement. If while under 25 Mr Copland can write music so notable, what may we not hope from him? There are other American composers, the late Charles T. Griffes, for instance, whom Mr Koussevitzky should not ignore in favor of Parisian hack writers like Borchard and Roland Manuel. Griffes' "Khubla Khan" and Ernest Schelling's "Victory Ball," both played at these concerts under Mr Monteux, deserve revival better than such inferior things as Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" orchestrated by Mottl.

KOUSSEVITZKY EXCELLS IN NEW WORK

Amer By Moses Smith Nov 14

Fresh from listening to a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," which is the final number on this week's Symphony program, one feels at a loss for words to describe its sheer magnificence. We shall undoubtedly cool down, but at present writing we feel secure in stating that in this piece Mr. Koussevitzky has done his finest work since he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course the playing of the men in the orchestra was superb in the Scheherazade, which is a virtuoso piece for display of orchestral technique, besides being gorgeous and colorful music. But that does not account for its immense success with the work. It was the directing genius of Koussevitzky, at home in a work of art that exactly meets his dynamic temperament, his Russian flare for color, and his brilliant imagination, that was most responsible for the artistic triumph.

Certainly this great Russian masterpiece has never sounded to any of the present generation as it sounded yesterday at Symphony Hall. Listening to it, one had little difficulty in visualizing the beauty and pageantry, the adventure and mystery of the Thousand and One Nights.

The opening Sinfonietta, by a new Parisian-Polish composer, Tansman, was played for the first time in America. It is not an imposing work, being written for a small chamber orchestra, and its four movements are very short. But they are packed full of meat, from the very opening measure, which breaks out into a delightful melody. This man has a rare talent for melody, his harmony is often revolutionary, and he uses the orchestra in marvellously economical fashion.

Harold Bauer will play at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Brahms's first piano concerto. He played it at his first appearance in America with the Boston orchestra 25 years ago, and he has played it twice at Symphony concerts since then. It is fair to presume that if he plays it two or three times more he will really like it. At the concerts this week we shall hear Mr. Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood," which has already been performed in Evanston, Ill.; Chicago, Cleveland, New York. It was high time for a performance in Boston.

P. H.

Herald Nov 29

American Nov 21

PENSION FUND

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Monday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Overture to Egmont. All reserved seats having been taken for both performances, the usual rule at Symphony concerts will be waived and standing room sold.

STAGE

Every Sunday—NOVEN

gram. Only standing room tickets remain for these two pension fund concerts.

SYMPHONY AT ZENITH OF POWERS

Post —— Nov 14

Dazzling Virtuosity Is Displayed in Playing "Scheherazade"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the portentous announcement of the opening phrase of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, it became immediately clear that something out of the ordinary in the way of orchestral performance was about to come to pass. And come to pass it did.

Surely never before had a Boston audience heard so brilliant, so fanciful, so gorgeously colored a performance of Rimsky's palace of enchantments as that of yesterday, a performance in which conductor and players gave all they had to give—and then, it would seem, more besides!

CAUSES WONDER

Already this year there had been reason to believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now at its tonal zenith. Yesterday in "Scheherazade" that belief was made a certainty. The singing strings, vibrant and full-throated, the dazzling, piercing trumpets, the horns that were as gold and steel, the plangent sonority of the trombones, the acid sweetness of the reeds, the stirring beat and beguiling tinkle of the percussion; these were things to make the listener to marvel alike at the mind which could conceive such sounds, at the conductor who could call them forth, and at the orchestra that, respondng, could produce them.

And no less remarkable than the orchestral virtuosity, the sheer tonal splendor of this performance, was its power of suggestion. As Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra realized to the full the gold and silver, the purple and crimson of Rimsky-Korsakov's marvellous intrumentation, so did they likewise call into being the rich imagery that lies within this music. Whether it was the mighty, swelling, sun-lit sea that bore the ship of Sinbad, the colors and odors of the bazaar where the mumbling crowd listened to the words of the narrator, the beauty of Kamar-al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, the riotous revelings of Bagdad, the crash of the ship against the rock or the poetry of the final closing, slow and reluctant, of ths book of wonders, Mr. Koussevitzky divined them in the score and brought them to wholly satisfying realization.

"Scheherazade" and the concert ended, the audience thrice recalled Mr. Koussevitzky, who bade the orchestra as a whole, and in particular Mr. Burgin whose violin had been voice to Scheherazade herself, share in the applause.

A "Sinfonietta" for small orchestra, practically a chamber-orchestra, by the Parisianized Pole, Alexander Tansman, a composer new to Boston, begins the programme of this fifth pair of Symphony Concerts. Between it and Rimsky's Suite come, for the first time in Symphony Hall, the two of the youthful Satie's unpretentious Gymnopedies," judiciously orchestrated by Debussy, and after them Mottl's orchestration of the brilliant and diverting "Bourree Fantasque" of Chabrier.

Refreshingly spontaneous, skilfully fashioned, daringly yet not perversely dissonant in harmony, abundantly melodious in the modern acceptance of the term, the four movements of Tansman's "Sinfonietta" gave immediate and decided pleasure. If M[illegible] Tansman has made more music of th[illegible] calibre, by all means let us have it.

LAYING THE COURSE, TRYING THE TALENT, OVER THE CONCERTS

Transcript —— Nov 20

ROOM AT LAST FOR MR. LOEFFLER IN RUSSIA

His "Memories of Childhood" in a Fortnight—Mr. Bauer's Quarter-Century—Paderewski's Pieces—The New York String Quartet and Chamber-Music Alive Again—A Pianist at Cambridge—Mr. Grainger's Return

WITHIN two weeks Mr. Loeffler's music, "Memories of My Childhood," will be heard in Boston. After many days, Mr. Koussevitzky has set the tone-poem on the program of the Symphony Concerts for Friday and Saturday, Dec. 4 and 5. Seldom, unless it was of his own will, has Mr. Loeffler waited so long for performance in his own city. . . . In 1924, the North Shore Music Festival, an annual series of concerts at Evanston, the suburb of Chicago, offered prizes for orchestral pieces written by American composers. For the symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood," Mr. Loeffler received first honors. The music was played at Evanston on May 29, in Chicago on Oct. 24-25, by Mr. Stock and his orchestra. In the intervening year, New York, Cleveland and other cities have heard and praised it. Now, belatedly, Boston may know and applaud.

Though, Mr. Loeffler was born in Alsace, his father's calling, as agricultural chemist and breeder of horses, led the family a wandering life. One of these migrations carried it to a country town in Russia. There the child, Charles Martin Tornov Loeffler, received on his eighth birthday the gift of a little violin. Soon a German musician who came from Petersburg to spend summers at this Smjela taught him to play it. Outside these lessons his education was home-gained; while before long the family removed to Hungary. According to Mr. Engel, writing a brief biography of the composer in The Musical Quarterly, "this sojourn in Russia was indelibly graved in the boy's mind." After fifty years and more these impressions were fresh enough to summon music.

To the tone-poem itself, Mr. Loeffler prefixes his own explanatory note:

> Many years ago the composer spent more than three years of his boyhood in a Russian village near the small town of Smjela, in the Government of Kiev. He now seeks to express by the following music what still lives in his heart and memory of those happy days. He recalls in the various strains of his music Russian peasant songs, the Yourod's Litany-prayer, "the happiest of days," fairy-tales and dance-songs. The closing movement of the symphonic poem commemorates the death of Vasinka, an elderly peasant, Bayan or story-teller, singer, maker of willow-pipes upon which he played tunes of weird intervals, and the companion and friend of the boy who now, later in life, notes down what he hopes these pages will tell.

Programs in Prospect

Besides Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, the program for these Symphony Concerts of Dec. 4 and 5 traverses: Brahms's "Academic Overture"; Brahms First Concerto, in D minor, for Piano and Orchestra; and the Second Suite of Dances from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." In the Concerto, Mr. Bauer will play the piano-part—as he did twenty-five years ago when he was first called to the Symphony Concerts.

In the supplementary afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to follow the course of symphonic music from the eighteenth century into the twentieth. The new series begins on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1, with an assortment of early masters and Beethoven for climax, viz.

Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, No. 3, in G major ....Bach
Pastoral Symphony from "The Messiah" .Handel
Prelude to the Oratorio, "The Creation" ..Haydn
Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute" Mozart
Symphony, No. 5, in C [illegible] ....Beethoven

[illegible]rewski has assembled the following numbers for his concert of pian-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Boston Symphony Concert

Monitor Nov 21

THE program of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Mozart—Overture to "The Magic Flute."
Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60.
Copland—"Music for the Theater."
Wagner—Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Copland's "Music for the Theater" was played for the first time. It runs in five divisons—Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue, and is written for a small orchestra of a flute (interchangeable with piccolo); oboe (interchangeable with English horn); clarinet (interchangeable with clarinet piccolo); bassoon, two trumpets, trombone, two first violins, two second violins, two violas, two violoncellos, double bass, pianoforte, one percussion player playing xylophone, glockenspiel, wood block, snare drum, bass drum and cymbals. The number of strings was slightly augmented at yesterday's performance. It was the first composition by an American Mr. Koussevitzky has played this season.

There is little in this music that calls for extended comment. Mr. Copland has assimilated certain formulas of his contemporaries and immediate predecessors to considerable advantage. It is possible to discover here and there certain modes of expression which may perhaps be characterized as peculiarly his own. The principal defect in this work is its lack of invention. There are melodic fragments to be heard now and again, but it must be confessed that they are of no great charm. In noisy and more boisterous moods, the composer is most successful.

Orchestral Effects

Also he has contrived occasional orchestral effects which may hardly be qualified as charming, or even startling, but which are none the less of a certain degree of novelty. When he would pass to a quieter, more poetic and imaginative mood, however, his themes are short winded and fragmentary and his harmonic scheme is more often than not trite and obvious. In the sections labeled Dance and Burlesque a degree of rhythmical life was to be expected, but the composer in this matter as well again lacks invention.

But this composition marks a distinct progress over the Symphony for organ and orchestra by Mr. Copland played here last year. It is less complicated. What Mr. Copland has to say he says with much more simplicity and directness, and if the matter of this "Music for the Theater" is no particularly arresting, the manner o its presentation is much more logic and less inexperienced. Again, must be conceded that to write for small combination of instruments much more difficult than to compose for a large orchestra, although many would judge of the worth of a piece by the number of instruments employed in its performance. In thus restraining himself Mr. Copland shows good judgment.

A Musical Reading

Mr. Koussevitzky's playing of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony was by far the most sympathetic of any of his interpretations of this composer's music he has done up to the present. Yesterday he seemed content to let Beethoven himself take the center of the stage. The music was allowed to take its natural course unhampered, and it was possible to realize without too great an exercise of the imagination just what he was attempting to express. There were moments of exceedingly beautiful playing, notably in the Adagio, and there were life and gayety in the Scherzo and Finale, without rhythmical distortion. Excellent too were the mysterious opening measures. In short, it was a reading eminently sane and musical, a reading to delight those who are content with Beethoven's music for its own sake and who do not see in it simply a medium for this or that conductor's peculiar interpretation of it.

So also was Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of Mozart's Overture, which, save for the slightly rough tone of the brass, was played as one fancies the composer would have liked to hear it.

S. M.

Monitor Nov 23

The Ninth Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, a concert yesterday afternoon Symphony Hall in aid of its sion fund, presenting Beethov "Egment" Overture and N Symphony. It was assisted in symphony by the Harvard Glee the Radcliffe Choral Society, Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; vada Van der Veer, contr Charles Stratton, tenor, and Patton, bass.

The performance of the symp was magnificent. Everybody cerned seemed inspired by this music. Mr. Koussevitzky was most eloquent and poetic mood, players, chorus and soloists clearly caught fire from him. B ing on the foundation laid two ago by Mr. Monteux and Dr. Dav he reared a resplendent edifi sound. G. Wallace Woodworth inug conductor of the choruses Mrs. Robert Winternitz, his assi share the honors.

An innovation that added mu the effectiveness of the final ment was the placing of the q behind the orchestra, in the of the chorus. The soloists really a minor, though an impo role to play. Their withdrawal the edge of the crowded platfor hanced the beauty of the solo and greatly improved the ense by correcting a disproporti visual and tonal emphasis.

Detailed criticism of such a perb performance seems out place. It is sufficient to say tha first movement was thrilling, Scherzo delightful, the Adagio ch ing; while the Finale renewed t pleasures and added a stirring pression of noble aspiration.

The overture was admi played. The audience, which flowed along the walls, was wa appreciative. The concert will repeated this evening.

E. A.

---

ymphoı

LL MEASURE, LIVELY METTLE, AMPLE PLEASU

Transcript — Nov 1

NDUCTOR, COMPOSERS AND ORCHESTRA

Ir. Koussevitzky Presents Mr. Ta man Favorably — From Satie Chabrier Extremes of the Dance "Scheherazade" at Last Full-Flavored Other Incidents of a Spirited Symphonic Day

A DISCRIMINATING, a considerate, conductor is Mr. Koussevitzky—man of the world as well as musician, perhaps discoverer in his turn that here in America undue earnestness is bane to the practice and the enjoyment of the arts. From time to time he shapes a Symphony Concert as pleasant entertainment—to the irritation of those that take their music as education and inspiration. Putting on their most serious warmth and rhythmic motion; lingers gracefully over less ardent matter; harks back to the earlier vigors. The Scherzo tosses about the phrases and makes play with thei rhythms of a Mazurka. A Polish sensibility turns the music now gay and now dreamy; a Parisian fancy adds light conductors have often worried it. Plainly also it is an oriental music; as such conductors have often drenched and drugged it. Hereabouts and in these days, only Mr. Koussevitzky has distilled from it the fickle flavors of the Arabian Nights.

In spite of her lengths, Scheherazade was an impetuous story-teller. Once embarked, she could not long keep to a text or to a mood. Now in her tales she was gay and frolicsome; again she mocked and was bitter; she could be cruel and she could be kind; she sopped up the wonders and the magics of the heavens above, the earth beneath and the waters that roll between; yet she could play on the street-corners and keep most questionable company. Half the wonder, half the pleasure of the Arabian Nights is this perpetual shifting through a thousand and one moods. Rimsky's Suite is as fitful and various, as alive to each fresh-coming fancy. Yet until Mr. Koussevitzky played it yesterday, scarcely a conductor has caught this diversity, this jostle, this high pitch—ever changing.

H. T. P.

BOSTON HERALD, SAT

SYMPHONY GIVES FIFTH CONCERT

Sinfonietta by Tansman Played First Time in This Country

Nov 14

OTHER NOTABLE PIECES PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Tansman, Sinfonietta (first time in this country); Satie-Debussy, Gymnopedies (first time at these concerts); Chabrier-Mottl; Bourree Fantasque; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

Tansman is in his 29th year. He has not been idle. One sees him writing music night and day, and with both hands, for the list of his compositions is already long. This Sinfonietta, in four movements, written in 1924 and first performed last March in Paris, is for a double quintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones and some percussion instruments. The movements are short. (Not long ago a Sinfonietta by Tcherepnine performed in London lasted 50 minutes. The question naturally arose: How long would a symphony by this composer last?)

If the movements are short, they, nevertheless, contain many ideas worthy of respectful consideration. The composer has lived in Paris for the last five years. No doubt he learned there by hearing the later works of Stravinsky and those of the younger Frenchmen that surprising results could be obtained from the skilful use of a few instruments; but Tansman has not followed blindly in the footsteps of these men. He has his own scheme; he can speak with his own voice. The first Allegro, the second movement (in Mazurka form) and the finale (Fugue and Toccata) are amusing in the larger, more liberal meaning of that word. While the expression is decidedly free, the music is not merely a rambling succession of sounds; it is not simply experimental; there are definite ideas and they are interesting in themselves, however curiously they may be clothed at times. There are pages that might be considered as thought out for the piano, rather than the orchestra, but there is also an audacious use of instruments, solo, and in combination, that is not displeasing. The third movement, a Nocturne, is charming, though no doubt the ultra-conservatives will not agree to this. It is hard for some to pay attention to any music that is out of the well-worn ruts in which so many composers, especially those of low degree, have contentedly plodded, knowing that they will be regarded as not dangerous to the community; not realizing that they have not the courage (perhaps not the ability) to strike out new paths for themselves, nervous if they should stray, though a little, from the long-trampled, dusty road.

Debussys orchestrated with exquisite taste the two Spartan dances of that strange being, Erik Satie. Remember that at the Gymnopaedia, the festival of "naked youths," there was homage paid to the Spartans who had fallen in battle at Thyrea; but in these sacred dances of Satie there is no beating of the breast, no shedding of tears, no shrieks of lamentation. There is a classic serenity, the beauty of a Grecian frieze depicting the last rites. Simple as this music is, it is more impressive than many elegies for swollen and resounding orchestra. Would not the performance, beautiful as it was, have been still more noteworthy if the chords for the harps in the second dance had been plucked with greater emphasis, to set firmly the rhythm, to establish the stately mood? These chords yesterday were hardly audible. Furthermore, a slightly quicker pace for the second dance might have been of benefit.

The highest compliment that could be paid the late Felix Mottl as a transcriber of Chabrier's Bourree is that he orchestrated it as the brilliant and audacious Chabrier might have done. A year ago the eminently respectable Charles Koechlin orchestrated this Bourree. It was said that he endeavored "to disengage the essentially musical element of the work without emphasizing the comical." There is nothing so comical in the Bourree as Koechlin's endeavor. Should he be praised for his courage in putting Mottl aside? Then let us praise the daring man who is announced as an illustrator of Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques," ignoring the fact that Gustave Dore had done this in marvelous fashion; let us praise the rash American who followed Tenniel as an illustrator of Alice's adventures. The performance of the Bourree yesterday was one of dazzling virtuosity inspired by Mr. Koussevitzky's fiery, yet always musical reading.

As eloquent and as remarkable was his interpretation of "Scheherazade." How sensible, how shrewd it was of Rimsky-Korsakov in not giving an interlinear translation in tones of this or that tale from "The Thousand Nights and a Night"! He intended at first to give only the title "Scheherazade" to the Suite, and Prelude, Ballade, Adagio, Finale to the four movements. As it is, one can find what one pleases. One can find the Princess Budur, the princess of radiant beauty and the astonishing practical joke, or any princess borne off by Jinniyah or Ifrit. One can descend into the crypt with one Kalandar or enter the fatal chamber high on the mountain with the most unfortunate Kalandar of the three.

Some have complained of "Scheherazade" that it is too heavily scented; music that cloys with

"Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread
underfoot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandal-root."

This reproach could not be brought against Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation. Intensely dramatic as a whole, it abounded in contrasts that were not too episodic, but were essential to the general conception and the gorgeous musical picture of the Orient. An interpretation that was elastic, yet firmly knit. The performance, both in solo work and in ensemble, was one long to be remembered.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 4, B Flat Major; Copland, Music for the Theatre (four movements; Mss; first performance); Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

ALEXANDRE TANSMA

Herald. —— Nov 22

The Polish Modern of Moderns — Harvard Dramatic Club's Policy

The Sinfonietta by Alexandre Tansman, played at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in the United States, excited discussion. As was to be expected some took the music as a personal attack on their composure; others were deeply interested and found much to like and praise. It is therefore interesting to hear from a close personal friend of Tansman, Mr. Slonimsky, who is now in Boston for the musical season. It should be remembered that the Sinfonietta was composed for a small orchestra. The effect produced might have been greater if the performance had been in Jordan hall.

"Tansman voluntarily limited his resources, and thus singularly demonstrated the prowess of one who is sufficient master to be able to say: 'Here are the beautiful garments at my disposal—I'll see whether I could dispense with them without fear of being likened to the king in Andersen's tale, who appeared naked in the streets, imagining that he was dressed in marvellous clothes.'

"Rimsky-Korsakoff once remarked that the inexperienced composers who do not know how to use their talents—supposing that they have any—usually jump upon the brass section of the orchestra seeking there satisfaction to their insatiable ambition—to make their work sound. It does sound, but the cheapness of the composer's ideas manifests itself the more palpably. Economical use of one's resources constitutes the very pivot of art. So the ungifted waste, whereas the talented select.

"Tansman's work is not an isolated phenomenon of this new current in music which could be expressed in a prohibitive slogan: 'Confine yourself to the necessary.' It would be hazardous to speculate, but there are strong indications that this dash 'back to the simplicity of the eighteenth century' is due not only to the natural reaction to Wagnerian tumultuous waterfalls of orchestral music, but also to the economical crisis which leaves little hope for the authors composing for a large orchestra—there are too few large orchestras in the world to give satisfaction to all the composers of modern scores.

"But a composer who writes for so called 'chamber orchestra' (the term seems to acclimatize itself readily, and will soon find its way into musical dictionaries) will have more opportunity to have his work produced. This voluntary limitation, which was caused by heterogeneous circumstances, has opened, as it were, a new chapter in the art of musical composition. To try a new combination of instruments, yielding new sonorities, is in itself an attractive thought. And we have a full list of the compositions for 'chamber orchestra' written by the foremost modern composers; Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Schoenberg. Many others have set their hands to this initiative.

"Since the chamber orchestra gains its way, even when a large one is available, we cannot put the blame for this exclusively on the economical disturbances. We have before us a new phenomenon and a new problem. The Bostonian public has had the occasion to form an opinion. Tansman's Sinfonietta is a pioneer of this type of music.

"Alexandre Tansman, born in 1897, a Pole, educated in Russia, has made Paris his home for five years, and, sponsored by Ravel, and cherished later by Koussevitzky, has gained his position at a quick pace. In a 'Who's Who in Music,' he could be listed as the most prominent representative of Polish music, with a strong mark of modern French musical culture. In the charming Mazurka (second part of the Sinfonietta, Polish nature and French culture are conspicuously shown.

"Tansman started his composition at an early age. He was 17 when his first orchestral work, 'Prometheus,' was performed by the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra. He was 20 when he won at once the first, the second and the third prizes at the competition of Polish composers. This victory, which caused much confusion in the ranks of esteemed deans of Polish music, almost cost him too dearly, but the exasperated minds had to submit to the fact, and the boy-modernist was amicably received by Paderewski, despite the obvious discrepancy in their musical beliefs.

"Paris was an unexplored field to Alexandre Tansman. The musical public hardly know him. His Sonata for Violin and Piano has been played by Bronislaw Huberman. His Polish triumphs have been to his credit, too, but in the boiling pot of Parisian artistic life, all the pre-war merits did not count. Tansman rejected all that he had previously done (too ruthlessly one might have said) and started anew.

"Although he did not know the modern French composers while in Poland, still at the moment of meeting with the French musical culture, he found what he knew already in the metaphysical realm of sounds. The contact was a happy one—Tansman acquired a new richness, a new independent technic, and overcame in due time the influences which have submerged many a courageous composer. The most terrific force was, to be sure, that of Stravinsky. Tansman still bears traces of Stravinsky's enormous personality scattered here and there, sharply pointed in his obstinate chords and rhythms. One can detect Scriabin's unearthly spirit in the meditative passages which Tansman pleases himself to alternate with the strenuous accumulations of harmonic pressure. But beyond all this Tansman remains himself.

"What are the chief features of Tansman's music? His mastership and dexterity go without saying: the 'up-to-date' composers have to have it all ready before their advent to the musical world. Tansman has more than that—he succeeds in creating a personality. He invents easily; yet his works are intricate enough to confuse an unsophisticated listener.

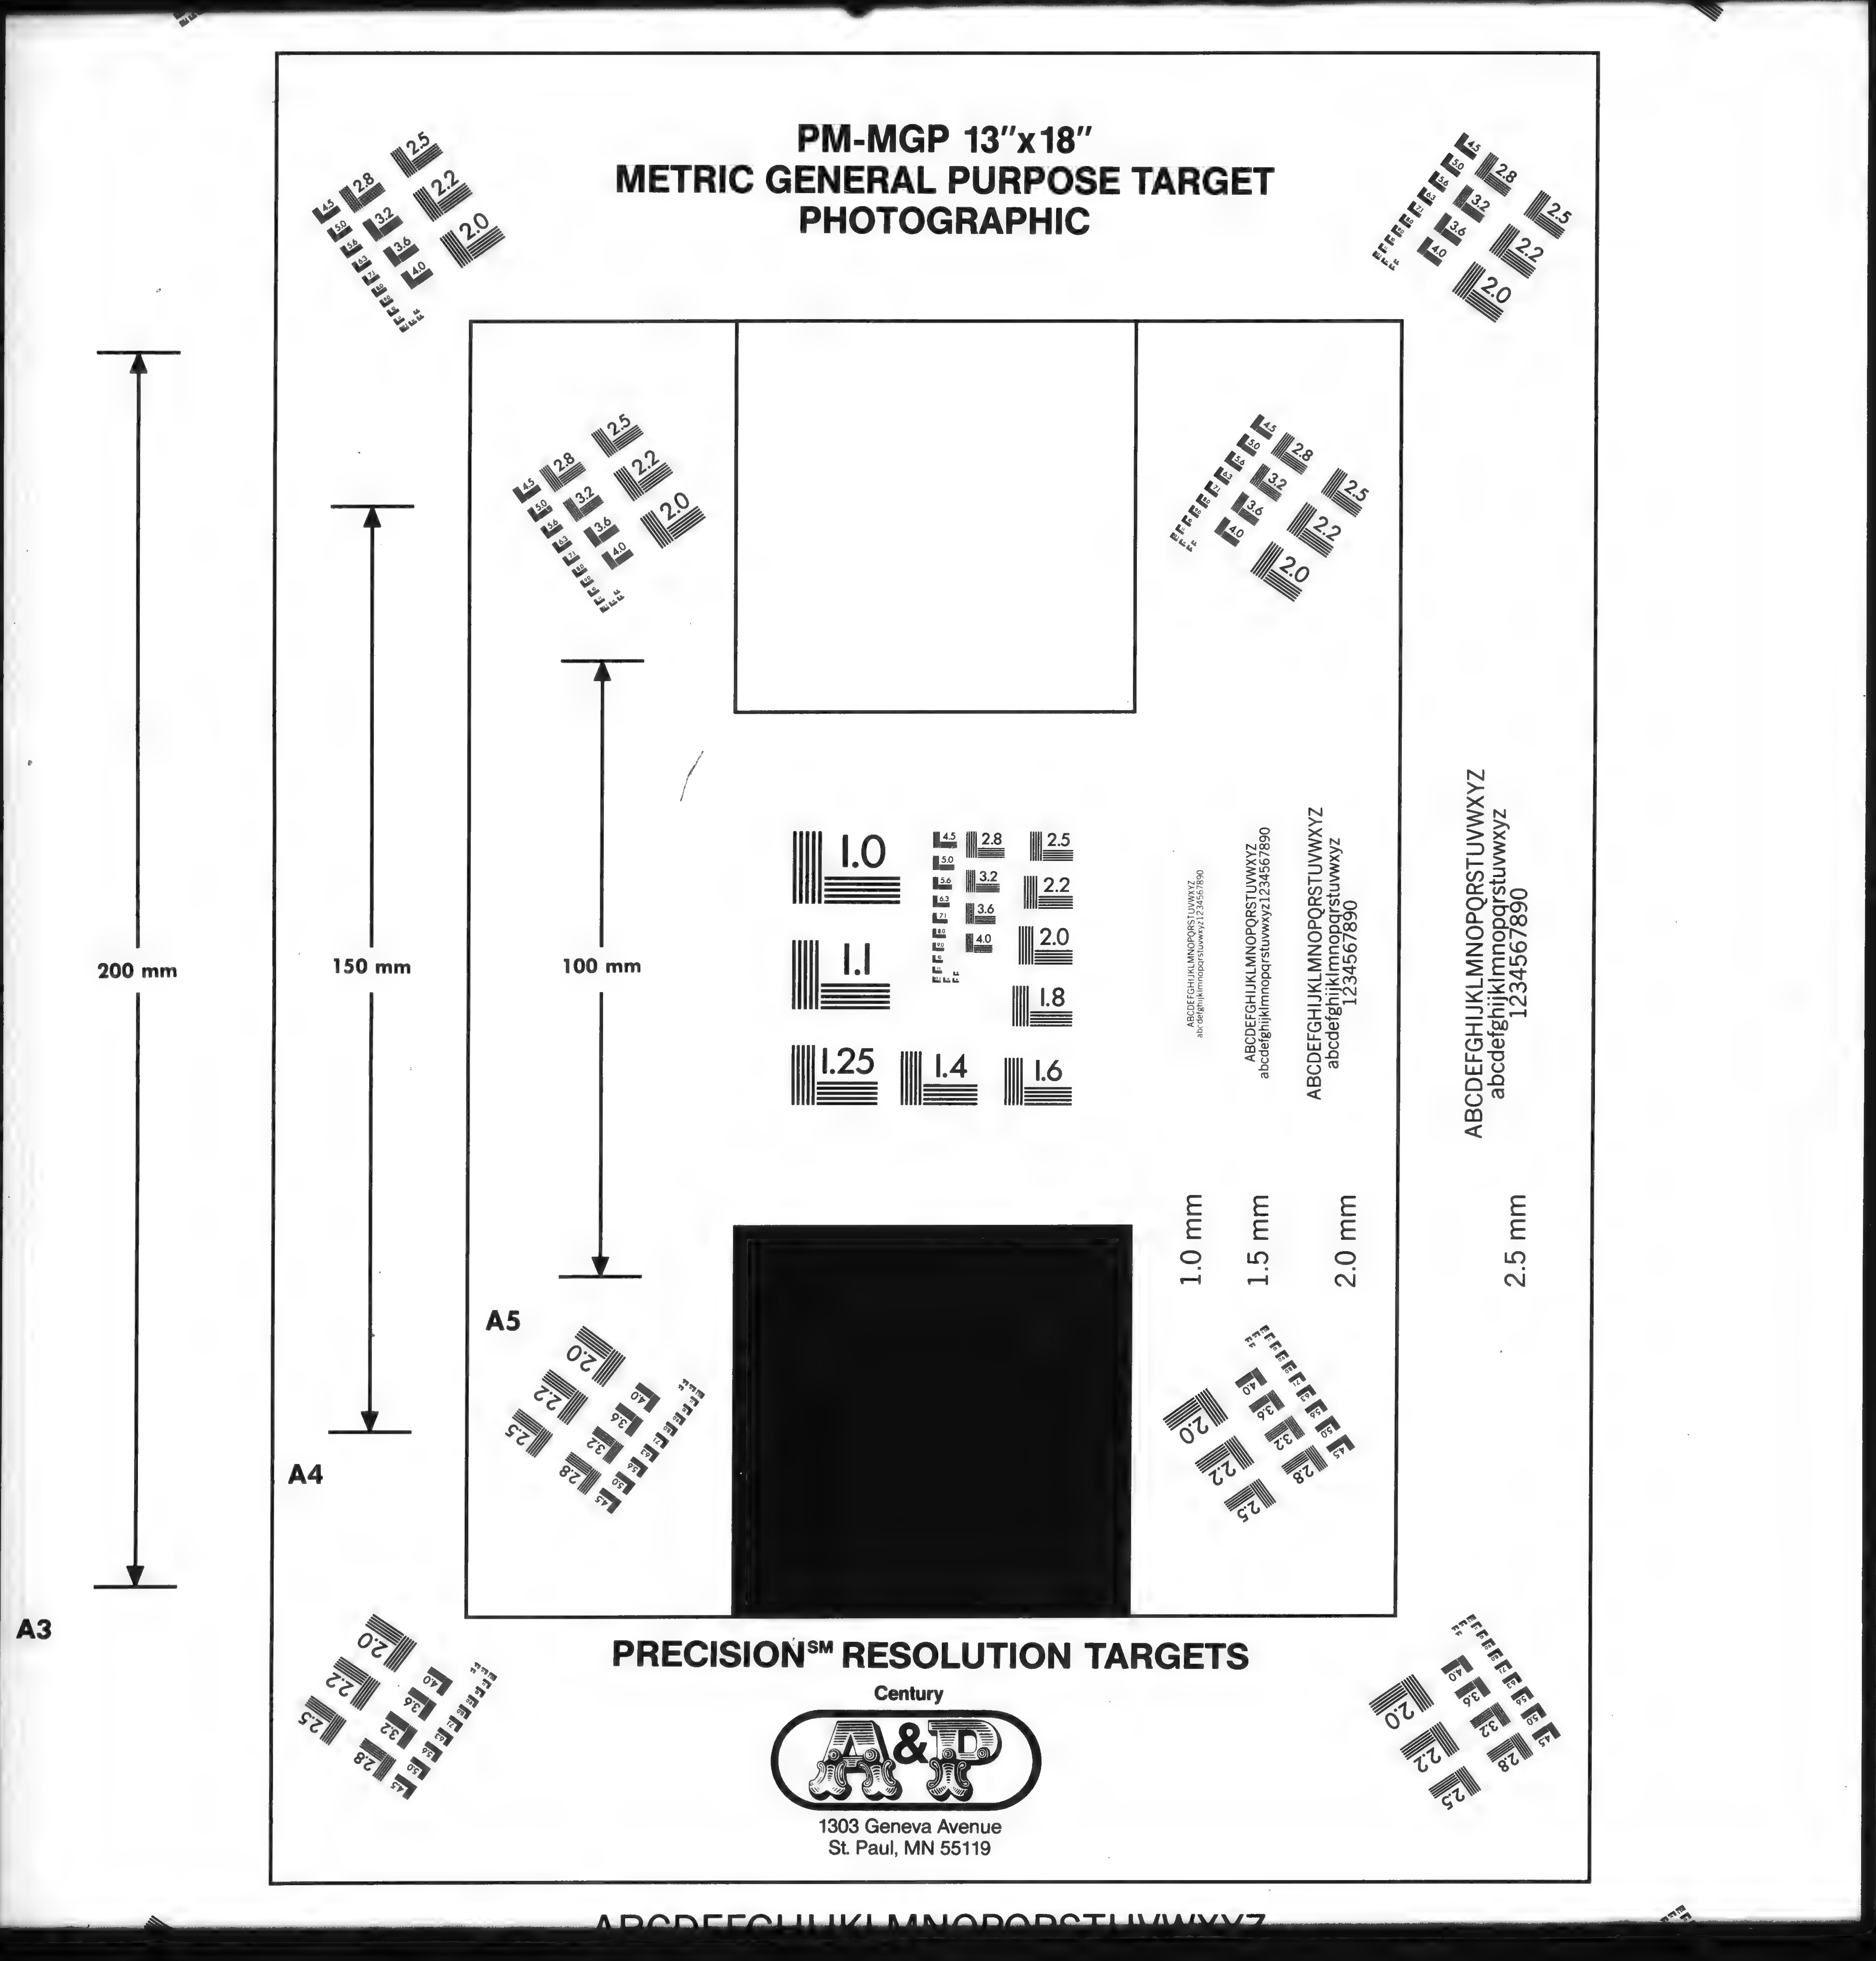
"His Scherzo Symphonique (which was performed at Koussevitzky's concert in Paris in 1922) reveals his sardonic mind; the piercing arrows of his irony are directed with skillful energy. The orchestration is sharp and clear; he favors the trumpet and often gives to this instrument his consise and short themes. 'La Legende,' which is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitsky, belongs to the same period, though it differs from the Scherzo in construction and design. The 'Danse de la Sorciere' for orchestra, follows shortly afterwards. Many songs and piano pieces fill the space between the orchestral works. In these pieces he scatters his bits of irony more liberally. 'A paradox, a paradox, a most ingenious paradox!' one would exclaim after listening to the Etude for Piano, written in two contradicting keys—F sharp major, and C major. But Tansman delights in paradoxes, and one forgives him the trouble.

"The future will show what will be Tansman's place in the development of modern music. In his art he is plentifully gifted, delightfully prodigal, and entrancingly captivating. All the rest depends upon the durability and the solidity of the substance. But no one of us is competent enough to foretell the final balance 'sub specie aeternitatis.'

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY."

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
2.0
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

for perform-
In 1924, the l, an annual n, the suburb for orchestral mposers. For ories of My ved first hon-at Evanston
Oct. 24-25, by
In the in-Cleveland and praised it.
know and rn in Alsace, tural chemist the family a e migrations

n in Russia.
rtin Tornov nth birthday on a German etersburg to taught him ons his edu-before long
ry. Accord-ef biography
l Quarterly, as indelibly
After fifty ssions were
c.
Loeffler pre-oser spent s boyhood the small rnment of ss by the ves in his e happy us strains

nt songs,
"the hap-
d dance-nt of the ates the peasant, r, maker
e played the com-who now, he hopes poem, the oncerts of s's "Aca-Concerto, estra; and m Ravel's the Conano-part—when he Concerts. n concerts

r. Kousse-course of eenth cennew series
ec. 1, with sters and

No. 3, in
..........Bach
iah''.Handel
ion''..Haydn
Flute''
Mozart
...Beethoven
ed the fol-of piano-

Koussevitzky has played

There is little in this music that calls for extended comment. Mr. Copland has assimilated certain formulas of his contemporaries and immediate predecessors to considerable advantage. It is possible to discover here and there certain modes of expression which may perhaps be characterized as peculiarly his own. The principal defect in this work is its lack of invention. There are melo dic fragments to be heard now an again, but it must be confessed tha they are of no great charm. In nois and more boisterous moods, the com poser is most successful.

Orchestral Effects

Also he has contrived occasion orchestral effects which may hard be qualified as charming, or eve startling, but which are none the le of a certain degree of novelty. Wh he would pass to a quieter, mo poetic and imaginative mood, how ever, his themes are short wind and fragmentary and his harmon scheme is more often than not tri and obvious. In the sections label Dance and Burlesque a degree rhythmical life was to be expecte but the composer in this matter well again lacks invention.

But this composition marks a di tinct progress over the Symphony f organ and orchestra by Mr. Copla played here last year. It is less co plicated. What Mr. Copland has say he says with much more simp city and directness, and if the matt of this "Music for the Theater" is n particularly arresting, the manner its presentation is much more logic and less inexperienced. Again, must be conceded that to write for small combination of instruments

---

Monitor Nov 23

The Ninth Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gav a concert yesterday afternoon i Symphony Hall in aid of its pe sion fund, presenting Beethoven "Egment" Overture and Nin Symphony. It was assisted in th symphony by the Harvard Glee Clu the Radcliffe Choral Society, an Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; N vada Van der Veer, contralt Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fr Patton, bass.

The performance of the sympho was magnificent. Everybody co cerned seemed inspired by this gre music. Mr. Koussevitzky was in h most eloquent and poetic mood, a players, chorus and soloists ali clearly caught fire from him. Buil ing on the foundation laid two yea ago by Mr. Monteux and Dr. Davis he reared a resplendent edifice sound. G. Wallace Woodworth, a inug conductor of the choruses, a Mrs. Robert Winternitz, his assista share the honors.

An innovation that added much the effectiveness of the final mo ment was the placing of the quar behind the orchestra, in the mi of the chorus. The soloists h really a minor, though an importa rôle to play. Their withdrawal fr the edge of the crowded platform hanced the beauty of the solo voi and greatly improved the ensem by correcting a disproportion visual and tonal emphasis.

Detailed criticism of such a perb performance seems out place. It is sufficient to say that first movement was thrilling, Scherzo delightful, the Adagio cha ing; while the Finale renewed th pleasures and added a stirring pression of noble aspiration.

The overture was admir played. The audience, which o flowed along the walls, was wa appreciative. The concert wil repeated this evening. L. A.

Beethoven's music for and who do not see in it simply a medium for this or that conductor's peculiar interpretation of it.

So also was Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of Mozart's Overture, which, save for the slightly rough tone of the brass, was played as one fancies the composer would have liked to hear it. S. M.

Symphony

FULL MEASURE, LIVELY METTLE, AMPLE PLEASURE

Transcript — Nov 14

CONDUCTOR, COMPOSERS AND AN ORCHESTRA

Mr. Koussevitzky Presents Mr. Tansman Favorably — From Satie and Chabrier Extremes of the Dance — "Scheherazade" at Last Full-Flavored — Other Incidents of a Spirited Symphonic Day

A DISCRIMINATING, a considerate, conductor is Mr. Koussevitzky—man of the world as well as musician, perhaps discoverer in his turn that here in America undue earnestness is bane to the practice and the enjoyment of the arts. From time to time he shapes a Symphony Concert as pleasant entertainment—to the irritation of those that take their music as education and inspiration. Putting on their most serious "front," they call him a "charlatan" and demand that a Herr Kapellmeister, if possible a Herr Doktor, be summoned forthwith from darkest Stettin. Almost to their faces, the audience mocks these alarmists. It is pleased and makes no secret of its pleasure. Gleefully it claps its palms together and—quite as significantly on a Friday afternoon—hears the concert through. It is the more exhilarated when, as happened yesterday, the agreeable pieces also disclose the new quality of the orchestra as a delicate instrument of tonal poetry, a vigorous instrument of tonal power, an instrument withal of unfailing pliancy and precision.

Not above a whisper sounded many of the measures of Satie's imaginary Spartan dances; yet this wisp and gossamer of tone sustained line, rhythm, euphonies, color. In Mottl's orchestral arrangement of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," the choirs shouted the motivs; whipped them into motion; tossed them hither and thither; outflung them in climax. Exuberance of rhythm and ardor of progress might not further go—both clear-voiced; sensitive, besides, to every stroke with which composer and arranger would set contrast to these tumults. In turn, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" was a heyday for virtuosi. Every instrumental group, almost every "first desk," proved its general and particular mettle. Seldom in Symphony Hall has this coat of many tonal colors shone with such clear and manifold lustres. Nor was the orchestra content with Rimsky iridescent. It laid on his thicker textures, his sharper edges; kept a tone and a rhythm that could be as sensuous or as acrid as this music of The Arabian Nights. Before long, Philadelphia may not be the sole seat of orchestral perfections.

At the outset enjoyment—not to say levity—was in the air. The audience heard cheerfully and applauded warmly a new and unknown modernist. For a young man of twenty-eight, Mr. Alexander Tansman of Warsaw and Páris has written a superfluous quantity of music—as though there were not enough already in the world. He has also written at least one amusing piece—the Sinfonietta for Small Orchestra played yesterday. The suspicion increases that it passes for a virtue with these young modernists to be amusing; that in their lesser work they deliberately cultivate that desirable end. The romantic generation descended from Wagner and tutored at the knee of Strauss was over-serious. With a sigh, it would bind into a single tone-poem a vision of the cosmos—by, large and also thick. The altar-boys of the Debussyan chapel lingered over-long in silvery mists and dipped their fingers twice too often in water of roses.

Reaction from both neo-romantics and neo-impressionists was bound to come, and the younger modernists, with a backward and trustful glance toward Stravinsky and Ravel, made speed to improve the opportunity. They swore an oath against the three deadly vices—sentiment, pretence and conformity. They cultivated a pretty skill, brevity and wit. As they wrote, high spirits hid their pains. If they eschewed sentiment they were not strange to humor, fantasy and mood by no means shallow. With a nod and a smile they went their way. We that listened—they intimated—might like or dislike their music; but we were not to take it too seriously; enough that we found it interesting and amusing; a good—not a sloppy—job.

Tansman's Sinfonietta neatly fulfills these prescriptions. He writes for a small and shrewdly balanced orchestra, less than twenty strong. Separately and with individual savor he prefers to use these voices. The form is proportioned and compact; the expression concise; wander or waste Tansman will not. The germinating motivs stand clear; the ear readily follows them in their courses. Soon it is interested and alert. There are arabesques skilfully manipulated; bold, brave, intervals that may be discordant but are also arresting; harmonies that are not imitated; no more than the customary disdain of related keys; unfailing rhythmic life; a plain sense of design, logic, and progress. Tansman would not be of his time and kind did he not crave a Fugue and Toccata for finale. Grant the modernism, and the Sinfonietta is a notably well-made music. Instinctive as well as cultivated; a natural, if ripened, self-expression seem the modernist ways.

More to the purpose of the casual listener the Sinfonietta is animated and entertaining, fanciful and piquant. The ear knows not what to expect—and is seldom left ungratified. The first Allegro gains body, warmth and rhythmic motion; lingers gracefully over less ardent matter; harks back to the earlier vigors. The Scherzo tosses about the phrases and makes play wth thei rhythms of a Mazurka. A Polish sensibility turns the music now gay and now dreamy; a Parisian fancy adds light sting to the harmonies; playfully the instrumental timbres bite. Wit nips at the moodiness. Night visions haunt the slow movement; restless, it stirs and coils and will not be still. Fantasmal sounds pierce these sleep-chasings; a most a-tonal wail disperses them, which is not to say that the music lacks fantastic imagination.

Sharp-set modern rhythms and a light hurly-burly of keen-edged counterpoint keep Fugue and Toccata in lively motion, gathering substance as they go. This, that and the other scrap is caught into the whirlpool and flung up again. To pages of exuberance—any romantic and half the academics could write them—Tansman prefers a "snappy," sonorous concision. With a free hand, but also a cool head, he whips up pleasant excitements; a final seethe and swell and he makes a good end. . . . An ingratiating and amusing fellow, this Monsieur Tansman. He knows his job and he feels it, choosing out of his day and generation the particular means. Nothing too much; everything to the point; music that is both modernist and his own. Fancy here; high spirits there; in a slow movement, even imagination.

As it seemed to some ears, Mr. Koussevitzky over-hushed Satie's Spartan dances; held them too sedulously in a twilight of tone; subdued them at moments to an almost imperceptible motion. They are music of chiselled line; but that line, like the reliefs that may have suggested it, will bear the light of tonal day. Otherwise the beauty is veiled. The rhythm pulses gently; yet stirs with grave and antique rite. Silvered, not shadowed, is this music of mourning—measured not muted. Greek austerities, serenities and simplicities touched Satie in his younger days; prompted him to these remote, transparent dances, reticent and bare. After such "Gymnopédies" and other "Gnossiennes," the freakish humors, the mediocre extravagances of his middle years, possessed him. Toward the end of his life, the vista opened anew; down it he looked; saw Socrates; in tones also carved him. Already his middle numbers are nearly forgotten; by these Grecian pieces he may endure. For no other composer has wrought these reliefs in tones as the Greeks wrought them in marble. With either, there need be no color.

The Chabrier of the Bourrée Fantasque is a hearty, full-voiced, free-handed composer very much alive. Give him an exuberant folk-dance; set him between music-paper and piano; and he could flood both with a like frenzy of rhythm. Neither, however, could quite contain it. As his friend, Mottl, knew, he needed a full orchestra on which to wreak himself even as in "España" Chabrier had never found the time; Mottl seized and improved the opportunity. The outcome were pages that no conductor with fire and flare long overlooks. With him and with the orchestra, the audience also rejoices.

A Russian for the "Pathetic Symphony" if we are to believe Mr. Koussevitzky's version; by the same token a Russian also for "Scheherazade." Not that by his race he dims or brightens that many-hued music; more or less excels with rhythms, sonorities and other trappings; infuses more or less body into the manifold and not too substantial motivs. A Russian rather because he may, like Mr. Koussevitzky, give to the whole Suite an atmosphere and suggestion with which Rimsky surely clothed it. The music is plainly a virtuoso-music; as such conductors have often worried it. Plainly also it is an oriental music; as such conductors have often drenched and drugged it. Hereabouts and in these days, only Mr. Koussevitzky has distilled from it the fickle flavors of the Arabian Nights.

In spite of her lengths, Scheherazade was an impetuous story-teller. Once embarked, she could not long keep to a text or to a mood. Now in her tales she was gay and frolicsome; again she mocked and was bitter; she could be cruel and she could be kind; she sopped up the wonders and the magics of the heavens above, the earth beneath and the waters that roll between; yet she could play on the street-corners and keep most questionable company. Half the wonder, half the pleasure of the Arabian Nights is this perpetual shifting through a thousand and one moods. Rimsky's Suite is as fitful and various, as alive to each fresh-coming fancy. Yet until Mr. Koussevitzky played it yesterday, scarcely a conductor has caught this diversity, this jostle, this high pitch—ever changing.

H. T. P.

---

not been idle. One sees him writing music night and day, and with both hands, for the list of his compositions is already long. This Sinfonietta, in four movements, written in 1924 and first performed last March in Paris, is for a double quintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones and some percussion instruments. The movements are short. Not long ago a Sinfonietta by Tchererine performed in London lasted 50 inutes. The question naturally arose: ow long would a symphony by this omposer last?)

If the movements are short, they, evertheless, contain many ideas worthy respectful consideration. The comoser has lived in Paris for the last ve years. No doubt he learned there y hearing the later works of Stravinky and those of the younger Frenchen that surprising results could be obined from the skilful use of a few struments; but Tansman has not folwed blindly in the footsteps of these en. He has his own scheme; he can peak with his own voice. The first Algro, the second movement (in Mazurka rm) and the finale (Fugue and Tocca) are amusing in the larger, more lib-ral meaning of that word. While the xpression is decidedly free, the music not merely a rambling succession of ounds; it is not simply experimental; here are definite ideas and they are teresting in themselves, however curiusly they may be clothed at times. here are pages that might be condered as thought out for the piano, ther than the orchestra, but there is so an audacious use of instruments, olo, and in combination, that is not ispleasing. The third movement, a Nocurne, is charming, though no doubt the ltra-conservatives will not agree to his. It is hard for some to pay attention to any music that is out of the ell-worn ruts in which so many comosers, especially those of low degree, ave contentedly plodded, knowing that hey will be regarded as not dangerous o the community; not realizing that hey have not the courage (perhaps not he ability) to strike out new paths or themselves, nervous if they should tray, though a little, from the long-rampled, dusty road.

Debussys orchestrated with exquisite aste the two Spartan dances of that trange being, Erik Satie. Remember hat at the Gymnopaedia, the festival of naked youths," there was homage paid o the Spartans who had fallen in battle t Thyrea; but in these sacred dances f Satie there is no beating of the reast, no shedding of tears, no shrieks lamentation. There is a classic erenity, the beauty of a Grecian frieze epicting the last rites. Simple as this usic is, it is more impressive than any elegies for swollen and resounding orchestra. Would not the performnce, beautiful as it was, have been till more noteworthy if the chords for he harps in the second dance had been lucked with greater emphasis, to set irmly the rhythm, to establish the tately mood? These chords yesterday were hardly audible. Furthermore, a lightly quicker pace for the second dance might have been of benefit.

The highest compliment that could be paid the late Felix Mottl as a transcriber of Chabrier's Bourree is that he orchestrated it as the brilliant and audacious Chabrier might have done. A year ago the eminently respectable Charles Koechlin orchestrated this Bourree. It was said that he endeavored "to disengage the essentially musical element of the work without emphasizing the com-pivot of art. So the ungifted waste, whereas the talented select.

---

"Tansman's work is not an isolated phenomenon of this new current in music which could be expressed in a prohibitive slogan: 'Confine yourself to the necessary.' It would be hazardous to speculate, but there are strong indications that this dash 'back to the simplicity of the eighteenth century' is due not only to the natural reaction to Wagnerian tumultuous waterfalls of orchestral music, but also to the economical crisis which leaves little hope for the authors composing for a large orchestra—there are too few large orchestras in the world to give satisfaction to all the composers of modern scores.

"But a composer who writes for so called 'chamber orchestra' (the term seems to acclimatize itself readily, and will soon find its way into musical dictionaries) will have more opportunity to have his work produced. This voluntary limitation, which was caused by heterogeneous circumstances, has opened, as it were, a new chapter in the art of musical composition. To try a new combination of instruments, yielding new sonorities, is in itself an attractive thought. And we have a full list of the compositions for 'chamber orchestra' written by the foremost modern composers; Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Schoenberg. Many others have set their hands to this initiative.

"Since the chamber orchestra gains its way, even when a large one is available, we cannot put the blame for this exclusively on the economical disturbances. We have before us a new phenomenon and a new problem. The Bostonian public has had the occasion to form an opinion. Tansman's Sinfonietta is a pioneer of this type of music.

"Alexandre Tansman, born in 1897, a Pole, educated in Russia, has made Paris his home for five years, and, sponsored by Ravel, and cherished later by Koussevitzky, has gained his position at a quick pace. In a 'Who's Who in Music,' he could be listed as the most prominent representative of Polish music, with a strong mark of modern French musical culture. In the charming Mazurka (second part of the Sinfonietta, Polish nature and French culture are conspicuously shown.

"Tansman started his composition at an early age. He was 17 when his first orchestral work, 'Prometheus,' was performed by the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra. He was 20 when he won at once the first, the second and the third prizes at the competition of Polish composers. This victory, which caused much confusion in the ranks of esteemed deans of Polish music, almost cost him too dearly, but the exasperated minds had to submit to the fact, and the boy-modernist was amicably received by Paderewski, despite the obvious discrepancy in their musical beliefs.

"Paris was an unexplored field to Alexandre Tansman. The musical public hardly know him. His Sonata for Violin and Piano has been played by Bronislaw Huberman. His Polish triumphs have been to his credit, too, but in the boiling pot of Parisian artistic life, all the pre-war merits did not count. Tansman rejected all that he had previously done (too ruthlessly one might have said) and started anew.

"Although he did not know the modern French composers while in Poland, still at the moment of meeting with the French musical culture, he found what he knew already in the metaphysical realm of sounds. The contact was a happy one—Tansman acquired a new richness, a new independent technic, and overcame in due time the influences which have submerged many a courageous composer. The most terrific force was, to be sure, that of Stravinsky. Tansman still bears traces of Stravinsky's enormous personality scattered here and there, sharply pointed in his obstinate chords and rhythms. One can detect Scriabin's unearthly spirit in the meditative passages which Tansman pleases himself to alternate with the strenuous accumulations of harmonic pressure. But beyond all this Tansman remains himself.

"What are the chief features of Tansman's music? His mastership and dexterity go without saying: the 'up-to-date' composers have to have it all ready before their advent to the musical world. Tansman has more than that—he succeeds in creating a personality. He invents easily; yet his works are intricate enough to confuse an unsophisticated listener.

"His Scherzo Symphonique (which was performed at Koussevitzky's concert in Paris in 1922) reveals his sardonic mind; the piercing arrows of his irony are directed with skillful energy. The orchestration is sharp and clear; he favors the trumpet and often gives to this instrument his consise and short themes. 'La Legende,' which is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitsky, belongs to the same period, though it differs from the Scherzo in construction and design. The 'Danse de la Sorciere' for orchestra, follows shortly afterwards. Many songs and piano pieces fill the space between the orchestral works. In these pieces he scatters his bits of irony more liberally. 'A paradox, a paradox, a most ingenious paradox!' one would exclaim after listening to the Etude for Piano, written in two contradicting keys—F sharp major, and C major. But Tansman delights in paradoxes, and one forgives him the trouble.

"The future will show what will be Tansman's place in the development of modern music. In his art he is plentifully gifted, delightfully prodigal, and entrancingly captivating. All the rest depends upon the durability and the solidity of the substance. But no one of us is competent enough to foretell the final balance 'sub specie aeternitatis.'

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY."

Koussevitzky has played

There is little in this music that calls for extended comment. Mr. Copland has assimilated certain formulas of his contemporaries and immediate predecessors to considerable advantage. It is possible to discover here and there certain modes of expression which may perhaps be characterized as peculiarly his own. The principal defect in this work is its lack of invention. There are melc dic fragments to be heard now an again, but it must be confessed tha they are of no great charm. In nois and more boisterous moods, the con poser is most successful.

Orchestral Effects

Also he has contrived occasion orchestral effects which may hard be qualified as charming, or eve startling, but which are none the le of a certain degree of novelty. Wh he would pass to a quieter, mo poetic and imaginative mood, ho ever, his themes are short wind and fragmentary and his harmon scheme is more often than not tri and obvious. In the sections label Dance and Burlesque a degree rhythmical life was to be expecte but the composer in this matter well again lacks invention.

But this composition marks a di tinct progress over the Symphony f organ and orchestra by Mr. Coplar played here last year. It is less con plicated. What Mr. Copland has say he says with much more simp city and directness, and if the matt of this "Music for the Theater" is n particularly arresting, the manner its presentation is much more logic and less inexperienced. Again, must be conceded that to write for small combination of instruments

---

Monitor Nov 28

The Ninth Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in aid of its pension fund, presenting Beethoven's "Egment" Overture and Ninth Symphony. It was assisted in the symphony by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass.

The performance of the symphony was magnificent. Everybody concerned seemed inspired by this great music. Mr. Koussevitzky was in his most eloquent and poetic mood, and players, chorus and soloists alike clearly caught fire from him. Building on the foundation laid two years ago by Mr. Monteux and Dr. Davison, he reared a resplendent edifice of sound. G. Wallace Woodworth, actinug conductor of the choruses, and Mrs. Robert Winternitz, his assistant, share the honors.

An innovation that added much to the effectiveness of the final movement was the placing of the quartet behind the orchestra, in the midst of the chorus. The soloists hav really a minor, though an importan rôle to play. Their withdrawal fro the edge of the crowded platform en hanced the beauty of the solo voice and greatly improved the ensembl by correcting a disproportionat visual and tonal emphasis.

Detailed criticism of such a su perb performance seems out o place. It is sufficient to say that the first movement was thrilling, the Scherzo delightful, the Adagio charming; while the Finale renewed these pleasures and added a stirring expression of noble aspiration.

The overture was admirably played. The audience, which overflowed along the walls, was warmly appreciative. The concert will be repeated this evening. L. A. S.

Beethoven's music and who do not see in it simply a medium for this or that conductor's peculiar interpretaticn of it.

So also was Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of Mozart's Overture, which, save for the slightly rough tone of the brass, was played as one fancies the composer would have liked to hear it. S. M.

---

not been idle. One sees him writing music night and day, and with both hands, for the list of his compositions is already long. This Sinfonietta, in four movements, written in 1924 and first performed last March in Paris, is for a double quintet of wind and string instruments, piano, trumpet, two trombones and some percussion instruments. The movements are short. Not long ago a Sinfonietta by Tchere- rine performed in London lasted 50 hinutes. The question naturally arose: How long would a symphony by this omposer last?)

If the movements are short, they, evertheless, contain many ideas worthy respectful consideration. The com- oser has lived in Paris for the last ve years. No doubt he learned there y hearing the later works of Stravinky and those of the younger French- en that surprising results could be ob- ained from the skilful use of a few struments; but Tansman has not fol- wed blindly in the footsteps of these en. He has his own scheme; he can peak with his own voice. The first Al- gro, the second movement (in Mazurka rm) and the finale (Fugue and Tocca-) are amusing in the larger, more lib- al meaning of that word. While the xpression is decidedly free, the music not merely a rambling succession of ounds; it is not simply experimental; here are definite ideas and they are teresting in themselves, however curi- usly they may be clothed at times. here are pages that might be con- dered as thought out for the piano, ther than the orchestra, but there is so an audacious use of instruments, olo, and in combination, that is not ispleasing. The third movement, a Noc- urne, is charming, though no doubt the ltra-conservatives will not agree to his. It is hard for some to pay at- ention to any music that is out of the ell-worn ruts in which so many com- osers, especially those of low degree, ave contentedly plodded, knowing that hey will be regarded as not dangerous o the community; not realizing that hey have not the courage (perhaps not he ability) to strike out new paths or themselves, nervous if they should tray, though a little, from the long- rampled, dusty road.

Debussys orchestrated with exquisite aste the two Spartan dances of that trange being, Erik Satie. Remember hat at the Gymnopaedia, the festival of naked youths," there was homage paid o the Spartans who had fallen in battle t Thyrea; but in these sacred dances f Satie there is no beating of the reast, no shedding of tears, no shrieks n lamentation. There is a classic erenity, the beauty of a Grecian frieze epicting the last rites. Simple as this usic is, it is more impressive than any elegies for swollen and resound- ng orchestra. Would not the perform- nce, beautiful as it was, have been till more noteworthy if the chords for he harps in the second dance had been lucked with greater emphasis, to set irmly the rhythm, to establish the tately mood? These chords yesterday ere hardly audible. Furthermore, a lightly quicker pace for the second ance might have been of benefit.

The highest compliment that could be paid the late Felix Mottl as a transcrib- er of Chabrier's Bourree is that he orchestrated it as the brilliant and audacious Chabrier might have done. A year ago the eminently respectable Charles Koechlin orchestrated this Bourree. It was said that he endeavored "to disengage the essentially musical element of the work without emphasizing the com-

---

Symphony

FULL MEASURE, LIVELY METTLE, AMPLE PLEASURE

Transcript — Nov 14

CONDUCTOR, COMPOSERS AND AN ORCHESTRA

Mr. Koussevitzky Presents Mr. Tansman Favorably — From Satie and Chabrier Extremes of the Dance — "Scheherazade" at Last Full-Flavored — Other Incidents of a Spirited Symphonic Day

A DISCRIMINATING, a considerate, conductor is Mr. Koussevitzky—man of the world as well as musician, perhaps discoverer in his turn that here in America undue earnestness is bane to the practice and the enjoyment of the arts. From time to time he shapes a Symphony Concert as pleasant entertainment—to the irritation of those that take their music as education and inspiration. Putting on their most serious "front," they call him a "charlatan" and demand that a Herr Kapellmeister, if possible a Herr Doktor, be summoned forthwith from darkest Stettin. Almost to their aces, the audience mocks these alarmists. t is pleased and makes no secret of its easure. Gleefully it claps its palms to- ether and—quite as significantly on a riday afternoon—hears the concert hrough. It is the more exhilarated when, s happened yesterday, the agreeable ieces also disclose the new quality of the rchestra as a delicate instrument of tonal oetry, a vigorous instrument of tonal ower, an instrument withal of unfailing iancy and precision.

Not above a whisper sounded many of e measures of Satie's imaginary Spartan ances; yet this wisp and gossamer of one sustained line, rhythm, euphonies, olor. In Mottl's orchestral arrangement f Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," the hoirs shouted the motivs; whipped them nto motion; tossed them hither and hither; outflung them in climax. Exuber- nce of rhythm and ardor of progress ight not further go—both clear-voiced; nsitive, besides, to every stroke with hich composer and arranger would set ntrast to these tumults. In turn, Rim- y-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" was a hey- y for virtuosi. Every instrumental oup, almost every "first desk," proved general and particular mettle. Seldom Symphony Hall has this coat of many al colors shone with such clear and anifold lustres. Nor was the orchestra content with Rimsky iridescent. It laid on his thicker textures, his sharper edges; kept a tone and a rhythm that could be as ensuous or as acrid as this music of The rabian Nights. Before long, Philadelphia ay not be the sole seat of orchestral rfections.

At the outset enjoyment—not to say lev- —was in the air. The audience heard erfully and applauded warmly a new unknown modernist. For a young man wenty-eight, Mr. Alexander Tansman arsaw and Paris has written a su- ous quantity of music—as though were not enough already in the world. s also written at least one amusing the Sinfonietta for Small Orchestra yesterday. The suspicion increases passes for a virtue with these young nists to be amusing; that in their work they deliberately cultivate that ble end. The romantic generation nded from Wagner and tutored at the knee of Strauss was over-serious. With a sigh, it would bind into a single tone-poem a vision of the cosmos—by, large and also thick. The altar-boys of the Debussyan chapel lingered over-long in silvery mists and dipped their fingers twice too often in water of roses.

Reaction from both neo-romantics and neo-impressionists was bound to come, and the younger modernists, with a backward and trustful glance toward Stravinsky and Ravel, made speed to improve the opportunity. They swore an oath against the three deadly vices—sentiment, pretence and conformity. They cultivated a pretty skill, brevity and wit. As they wrote, high spirits hid their pains. If they eschewed sentiment they were not strange to humor, fantasy and mood by no means shallow. With a nod and a smile they went their way. We that listened—they intimated—might like or dislike their music; but we were not to take it too seriously; enough that we found it interesting and amusing; a good—not a sloppy—job.

Tansman's Sinfonietta neatly fulfills these prescriptions. He writes for a small and shrewdly balanced orchestra, less than twenty strong. Separately and with individual savor he prefers to use these voices. The form is proportioned and compact; the expression concise; wander or waste Tansman will not. The germinating motivs stand clear; the ear readily follows them in their courses. Soon it is interested and alert. There are arabesques skilfully manipulated; bold, brave, intervals that may be discordant but are also arresting; harmonies that are not imitated; no more than the customary disdain of related keys; unfailing rhythmic life; a plain sense of design, logic, and progress. Tansman would not be of his time and kind did he not crave a Fugue and Toccata for finale. Grant the modernism, and the Sinfonietta is a notably well-made music. Instinctive as well as cultivated; a natural, if ripened, self-expression seem the modernist ways.

More to the purpose of the casual listener the Sinfonietta is animated and entertaining, fanciful and piquant. The ear knows not what to expect—and is seldom left ungratified. The first Allegro gains body, warmth and rhythmic motion; lingers gracefully over less ardent matter; harks back to the earlier vigors. The Scherzo tosses about the phrases and makes play wth thei rhythms of a Mazurka. A Polish sensibility turns the music now gay and now dreamy; a Parisian fancy adds light sting to the harmonies; playfully the instrumental timbres bite. Wit nips at the moodiness. Night visions haunt the slow movement; restless, it stirs and coils and will not be still. Fantasmal sounds pierce these sleep-chasings; a most a-tonal wail disperses them, which is not to say that the music lacks fantastic imagination.

Sharp-set modern rhythms and a light hurly-burly of keen-edged counterpoint keep Fugue and Toccata in lively motion, gathering substance as they go. This, that and the other scrap is caught into the whirlpool and flung up again. To pages of exuberance—any romantic and half the academics could write them—Tansman prefers a "snappy," sonorous concision. With a free hand, but also a cool head, he whips up pleasant excitements; a final seethe and swell and he makes a good end. . . . An ingratiating and amusing fellow, this Monsieur Tansman. He knows his job and he feels it, choosing out of his day and generation the particular means. Nothing too much; everything to the point; music that is both modernist and his own. Fancy here; high spirits there; in a slow movement, even imagination.

As it seemed to some ears, Mr. Koussevitzky over-hushed Satie's Spartan dances; held them too sedulously in a twilight of tone; subdued them at moments to an almost imperceptible motion. They are music of chiselled line; but that line, like the reliefs that may have suggested it, will bear the light of tonal day. Otherwise the beauty is veiled. The rhythm pulses gently; yet stirs with grave and antique rite. Silvered, not shadowed, is this music of mourning—measured not muted. Greek austerities, serenities and simplicities touched Satie in his younger days; prompted him to these remote, transparent dances, reticent and bare. After such "Gymnopédies" and other "Gnossiennes," the freakish humors, the mediocre extravagances of his middle years, possessed him. Toward the end of his life, the vista opened anew; down it he looked; saw Socrates; in tones also carved him. Already his middle numbers are nearly forgotten; by these Grecian pieces he may endure. For no other composer has wrought these reliefs in tones as the Greeks wrought them in marble. With either, there need be no color.

The Chabrier of the Bourrée Fantasque is a hearty, full-voiced, free-handed composer very much alive. Give him an exuberant folk-dance; set him between music-paper and piano; and he could flood both [illegible] rhythm. Neither, however, could quite contain it. As his friend, Mottl, knew, he needed a full orchestra on which to wreak himself even as in "España" Chabrier had never found the time; Mottl seized and improved the opportunity. The outcome were pages that no conductor with fire and flare long overlooks. With him and with the orchestra, the audience also rejoices.

A Russian for the "Pathetic Symphony" if we are to believe Mr. Koussevitzky's version; by the same token a Russian also for "Scheherazade." Not that by his race he dims or brightens that many-hued music; more or less excels with rhythms, sonorities and other trappings; infuses more or less body into the manifold and not too substantial motivs. A Russian rather because he may, like Mr. Koussevitzky, give to the whole Suite an atmosphere and suggestion with which Rimsky surely clothed it. The music is plainly a virtuoso-music; as such conductors have often worried it. Plainly also it is an oriental music; as such conductors have often drenched and drugged it. Hereabouts and in these days, only Mr. Koussevitzky has distilled from it the fickle flavors of the Arabian Nights.

In spite of her lengths, Scheherazade was an impetuous story-teller. Once embarked, she could not long keep to a text or to a mood. Now in her tales she was gay and frolicsome; again she mocked and was bitter; she could be cruel and she could be kind; she sopped up the wonders and the magics of the heavens above, the earth beneath and the waters that roll between; yet she could play on the street-corners and keep most questionable company. Half the wonder, half the pleasure of the Arabian Nights is this perpetual shifting through a thousand and one moods. Rimsky's Suite is as fitful and various, as alive to each fresh-coming fancy. Yet until Mr. Koussevitzky played it yesterday, scarcely a conductor has caught this diversity, this jostle, this high pitch—ever changing. H. T. P.

---

pivot of art. So the ungifted waste, whereas the talented select.

"Tansman's work is not an isolated phenomenon of this new current in music which could be expressed in a prohibitive slogan: 'Confine yourself to the necessary.' It would be hazardous to speculate, but there are strong indications that this dash 'back to the simplicity of the eighteenth century' is due not only to the natural reaction to Wagnerian tumultuous waterfalls of orchestral music, but also to the economical crisis which leaves little hope for the authors composing for a large orchestra—there are too few large orchestras in the world to give satisfaction to all the composers of modern scores.

"But a composer who writes for so called 'chamber orchestra' (the term seems to acclimatize itself readily, and will soon find its way into musical dictionaries) will have more opportunity to have his work produced. This voluntary limitation, which was caused by heterogeneous circumstances, has opened, as it were, a new chapter in the art of musical composition. To try a new combination of instruments, yielding new sonorities, is in itself an attractive thought. And we have a full list of the compositions for 'chamber orchestra' written by the foremost modern composers; Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Schoenberg. Many others have set their hands to this initiative.

"Since the chamber orchestra gains its way, even when a large one is available, we cannot put the blame for this exclusively on the economical disturbances. We have before us a new phenomenon and a new problem. The Bostonian public has had the occasion to form an opinion. Tansman's Sinfonietta is a pioneer of this type of music.

"Alexandre Tansman, born in 1897, a Pole, educated in Russia, has made Paris his home for five years, and, sponsored by Ravel, and cherished later by Koussevitzky, has gained his position at a quick pace. In a 'Who's Who in Music,' he could be listed as the most prominent representative of Polish music, with a strong mark of modern French musical culture. In the charming Mazurka (second part of the Sinfonietta, Polish nature and French culture are conspicuously shown.

"Tansman started his composition at an early age. He was 17 when his first orchestral work, 'Prometheus,' was performed by the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra. He was 20 when he won at once the first, the second and the third prizes at the competition of Polish composers. This victory, which caused much confusion in the ranks of esteemed deans of Polish music, almost cost him too dearly, but the exasperated minds had to submit to the fact, and the boy-modernist was amicably received by Paderewski, despite the obvious discrepancy in their musical beliefs.

"Paris was an unexplored field to Alexandre Tansman. The musical public hardly know him. His Sonata for Violin and Piano has been played by Bronislaw Huberman. His Polish triumphs have been to his credit, too, but in the boiling pot of Parisian artistic life, all the pre-war merits did not count. Tansman rejected all that he had previously done (too ruthlessly one might have said) and started anew.

"Although he did not know the modern French composers while in Poland, still at the moment of meeting with the French musical culture, he found what he knew already in the metaphysical realm of sounds. The contact was a happy one—Tansman acquired a new richness, a new independent technic, and overcame in due time the influences which have submerged many a courageous composer. The most terrific force was, to be sure, that of Stravinsky. Tansman still bears traces of Stravinsky's enormous personality scattered here and there, sharply pointed in his obstinate chords and rhythms. One can detect Scriabin's unearthly spirit in the meditative passages which Tansman pleases himself to alternate with the strenuous accumulations of harmonic pressure. But beyond all this Tansman remains himself.

"What are the chief features of Tansman's music? His mastership and dexterity go without saying: the 'up-to-date' composers have to have it all ready before their advent to the musical world. Tansman has more than that—he succeeds in creating a personality. He invents easily; yet his works are intricate enough to confuse an unsophisticated listener.

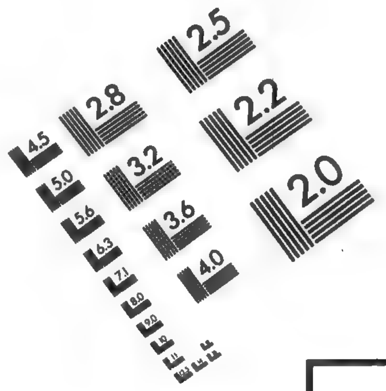
"His Scherzo Symphonique (which was performed at Koussevitzky's concert in Paris in 1922) reveals his sardonic mind; the piercing arrows of his irony are directed with skillful energy. The orchestration is sharp and clear; he favors the trumpet and often gives to this instrument his consise and short themes. 'La Legende,' which is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitsky, belongs to the same period, though it differs from the Scherzo in construction and design. The 'Danse de la Sorciere' for orchestra, follows shortly afterwards. Many songs and piano pieces fill the space between the orchestral works. In these pieces he scatters his bits of irony more liberally. 'A paradox, a paradox, a most ingenious paradox!' one would exclaim after listening to the Etude for Piano, written in two contradicting keys—F sharp major, and C major. But Tansman delights in paradoxes, and one forgives him the trouble.

"The future will show what will be Tansman's place in the development of modern music. In his art he is plentifully gifted, delightfully prodigal, and entrancingly captivating. All the rest depends upon the durability and the solidity of the substance. But no one of us is competent enough to foretell the final balance 'sub specie aeternitatis.'

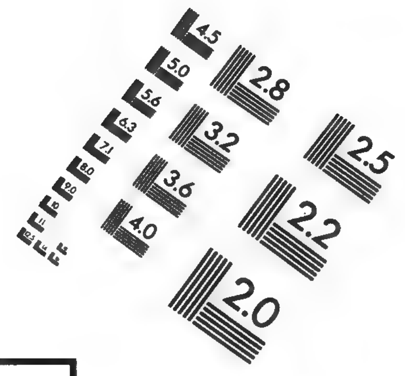
NICOLAS SLONIMSKY."

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

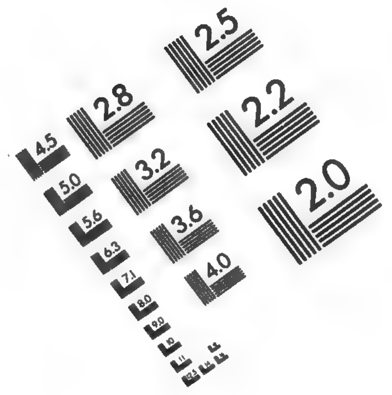
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



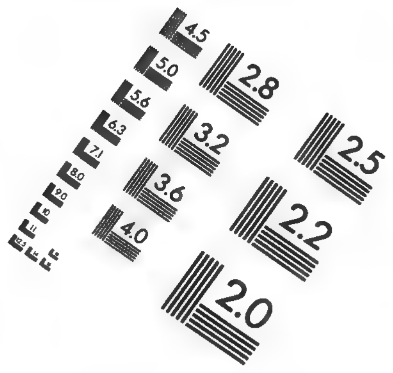
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

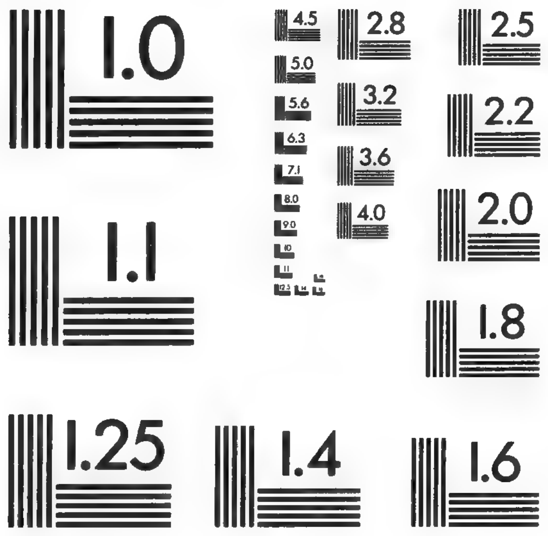


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

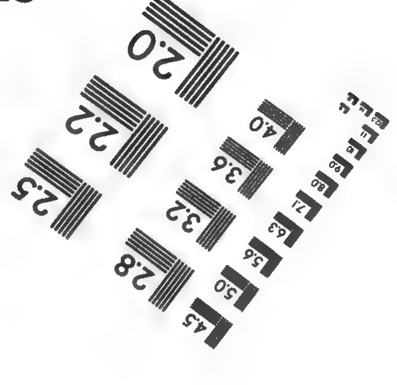
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

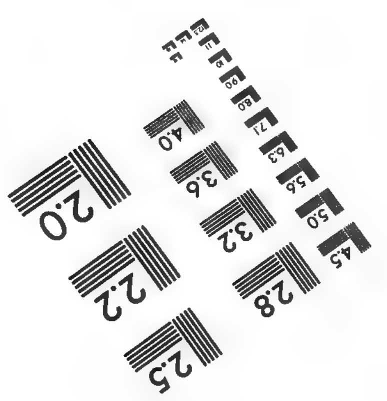
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



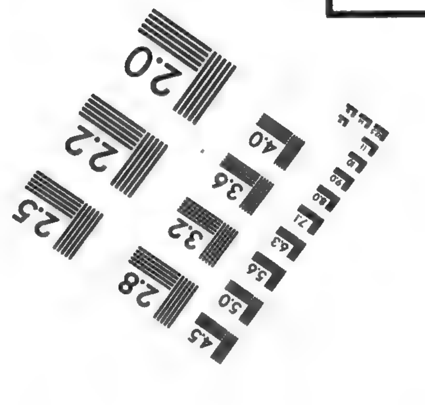
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

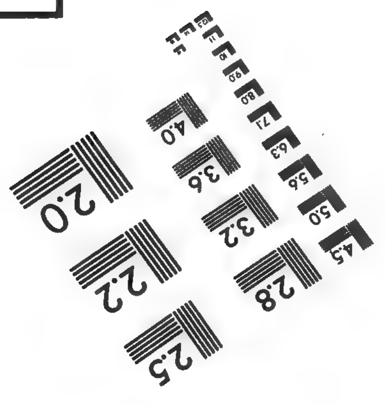
A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

150

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 28

From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Konssevitsky introduced two compositions new to this city, a "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of these works, indeed of the program as whole, the orchestra gave the most lliant performances that it has given e under its present conductorship. ome of the music appeared to be osen for virtuoso purposes and little e. There was a sound and safe beginng with the G major "Brandenburg" oncerto of J. S. Bach, played ulstily nd with a very brilliant sonorous tone by the strings. But the works upon which Mr. Koussevitsky trained his whole arsenal of effects were the aforesaid novelties and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The novelties proved of uneven value, though they conspicuously displayed the capacities of the orchestra. In the symphony the conductor showed by turns his fiery temperament and re-creative power and his passion for effect at any cost, whether or not this reacted to the benefit of the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt and dreamed, in the Far East. When he writes music suggested by Eastern impressions or age-old legends it is not with the purpose of showing how jolly Eastern he can be. He has lived that of which he speaks, and he has a particular gift of transcribing it. Whether the listener comes from Oshkosh or Jersey City the music has the right feel; there is no doubt that it is a genuine artistic result of first-hand contacts. And so with that heard last night—a score with evident dificiencies, but one genuinely expressive of the legends and spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from about the year 600, is that of the two Generals, enemies who fight until one is killed. The survivor faces his victim's widow, who is armed and determined upon revenge. The two join battle, only to realize that they love each other. At last, for honor's sake, they take death into their own hands. This story formed the basis of a ballet, "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Legend," performed with Mr. Eichheim's music, last January at the Eighth Street Theatre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim himself, whose works are quoted in the invaluable program notes of Philip Hale, that "the music of the drama begins with Chinese ceremonial music written by a Chinese Emperor about the year 700 A. D. in memory of a slain and beloved General." Thereafter is the thought of the fight, the voice of the young widow mourning, the beginnings of love between the pair, and the other principal phases of the story. It is a pity that, lacking the stage action, the music is too long and has no clear or well-balanced form; too bad, because this is among the most interesting music Mr. Eichheim has produced. It principally requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are often unprecedented and are wholly of the distant land of his legend. The music feels Chinese—as Chinese as a golden dragon or a pair of warriors fighting on a fan. There are sounds unprecedented in the orchestral repertory; there is genuine drama, expressed in musical terms that are not of the West. Only at the last is seen suddenly the cloven hoof of Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere is the consciousness of a composer who has really bridged the gap between oriental and occidental consciousness by means of translating the beauty created by one people into a message articulate and intelligible to the other.

This work should be cut and revised. It is eminently deserving of this, for it has material that should not be forgotten. The audience liked Mr. Eichheim's music, long, cut-up, superfluous as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. These places suggest characteristic rhythms and melodic turns utilized by the composer. And there one stops, with perhaps a single remark: that Mr. Ibert knows very well the art of instrumentation, and Mr. Koussevilsky the art orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pieces an the everplayed symphony of Tchaikov sky emphasized the inalienable great ness of the Russian. Tchaikovsky heard too often, but what a remarkabl artist he is! His music is never les than flesh and blood, than poignan memories, intense feeling, the madnes of despair, the resignation of the grave The march is surely the wildest in sym phonic literature. The symphony, nc matter how overplayed or maltreated, is a work that commands admiration for its reckless sincerity and its musical inspiration. Tchaikovsky was not a little composer. Last night, it is true, he suffered frequently from the virtuosity and the officiousness of Mr. Koussevitsky.

The second theme of the first movement is sentimental enough without being dragged as it was. The same thing is true of the trio of the second movement—the passage with the recurrent drum-beat. It was anticipated that having taken the greater part of these two movements too slowly Mr. Koussevitsky would play the march very fast, which he did—so very fast that it was impossible for the superb orchestra to play it cleanly. There are rights that an individual interpreter may be expected to assume. The performance, however, nt past this point. It emphasized e rather wanton eccentricities of ussevitsky, and proved at the same ne that Tchaikovsky is incontrovertly a great composer.

ide from these reservations the ing of the orchestra was of surprising merit. It is a better body of musicians than it was last season, and it has more brilliancy, precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, ho fills a position that cannot quite be ed—that vacated by Georges Longy— showed himself last night an adrable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso orestra, wh ther or not one always with the conceptions of its vir- leader.

FIRST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Post Dec 2

Symphony Showing Development of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Altogether auspiciously, alike in the size and temper of the audience and in the excellence and spirit of the performance was the new Tuesday series of Symphony Concerts inaugurated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

MILESTONES IN MUSIC

That these concerts might fill a niche and serve a purpose all their own, Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea of making them progressively illustrative of the development of the orchestra and of orchestral music. Thus that of yesterday spanned the period—and a significant one it is—between Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and the Fifty Symphony of Beethoven; that is to say, from 1721 to 1807, and to bridge this interval came first the "Pastoral Symphony" from Handel's "Messiah," then the Prelude to Haydn's "Creation" and the Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

If a series of concerts such as this is to be at all comprehensive and representative each programme must contain a certain number of short pieces. Yet, except as introductions to operas and oratorios or as instrumental interludes in such works, short orchestral pieces were not written by the pre-nineteenth century composers. Hence Mr. Koussevitzky's selections of yesterday, and hence the necessary omission from his scheme of the greater Handel of the concertos, the more characteristic Haydn of the symphonies and the Mozart of the concert hall.

Wind Added to Strings

Effective enough in its place in the oratorio, the "Pastoral Symphony" is nevertheless slight of substance, and in yesterday's performance the addition of wind-instruments to the string-band for which Handel originally scored this gentle music seemed rather to lessen than to enhance its appeal. The Prelude to the "Creation," too, while interesting for its curious and striking anticipations of later harmonic, melodic and orchestral idioms, does not in truth represent its composer at his best. With Mozart's Overture, however, music of the first importance made its appearance, and the Fifth Symphony was fitting and fortunate choice for the chief and final item of the programme.

Next of Series Jan. 5

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's singularly vital reading of this Fifth Symphony, of his virile interpretation of the Brandenburg Concerto and of his brilliant version of the Overture, all heard this year or last at the regular Symphony Concerts, there is now nothing new to say. As for the fragments from Handel and Haydn, they were sympathetically played. The performance of the latter's Prelude, indeed

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

DEC 27 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 27 1925

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Serge Koussevitzky conducted for the first time Galliard's sonata in G major, freely transcribed for small orchestra, flute, oboe, bassoon and strings by Maximilian Steinberg. Mr. Steinberg made this transcription in 1925 for Mr Koussevitzky. He took one of Galliard's six sonatas for the bassoon with a thoroughbass for the harpsichord. The result, said The Boston Herald, "was a fresh and delightful suite, gay in the lively selections, gay without trivialities, and in the slow movements of a captivating serenity peculiar to the eighteenth century. Nor is Galliard's music merely a faint echo of the superb Handel's; Galliard had a mind and an expression of his own."

Says Koussevitzky Fails as Conductor

By Pierre V. R. Key

New York Music Critic of The Cleveland News.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things—a music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasings and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A NEW COMPOSITION

ONE novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports s Palerm There effec pur

T cer eig Br pit hea der

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

DEC 16 1925

-:- MUSIC -:-

Koussevitzky Creates

We wonder if there is anyone who can tell exactly how Mr. Koussevitzky is going to read a familiar score before he sets his musicians going. Frankly when we went to Infantry Hall last night to hear the second of the Boston Symphony concerts we had no idea of what he would do with Brahms' "First Symphony." But we felt quite certain it would be something interesting.

And it was. This, the chief attraction of the evening, was played with rare imaginative earnestness. The dignity of the composition lost nothing under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, but it was vivified by an intellectual passion that left no recess of the great music unexplored. Sometimes that baton seemed like a thunderbolt, sometimes like a child's finger beckoning its secrets from an awakening world, always an instrument of genius. There was not a moment during this re-creation of a work that puts Brahms at the right hand of Beethoven which was dull or listless; it gave us the thrill of Abt Vogler when out of three sounds was framed "not a fourth sound but a star."

There were three Russian compositions on last night's program. There was that amazingly apt "Fragment from the Apocalypse," which is full of strange fancies and stranger ways of expressing them. There was a fairy tale by the same author—Liadov—and there was a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." In these latter selections Mr. Koussevitzky was able to give full play to his love of fantasy. We don't know how anyone could tell of fairyland better than he does. Nor do we know anyone who combines such a love of fancy with power and an imaginatively illumined mentality. Those who blame Mr. Koussevitzky for some of his readings are blaming [illegible] being a poet.

Y. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Globe-Democrat

DEC 6 1925

Pierre Key's Music Article

NEW YORK, December 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers, and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony Band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blowup. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things: A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

DEC 27 1925

Although it is understood that Portland is to be deprived of a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, still the orchestra is giving 112 concerts this season in this country and in Canada. The Symphony players visited Providence, R. I., for a concert 10 days ago and accounts are effusive regarding the brilliant work of the musicians.

Koussevitzky, the famous conductor, stated to a reporter that he finds the public taste in music in this country improving. He regards Providence as a very cultivated center in regard to the taste in music.

The conductor, who was known in America a year ago only by hearsay and who now holds the attention of the country as a rare force in music, has been called a combination of the artistic radical and conservative. He explained that in his opinion the aim of a symphony concert should be a balance between the modern and the classic, appealing to the general public and to the cognoscenti. Above all, it should be interesting—never dull or boring.

Soloist? Here is a subject about which Mr:. Koussevitzky also has definite ideas which he does not hesitate to express. If people wish to hear a great pianist or a famous soprano or any other soloist let them go to a recital by that particular artist. In fairness to those who wish to hear a symphony concert, a soloist should not be allowed to occupy a quarter of the program. A soloist distracts the attention of the audience from the numbers by the orchestra and vice versa, unless the orchestra is to play a work which calls for a solo part. In that case the very best soloist for the particular job at hand should be found. Mr. Koussevitzky decidedly does not favor the featuring of a soloist on a symphony orchestra program.

DEC 13 1925

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY

A big name, where musicians are concerned does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way.

PIERRE V. R. KEY

Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band [illegible] ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed but Koussewitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to). There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

Miss Farrar Quiescent.

Our much loved Geraldine Farrar has gone and gotten sick, right at the beginning of her season as a comic opera star. The tour of her organization has been suspended temporarily, and the members of the company given their two weeks' notice. All of which would indicate that the fair Gerry is not in the best of health.

It really would be an excellent thing for this American prima-donna-that-was. She has gone on incessantly, often driving herself when she should have considered her own strength.

I personally regret that Miss Farrar has chosen to finish a glorious career with such an anti-climax as appearing (and for the sake of dollars) in comic opera. I should prefer to have remembered her as a great artiste, something which I find as difficult to do as some of my friends and acquaintances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC [illegible]

Ernest Bloch's viola suite was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Jean Lefranc, violist) and Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston on the 11th and 12th of December. Of the composer and his music Philip Hale wrote:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffer-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 6 1925

* * *

The second concert of the Providence series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, the 15th. The programme to be presented by Mr. Koussevitzky will include two numbers by Liadov—Frag[illegible]alypse," a symphonic [illegible] and Kikimo[illegible] a fairy folk tale in music; also a suite [illegible] Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." [illegible] the latter part of the programme will be played Brahms's First Symphony in C-minor.

150

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 28

From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky introduced two compositions new to this city, a "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of these works, indeed of the program as a whole, the orchestra gave the most brilliant performances that it has given here under its present conductorship. Some of the music appeared to be chosen for virtuoso purposes and little else. There was a sound and safe beginning with the G major "Brandenburg" concerto of J. S. Bach, played ulstily, and with a very brilliant sonorous tone by the strings. But the works upon which Mr. Koussevitsky trained his whole arsenal of effects were the aforesaid novelties and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The novelties proved of uneven value, though they conspicuously displayed the capacities of the orchestra. In the symphony the conductor showed by turns his fiery temperament and re-creative power and his passion for effect at any cost, whether or not this reacted to the benefit of the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt and dreamed, in the Far East. When he writes music suggested by Eastern impressions or age-old legends it is not with the purpose of showing how jolly Eastern he can be. He has lived that of which he speaks, and he has a particular gift of transcribing it. Whether the listener comes from Oshkosh or Jersey City the music has the right feel; there is no doubt that it is a genuine artistic result of first-hand contacts. And so with that heard last night—a score with evident dificiencies, but one genuinely expressive of the legends and spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from about the year 600, is that of the two Generals, enemies who fight until one is killed. The survivor faces his victim's widow, who is armed and determined upon revenge. The two join battle, only to realize that they love each other. At last, for honor's sake, they take death into their own hands. This story formed the basis of a ballet, "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Legend," performed with Mr. Eichheim's music, last January at the Eighth Street Theatre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim himself, whose works are quoted in the invaluable program notes of Philip Hale, that "the music of the drama begins with Chinese ceremonial music written by a Chinese Emperor about the year 700 A. D. in memory of a slain and beloved General." Thereafter is the thought of the fight, the voice of the young widow mourning, the beginnings of love between the pair, and the other principal phases of the story. It is a pity that, lacking the stage action, the music is too long and has no clear or well-balanced form; too bad, because this is among the most interesting music Mr. Eichheim has produced. It principally requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are often unprecedented and are wholly of the distant land of his legend. The music feels Chinese—as Chinese as a golden dragon or a pair of warriors fighting on a fan. There are sounds unprecedented in the orchestral repertory; there is genuine drama, expressed in musical terms that are not of the West. Only at the last is seen suddenly the cloven hoof of Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere is the consciousness of a composer who has really bridged the gap between oriental and occidental consciousness by means of translating the beauty created by one people into a message articulate and intelligible to the other.

This work should be cut and revised. It is eminently deserving of this, for it has material that should not be forgotten. The audience liked Mr. Eichheim's music, long, cut-up, superfluous as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. These places suggest characteristic rhythms and melodic turns utilized by the composer. And there one stops, with perhaps a single remark: that Mr. Ibert knows very well the art of instrumentation, and Mr. Koussevilsky the art of orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pieces and the everplayed symphony of Tchaikovsky emphasized the inalienable greatness of the Russian. Tchaikovsky is heard too often, but what a remarkable artist he is! His music is never less than flesh and blood, than poignant memories, intense feeling, the madness of despair, the resignation of the grave. The march is surely the wildest in symphonic literature. The symphony, no matter how overplayed or maltreated, is a work that commands admiration for its reckless sincerity and its musical inspiration. Tchaikovsky was not a little composer. Last night, it is true, he suffered frequently from the virtuosity and the officiousness of Mr. Koussevitsky.

The second theme of the first movement is sentimental enough without being dragged as it was. The same thing is true of the trio of the second movement—the passage with the recurrent drum-beat. It was anticipated that having taken the greater part of these two movements too slowly Mr. Koussevitsky would play the march very fast, which he did—so very fast that it was impossible for the superb orchestra to play it cleanly. There are rights that an individual interpreter may be expected to assume. The performance, however, went past this point. It emphasized the rather wanton eccentricities of Mr. Koussevitsky, and proved at the same time that Tchaikovsky is incontrovertibly a great composer.

Aside from these reservations the [illegible] of the orchestra was of surprising merit. It is a better body of musicians than it was last season, and it has more brilliancy, precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, who fills a position that cannot quite be filled—that vacated by Georges Longy—and showed himself last night an admirable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso orchestra, whether or not one always agrees with the conceptions of its virile leader.

FIRST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Post Dec 2

Symphony Showing Development of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Altogether auspiciously, alike in the size and temper of the audience and in the excellence and spirit of the performance was the new Tuesday series of Symphony Concerts inaugurated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

MILESTONES IN MUSIC

That these concerts might fill a niche and serve a purpose all their own, Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea of making them progressively illustrative of the development of the orchestra and of orchestral music. Thus that of yesterday spanned the period—and a significant one it is—between Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and the Fifty Symphony of Beethoven; that is to say, from 1721 to 1807, and to bridge this interval came first the "Pastoral Symphony" from Handel's "Messiah," then the Prelude to Haydn's "Creation" and the Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

If a series of concerts such as this is to be at all comprehensive and representative each programme must contain a certain number of short pieces. Yet, except as introductions to operas and oratorios or as instrumental interludes in such works, short orchestral pieces were not written by the pre-nineteenth century composers. Hence Mr. Koussevitzky's selections of yesterday, and hence the necessary omission from his scheme of the greater Handel of the concertos, the more characteristic Haydn of the symphonies and the Mozart of the concert hall.

Wind Added to Strings

Effective enough in its place in the oratorio, the "Pastoral Symphony" is nevertheless slight of substance, and in yesterday's performance the addition of wind-instruments to the string-band for which Handel originally scored this gentle music seemed rather to lessen than to enhance its appeal. The Prelude to the "Creation," too, while interesting for its curious and striking anticipations of later harmonic, melodic and orchestral idioms, does not in truth represent its composer at his best. With Mozart's Overture, however, music of the first importance made its appearance, and the Fifth Symphony was fitting and fortunate choice for the chief and final item of the programme.

Next of Series Jan. 5

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's singularly vital reading of this Fifth Symphony, of his virile interpretation of the Brandenburg Concerto and of his brilliant version of the Overture, all heard this year or last at the regular Symphony Concerts, there is now nothing new to say. As for the fragments from Handel and Haydn, they were sympathetically played. The performance of the latter's Prelude, indeed,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

DEC 27 1925

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 27 1925

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Serge Koussevitzky conducted for the first time Galliard's sonata in G major, freely transcribed for small orchestra, flute, oboe, bassoon and strings by Maximilian Steinberg. Mr. Steinberg made this transcription in 1925 for Mr Koussevitzky. He took one of Galliard's six sonatas for the bassoon with a thoroughbass for the harpsichord. The result, said The Boston Herald, "was a fresh and delightful suite, gay in the lively selections, gay without trivialities, and in the slow movements of a captivating serenity peculiar to the eighteenth century. Nor is Galliard's music merely a faint echo of the superb Handel's; Galliard had a mind and an expression of his own."

Says Koussevitzky Fails as Conductor

By Pierre V. R. Key

New York Music Critic of The Cleveland News.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things—a music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasings and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A NEW COMPOSITION

ONE novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports s
Palerm
There
effec purp
T cert eigh
Bra pity hea der

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

DEC 16 1925

-:- MUSIC -:-

Koussevitzky Creates

We wonder if there is anyone who can tell exactly how Mr. Koussevitzky is going to read a familiar score before he sets his musicians going. Frankly when we went to Infantry Hall last night to hear the second of the Boston Symphony concerts we had no idea of what he would do with Brahms' "First Symphony." But we felt quite certain it would be something interesting.

And it was. This, the chief attraction of the evening, was played with rare imaginative earnestness. The dignity of the composition lost nothing under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, but it was vivified by an intellectual passion that left no recess of the great music unexplored. Sometimes that baton seemed like a thunderbolt, sometimes like a child's finger beckoning its secrets from an awakening world, always an instrument of genius. There was not a moment during this re-creation of a work that puts Brahms at the right hand of Beethoven which was dull or listless; it gave us the thrill of Abt Vogler when out of three sounds was framed "not a fourth sound but a star."

There were three Russian compositions on last night's program. There was that amazingly apt "Fragment from the Apocalypse," which is full of strange fancies and stranger ways of expressing them. There was a fairy tale by the same author—Liadov—and there was a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." In these latter selections Mr. Koussevitzky was able to give full play to his love of fantasy. We don't know how anyone could tell of fairyland better than he does. Nor do we know anyone who combines such a love of fancy with power and an imaginatively illumined mentality. Those who blame Mr. Koussevitzky for some of his readings are blaming him for being a poet.

X. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Globe-Democrat

DEC 6 1925

Pierre Key's Music Article

NEW YORK, December 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers, and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony Band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blowup. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things: A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

DEC 27 1925

Although it is understood that Portland is to be deprived of a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, still the orchestra is giving 112 concerts this season in this country and in Canada. The Symphony players visited Providence, R. I., for a concert 10 days ago and accounts are effusive regarding the brilliant work of the musicians.

Koussevitzky, the famous conductor, stated to a reporter that he finds the public taste in music in this country improving. He regards Providence as a very cultivated center in regard to the taste in music.

The conductor, who was known in America a year ago only by hearsay and who now holds the attention of the country as a rare force in music, has been called a combination of the artistic radical and conservative. He explained that in his opinion the aim of a symphony concert should be a balance between the modern and the classic, appealing to the general public and to the cognoscenti. Above all, it should be interesting—never dull or boring.

Soloist? Here is a subject about which Mr. Koussevitzky also has definite ideas which he does not hesitate to express. If people wish to hear a great pianist or a famous soprano or any other soloist let them go to a recital by that particular artist. In fairness to those who wish to hear a symphony concert a soloist should not be allowed to occupy a quarter of the program. A soloist distracts the attention of the audience from the numbers by the orchestra and vice versa, unless the orchestra is to play a work which calls for a solo part. In that case the very best soloist for the particular job at hand should be found. Mr. Koussevitzky decidedly does not favor the featuring of a soloist on a symphony orchestra program.

DEC 13 1925

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY

A big name, where musicians are concerned does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

PIERRE V. R. KEY

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed but Koussewitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to). There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

Miss Farrar Quiescent.

Our much loved Geraldine Farrar has gone and gotten sick, right at the beginning of her season as a comic opera star. The tour of her organization has been suspended temporarily, and the members of the company given their two weeks' notice. All of which would indicate that the fair Gerry is not in the best of health.

It really would be an excellent thing for this American prima-donna-that-was. She has gone on incessantly, often driving herself when she should have considered her own strength.

I personally regret that Miss Farrar has chosen to finish a glorious career with such an anti-climax as appearing (and for the sake of dollars) in comic opera. I should prefer to have remembered her as a great artiste, something which I find as difficult to do as some of my friends and acquaintances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Ernest Bloch's viola suite was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Jean Lefranc, violist) and Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston on the 11th and 12th of December. Of the composer and his music Philip Hale wrote:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffer-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 8 1925

* * *

The second concert of the Providence series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, the 15th. The programme to be presented by Mr. Koussevitzky will include two numbers by Liadov—"Fragment from the Apocalypse," a symphonic [illegible], and "Kikimora," a fairy folk tale in music; also a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." In the latter part of the programme will be played Brahms's First Symphony in C-minor.

156

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 28

From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced two compositions new to this city, a "Chinese Legend" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" ("Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of these works, indeed of the program as a whole, the orchestra gave the most brilliant performances that it has given under its present conductorship. Some of the music appeared to be chosen for virtuoso purposes and little else. There was a sound and safe beginning with the G major "Brandenburg" concerto of J. S. Bach, played ulstily, and with a very brilliant sonorous tone by the strings. But the works upon which Mr. Koussevitzky trained his whole arsenal of effects were the aforesaid novelties and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The novelties proved of uneven value, though they conspicuously displayed the capacities of the orchestra. In the symphony the conductor showed by turns his fiery temperament and re-creative power and his passion for effect at any cost, whether or not this reacted to the benefit of the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt and dreamed, in the Far East. When he writes music suggested by Eastern impressions or age-old legends it is not with the purpose of showing how jolly Eastern he can be. He has lived that of which he speaks, and he has a particular gift of transcribing it. Whether the listener comes from Oshkosh or Jersey City the music has the right feel; there is no doubt that it is a genuine artistic result of first-hand contacts. And so with that heard last night—a score with evident dificiencies, but one genuinely expressive of the legends and spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from about the year 600, is that of the two Generals, enemies who fight until one is killed. The survivor faces his victim's widow, who is armed and determined upon revenge. The two join battle, only to realize that they love each other. At last, for honor's sake, they take death into their own hands. This story formed the basis of a ballet, "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Legend," performed with Mr. Eichheim's music, last January at the Eighth Street Theatre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim himself, whose works are quoted in the invaluable program notes of Philip Hale, that "the music of the drama begins with Chinese ceremonial music written by a Chinese Emperor about the year 700 A. D. in memory of a slain and beloved General." Thereafter is the thought of the fight, the voice of the young widow mourning, the beginnings of love between the pair, and the other principal phases of the story. It is a pity that, lacking the stage action, the music is too long and has no clear or well-balanced form: too bad, because this is among the most interesting music Mr. Eichheim has produced. It principally requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are often unprecedented and are wholly of the distant land of his legend. The music feels Chinese—as Chinese as a golden dragon or a pair of warriors fighting on a fan. There are sounds unprecedented in the orchestral repertory; there is genuine drama, expressed in musical terms that are not of the West. Only at the last is seen suddenly the cloven hoof of Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere is the consciousness of a composer who has really bridged the gap between oriental and occidental consciousness by means of translating the beauty created by one people into a message articulate and intelligible to the other.

This work should be cut and revised. It is eminently deserving of this, for it has material that should not be forgotten. The audience liked Mr. Eichheim's music, long, cut-up, superfluous as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. These places suggest characteristic rhythms and melodic turns utilized by the composer. And there one stops, with perhaps a single remark: that Mr. Ibert knows very well the art of instrumentation, and Mr. Koussevilsky the art of orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pieces and the everplayed symphony of Tchaikovsky emphasized the inalienable greatness of the Russian. Tchaikovsky is heard too often, but what a remarkable artist he is! His music is never less than flesh and blood, than poignant memories, intense feeling, the madness of despair, the resignation of the grave. The march is surely the wildest in symphonic literature. The symphony, no matter how overplayed or maltreated, is a work that commands admiration for its reckless sincerity and its musical inspiration. Tchaikovsky was not a little composer. Last night, it is true, he suffered frequently from the virtuosity and the officiousness of Mr. Koussevitsky.

The second theme of the first movement is sentimental enough without being dragged as it was. The same thing is true of the trio of the second movement—the passage with the recurrent drum-beat. It was anticipated that having taken the greater part of these two movements too slowly Mr. Koussevitsky would play the march very fast, which he did—so very fast that it was impossible for the superb orchestra to play it cleanly. There are rights that an individual interpreter may be expected to assume. The performance, however, [illegible] past this point. It emphasized the rather wanton eccentricities of Koussevitzky, and proved at the same time that Tchaikovsky is incontrovertibly a great composer.

Aside from these reservations the [illegible]ing of the orchestra was of surprising merit. It is a better body of musicians than it was last season, and it has more brilliancy, precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, who fills a position that cannot quite be filled—that vacated by Georges Longy—[illegible] showed himself last night an admirable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso orchestra, whether or not one always agrees with the conceptions of its vir[illegible] leader.

FIRST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Post Dec 2

Symphony Showing Development of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Altogether auspiciously, alike in the size and temper of the audience and in the excellence and spirit of the performance was the new Tuesday series of Symphony Concerts inaugurated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

MILESTONES IN MUSIC

That these concerts might fill a niche and serve a purpose all their own, Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea of making them progressively illustrative of the development of the orchestra and of orchestral music. Thus that of yesterday spanned the period—and a significant one it is—between Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and the Fifty Symphony of Beethoven; that is to say, from 1721 to 1807, and to bridge this interval came first the "Pastoral Symphony" from Handel's "Messiah," then the Prelude to Haydn's "Creation" and the Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

If a series of concerts such as this is to be at all comprehensive and representative each programme must contain a certain number of short pieces. Yet, except as introductions to operas and oratorios or as instrumental interludes in such works, short orchestral pieces were not written by the pre-nineteenth century composers. Hence Mr. Koussevitzky's selections of yesterday, and hence the necessary omission from his scheme of the greater Handel of the concertos, the more characteristic Haydn of the symphonies and the Mozart of the concert hall.

Wind Added to Strings

Effective enough in its place in the oratorio, the "Pastoral Symphony" is nevertheless slight of substance, and in yesterday's performance the addition of wind-instruments to the string-band for which Handel originally scored this gentle music seemed rather to lessen than to enhance its appeal. The Prelude to the "Creation," too, while interesting for its curious and striking anticipations of later harmonic, melodic and orchestral idioms, does not in truth represent its composer at his best. With Mozart's Overture, however, music of the first importance made its appearance, and the Fifth Symphony was fitting and fortunate choice for the chief and final item of the programme.

Next of Series Jan. 5

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's singularly vital reading of this Fifth Symphony, of his virile interpretation of the Brandenburg Concerto and of his brilliant version of the Overture, all heard this year or last at the regular Symphony Concerts, there is now nothing new to say. As for the fragments from Handel and Haydn, they were sympathetically played. The performance of the latter's Prelude, indeed, prompted the reflection that under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction the oratorio as a whole might so sound as actually to justify the high esteem in which once it was held.

To emphasize the educational aspect of the concert, Professor Walter R. Spalding made brief and pertinent preliminary comments on the chosen pieces. The next concert of the series, which will fall on the afternoon of Jan. 5, will traverse the music of Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Liszt.

Symphony Serge [illegible] conducted for the first time Galliard's sonata in G major, freely transcribed for small orchestra, flute, oboe, bassoon and strings by Maximilian Steinberg. Mr. Steinberg made this transcription in 1925 for Mr. Koussevitzky. He took one of Galliard's six sonatas for the bassoon with a thoroughbass for the harpsichord. The result, said The Boston Herald, "was a fresh and delightful suite, gay in the lively selections, gay without trivialities, and in the slow movements of a captivating serenity peculiar to the eighteenth century. Nor is Galliard's music merely a faint echo of the superb Handel's: Galliard had a mind and an expression of his own."

Says Koussevitzky Fails as Conductor

By Pierre V. R. Key

New York Music Critic of The Cleveland News.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things—a music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasings and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A NEW COMPOSITION

ONE novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert, which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Globe-Democrat

DEC 6 1925

Pierre Key's Music Article

NEW YORK, December 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers, and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony Band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blowup. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things: A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's "A Chinese Tale," which proved to be an intriguing work, with a host of Oriental color, but of needless length. The second first-time work for New York, was Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert, which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C-minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings, which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed but Koussewitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the

---

some oning world geniu durin
that of Be less;
Vogler
framed
star."

There were three Russian compositions on last night's program. There was that amazingly apt "Fragmen[ts] from the Apocalypse," which is full of strange fancies and strange ways of expressing them. There was a fairy tale by the same author—Liadov—and there was a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." In these latter selections Mr. Koussevitzky was able to give full play to his love of fantasy. We don't know how anyone could tell of fairy land better than he does. Nor do we know anyone who combines such love of fancy with power and an imaginatively illumined mentality. Those who blame Mr. Koussevitzky for some of his readings are blaming him for being a poet.

Y. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

DEC

Ernest Bloch's viola suite was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Jean Lefranc, violist) and Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston on the 11th and 12th of December. Of the composer and his music Philip Hale wrote:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffering, lack of recognition. And in him the Hebraic spirit that blazes and mocks and rages and inspires to lofty poetic strains in the books of the old prophets is his heritage and his inspiration.

"There are noble measures, there are scornful pages; there is wildness and there is peace in this strange rhapsodic suite. Whatever one may think of it, may say, it is not music to be carelessly dismissed with an 'I don't like it,' much less is it to be ignored, for it is the music of a man who feels deeply, has worked out his own idiom, has invented his singular but often effective, impressive orchestration. The performance, led by Mr. Koussevitzky, was a triumph of virtuosi."

---

and tale in music; also a suite from Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan."
the latter part of the programme will be played Brahms's First Symp in C-minor.

DEC 13 1925

ould waste a great deal of ould be the best suggesti

rvice, M

GIVE BO
CHRISTM

In contras a bond is a in its own m continues to ment.

It is a pow foundation ston ings. It is decide

Fewer Homes Built in 1924
Than Year Before, but
Cost Is Greater

Dresses regularly priced
$15 to $25, now ....

Dresses regularly priced
$25 to $49.50, now

150

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 28

From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with some notable changes of personnel, gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitsky introduced two composi- ions new to this city, a "Chinese Leg- nd" of Henry Eichheim and "Escales" Ports-of-Call"), by Jacques Ibert. Of se works, indeed of the program as whole, the orchestra gave the most lliant performances that it has given e under its present conductorship. ome of the music appeared to be sen for virtuoso purposes and little e. There was a sound and safe begin- ng with the G major "Brandenburg" ncerto of J. S. Bach, played ulstily, nd with a very brilliant sonorous tone by the strings. But the works upon which Mr. Koussevitsky trained his whole arsenal of effects were the aforesaid novelties and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The novelties proved of uneven value, though they conspicuously displayed the capacities of the orchestra. In the symphony the conductor showed by turns his fiery temperament and re-creative power and his passion for effect at any cost, whether or not this reacted to the benefit of the composer.

Mr. Eichheim has lived, and felt and dreamed, in the Far East. When he writes music suggested by Eastern impressions or age-old legends it is not with the purpose of showing how jolly Eastern he can be. He has lived that of which he speaks, and he has a particular gift of transcribing it. Whether the listener comes from Oshkosh or Jersey City the music has the right feel; there is no doubt that it is a genuine artistic result of first-hand contacts. And so with that heard last night—a score with evident dificiencies, but one genuinely expressive of the legends and spirit of a distant land.

The legend, dating from about the year 600, is that of the two Generals, enemies who fight until one is killed. The survivor faces his victim's widow, who is armed and determined upon revenge. The two join battle, only to realize that they love each other. At last, for honor's sake, they take death into their own hands. This story formed the basis of a ballet, "The Rivals: Ancient Chinese Legend," performed with Mr. Eichheim's music, last January at the Eighth Street Theatre in Chicago.

We are told by Mr. Eichheim himself, whose works are quoted in the invaluable program notes of Philip Hale, that "the music of the drama begins with Chinese ceremonial music written by a Chinese Emperor about the year 700 A. D. in memory of a slain and beloved General." Thereafter is the thought of the fight, the voice of the young widow mourning, the beginnings of love between the pair, and the other principal phases of the story. It is a pity that, lacking the stage action, the music is too long and has no clear or well-balanced form; too bad, because this is among the most interesting music Mr. Eichheim has produced. It principally requires condensation.

His orchestral colors are often unprecedented and are wholly of the distant land of his legend. The music feels Chinese—as Chinese as a golden dragon or a pair of warriors fighting on a fan. There are sounds unprecedented in the orchestral repertory; there is genuine drama, expressed in musical terms that are not of the West. Only at the last is seen suddenly the cloven hoof of Claude Debussy; elsewher ethere is the consciousness of a composer who has really bridged the gap between oriental and occidental consciousness by means of translating the beauty created by one people into a message articulate and intelligible to the other.

This work should be cut and revised. It is eminently deserving of this, for it has material that should not be forgotten. The audience liked Mr. Eichheim's music, long, cut-up, superfluous as some of his pages are.

Mr. Ibert's "Ports-of-Call" are Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. These places suggest characteristic rhythms and melodic turns utilized by the composer. And there one stops, with perhaps a single remark: that Mr. Ibert knows very well the art of instrumentation, and Mr. Koussevilsky the art of orchestral color and climax.

The contrast between these pieces and the everplayed symphony of Tchaikovsky emphasized the inalienable greatness of the Russian. Tchaikovsky is heard too often, but what a remarkable artist he is! His music is never less than flesh and blood, than poignant memories, intense feeling, the madness of despair, the resignation of the grave. The march is surely the wildest in symphonic literature. The symphony, no matter how overplayed or maltreated, is a work that commands admiration fo its reckless sincerity and its musical inspiration. Tchaikovsky was not a littl composer. Last night, it is true, he suffered frequently from the virtuosity an the officiousness of Mr. Koussevitsky.

The second theme of the first move ent is sentimental enough without be g dragged as it was. The same thin is true of the trio of the second move ment—the passage with the recurren drum-beat. It was anticipated that hav ing taken the greater part of these tw movements too slowly Mr. Koussevitsky would play the march very fast, which he did—so very fast that it was impossible for the superb orchestra to play it cleanly. There are rights that an individual interpreter may be expected to ssume. The performance, however, t past this point. It emphasized ne rather wanton eccentricities of ussevitzky, and proved at the same ne that Tchaikovsky is incontrovert- y a great composer.

ide from these reservations the m ing of the orchestra was of surpris- merit. It is a better body of musi- ans than it was last season, and it has more brilliancy, precision and certainty of itself. There are some excellent players in the first positions. Among these is the new oboe, Mr. Gillet, ho fills a position that cannot quite be ed—that vacated by Georges Longy— showed himself last night an ad- rable executant.

More than ever is this a virtuoso or- estra, wh ther or not one always ees with the conceptions of its vir- leader.

FIRST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Post Dec 2

Symphony Showing Development of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Altogether auspiciously, alike in the size and temper of the audience and in the excellence and spirit of the performance was the new Tuesday series of Symphony Concerts inaugurated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

MILESTONES IN MUSIC

That these concerts might fill a niche and serve a purpose all their own, Mr. Koussevitzky conceived the happy idea of making them progressively illustrative of the development of the orchestra and of orchestral music. Thus that of yesterday spanned the period—and a significant one it is—between Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and the Fifty Symphony of Beethoven; that is to say, from 1721 to 1807, and to bridge this interval came first the "Pastoral Symphony" from Handel's "Messiah," then the Prelude to Haydn's "Creation" and the Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

If a series of concerts such as this is to be at all comprehensive and representative each programme must contain a certain number of short pieces. Yet, except as introductions to operas and oratorios or as instrumental interludes in such works, short orchestral pieces were not written by the pre-nineteenth century composers. Hence Mr. Koussevitzky's selections of yesterday, and hence the necessary omission from his scheme of the greater Handel of the concertos, the more characteristic Haydn of the symphonies and the Mozart of the concert hall.

Wind Added to Strings

Effective enough in its place in the oratorio, the "Pastoral Symphony" is nevertheless slight of substance, and in yesterday's performance the addition of wind-instruments to the string-band for which Handel originally scored this gentle music seemed rather to lessen than to enhance its appeal. The Prelude to the "Creation," too, while interesting for its curious and striking anticipations of later harmonic, melodic and orchestral idioms, does not in truth represent its composer at his best. With Mozart's Overture, however, music of the first importance made its appearance, and the Fifth Symphony was fitting and fortunate choice for the chief and final item of the programme.

Next of Series Jan. 5

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's singularly vital reading of this Fifth Symphony, of his virile interpretation of the Brandenburg Concerto and of his brilliant version of the Overture, all heard this year or last at the regular Symphony Concerts, there is now nothing new to say. As for the fragments from Handel and Haydn, they were sympathetically played. The performance of the latter's Prelude, indeed, prompted the reflection that under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction the oratorio as a whole might so sound as actually to justify the high esteem in which once it was held.

To emphasize the educational aspect of the concert, Professor Walter R. Spalding made brief and pertinent preliminary comments on the chosen pieces. The next concert of the series, which will fall on the afternoon of Jan. 5, will traverse the music of Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Liszt.

Symphony Serge [illegible] ducted for the first time Galliard's sonata in G major, freely transcribed for small orchestra, flute, oboe, bassoon and strings by Maximilian Steinberg. Mr. Steinberg made this transcription in 1925 for Mr Koussevitzky. He took one of Galliard's six sonatas for the bassoon with a thoroughbass for the harpsichord. The result, said The Boston Herald, "was a fresh and delightful suite, gay in the lively selections, gay without trivialities, and in the slow movements of a captivating serenity peculiar to the eighteenth century. Nor is Galliard's music merely a faint echo of the superb Handel's; Galliard had a mind and an expression of his own."

Says Koussevitzky Fails as Conductor

By Pierre V. R. Key

New York Music Critic of The Cleveland News.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers; and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blow-up. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is: a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things—a music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters Koussevitzky individuality in phrasings and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A NEW COMPOSITION

ONE novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert, which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely related to those most of us regard as reasonably consistent.

Fewer Homes Built in 1924 Than Year Before, but Cost Is Greater

---

som
oning world
geniu durin
that of Be less;
Vogler
framed
star."

There were three Russian compositions on last night's program. There was that amazingly apt "Fragmen from the Apocalypse," which is ful of strange fancies and strange ways of expressing them. There wa a fairy tale by the same author—Liadov—and there was a suite fro Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." In these latter selections M Koussevitzky was able to give ful play to his love of fantasy. We don' know how anyone could tell of fairy land better than he does. Nor do w know anyone who combines such love of fancy with power and a imaginatively illumined mentality Those who blame Mr. Koussevitzk for me of his readings are blaming being a poet.

X. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
Globe-Democrat
DEC 6 1925

Pierre Key's Music Article

NEW YORK, December 5.—A big name, where musicians are concerned, does not guarantee always unusual ability in more than one way. Experience has taught me that eminent singers rarely make good teachers, and I am at length convinced beyond any doubt that virtuosoship on the double-bass does not insure the capacity to conduct a symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky has proven this to my complete satisfaction. Mr. Koussevitzky came to the Boston Symphony Band a year ago amid a wild hullabaloo. The cultured Hubites purred and preened themselves for something quite grand. For a time there was no blowup. The Russian double-bass player who had money to pay for special orchestra concerts in European capitals managed fairly well during his early appearances. But once he settled to his work the outer skin of his conducting resources slipped completely off. It left him as he is, a mediocre leader of symphonic music, plus personality and a manner that turns matters his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember, too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things: A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed, but Koussevitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old-time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's "A Chinese Tale," which proved to be an intriguing work, with a host of Oriental color, but of needless length. The second first-time work for New York, was Ibert's "Escales" (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert, which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the Brahms C-minor symphony. It is a pity Brahms was not present to have heard the work, for Koussevitzky evidently felt he could improve upon it (in those matters of tempi and dynamics previously referred to).

There were other compositions performed, but there is no need to go particularly into detail concerning them. There were given Koussevitzky readings, which are not, as one may gather by this time, closely elated to those most of us regard s reasonably consistent.

[illegible]

Dresses regularly priced $25 to $49.50, now ....

Dresses regularly priced $15 to $25, now ....

DEC 1 3 1925

ould waste a great deal of ould be the best suggestio

rvice, M

GIVE BO
CHRISTM

In contras a bond is a in its own continues to ment.

It is a pow foundation ston ings. It is decide his way—for a while.

Readers of this column will recall my disinclination to commit myself as to Koussevitzky at his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony men. They will remember too, I think, that each reappearance of the Bostonians' chief left me less satisfied. Now I am ready to pronounce this man a first-class second-class conductor, a rating rather high at that.

When a conductor juggles with tempi as Koussevitzky does it is time to set him down as one of two things. A music experimenter or a seeker of oddities at the expense of his men. There were spots in his reading of the Tschaikowsky pathetique symphony the other evening when the Boston orchestra could scarcely play the notes. Think of a racing speed too great for so fine a body of instrumentalists! Then there were such additional matters as Koussevitzky individuality in phrasing and dynamics. It was a music hodge podge of which a sincere musician would be ashamed but Koussewitzky goes serenely on, feted by Boston society and fussed over no end. It is just about the limit. Too much for New York, who got that way only once within my memory. That was when Josef Stransky hypnotized some old time Philharmonic folk, during a period which now happily is gone.

A New Composition.

One novelty on Koussevitzky's first program was Eichheim's A Chinese Tale, which proved to be an intriguing work with a host of oriental color but of needless length. The second first time work for New York was Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call), the ports suggested musically being Palermo, Tunis-Nefta, and Valencia. There are some nice rhythms and color effects, and the piece serves a certain purpose.

The second Boston Symphony concert which followed the first by forty-eight hours, brought forward the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Ernest Bloch's viola suite was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Jean Lefranc, violist) and Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston on the 11th and 12th of December. Of the composer and his music Philip Hale wrote:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffering, lack of recognition. And in him the Hebraic spirit that blazes and mocks and rages and inspires to lofty poetic strains in the books of the old prophets is his heritage and his inspiration.

"There are noble measures, there are scornful pages; there is wildness and there is peace in this strange rhapsodic suite. Whatever one may think of it, may say, it is not music to be carelessly dismissed with an 'I don't like it,' much less is it to be ignored, for it is the music of a man who feels deeply, has worked out his singular own idiom, has invented his singular but often effective, impressive orchestration. The performance, led by Mr. Koussevitzky, was a triumph of virtuosi."

---

and
tale in music; also a suite from korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan." the latter part of the programme will be played Brahms's First Sym in C-minor.

TIGHT BINDING

DEC 2 0 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT STAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

ra, under th
ed from a tr
the affair of will play in H

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

DEC 2 1 1925

MUSICAL PROVIDENCE

Is Providence keeping up with the rest of the country in the encouragement and development of music? Perhaps we may take pride in the success which attends the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concerts offered, almost every few weeks, by the best artists available. But it is not so easy to find that Providence makes any constructive contribution to the program of music which is supported by the country at large to an extent perhaps unrealized by many people.

The Civic Development Department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States makes our shortcoming painfully apparent when it points out that there are today 49 symphony orchestras maintained in American cities. And lest we think that these are all in larger cities than Providence, it is illuminating to learn that Boulder, Colorado, with a population of 10,989, supports its own symphony orchestra. Again, there is Denver, with a population only slightly larger than Providence, with its magnificent civic outdoor auditorium in which musical feasts are a frequent occurrence. Indeed the Denver Civic Orchestra maintains its own training school for players. The municipal opera in St. Louis is famous; Baltimore is experimenting with low cost admission tickets; little Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, has won world-wide recognition for its annual Bach Festival. Nearer home, the Worcester Music Festival shows what a city of 200,000 can do.

Far from contributing to the musical progress of America, Providence does not even show a respectable auditorium in which to hold the concerts of visiting musicians. How many Providence people have groaned with shame at the shabby old barn on South Main street where we have to welcome talent often worthy of an artistic and beautiful background for their efforts.

So long as Providence puts up with Infantry Hall instead of putting up for an auditorium worthy of a city of its size and supposed culture, we shall have to be content with pointing, with what pride we can muster, to our purchases of radios and talking machines.

TURN TO PAGE 205 FOR DEC. NOTICES THAT WERE LEFT OFF THIS PAGE

By Serge Koussevitzky

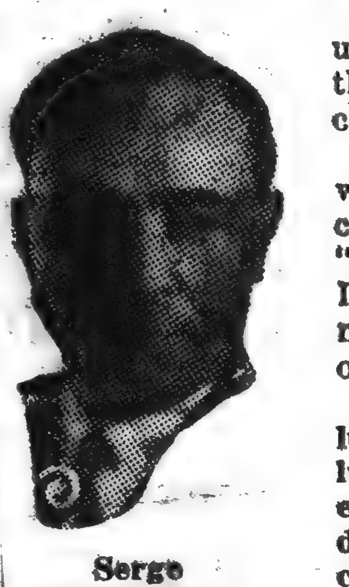
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The Greatest Man of the Quarter Century Is Einstein"

AMERICAN DEC

THE quarter-century now ending has changed the world we live in so radically that the year 1900 appears to us as a far-away era of touching naivete, an epoch when we were playing toys and thought they were real things.

The dreams of Jules Verne and H. G. Wells are overshadowed by actual technical wonders. The yearnings of Leonardo da Vinci—to fly like a bird—has become reality. And a boy of 1925 trying to describe a bird says: "It looks like an airplane."



Serge Koussevitzky

The moving pictures created a new art of unheard of possibilities. It seems miraculous to those who remember the first attempts of the cinema.

In the mid-ocean we are able to correspond with our friends on either side. In New York we can hear a concert from San Francisco. We can "radio" pictures and autographs. In my childhood I used to be fond of fantastic stories—but I do not recall any one so bold as the fantastic story of the year 1925 A. D.

The war swept over the world; a series of revolutions followed. The idea of monarchism and absolutism perished. But the great spirit of Liberty endured through the years of struggle and held decisive victory at the very threshold of the quarter-century in the treaties of Locarno. The idea of the United States of Europe has been born.

The greatest man of the passing quarter-century is, to my mind, Albert Einstein. He summarized all that had been done before; he abolished absolutism in the world of ideas; he gave the key-word, Relativity. The time is relative; the motion is relative. If I cannot seize it from the scientific point of view, I can feel it by intuition.

My native country suffered fullest measure during the years past. I have faith in the resurrection of Russia; she is in the process of resurrection already—despite all the sufferings, despite all the chains.

In my art, in music, the change was not less spectacular. Musical craftsmanship has attained its heights; young men armed with every technique have produced dozens of musical able ability. Stravinsky, the idol of the standing figure in the art of today, truly rep e epoch. One of his fervent admirers, a French ra ring ac sky's lps."

Advertiser Dec. 25

TELEPHONE LIBERTY 4000

TWO NOVELTIES ARE PRESENTED BY SYMPHONY

Henry Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary" was offered as a novelty appropriate to the season at the Symphony yesterday afternoon. This work is arranged for three trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, side drum and organ, and as conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, it showed great strength and clarity. It is somewhat similar to a "Trumpet Prelude" of Purcell's, which was played last year by Stokowski of the Philadelhpia Orchestra. Both of these pieces were arranged by Sir Henry Wood from Purcell's works.

Rather less interesting was Ernest Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Despite Mr. Koussevitzky's direction and the presence of Jesus Sanroma at the piano, the concerto proved somewhat of a disappointment. It seemed a slightly chaotic composition, cast in the eighteenth century form, but highly modernized.

These novelties concluded, Mr Koussevitzky passed on to the sweep and roll of Wagner's "Prelude to Parsifal." The entire second part of the program was taken up with Saint-Saens "Symphony in C minor," a work in which syncopated rhythm and a sort of tricky gayety have

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

DEC 2 0 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Finds a New Public

An examination of the subscription lists to the newly added series of Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, has led to an interesting disclosure.

The hour for this new series was set at 3:15, largely for the convenience of out-of-town patrons. Before the opening concert on the first of December the series was within a few seats of being fully subscribed. A classification of the records yields the following results: Subscribers living in the city of Boston, 26 per cent.; subscribers living in the suburbs of Boston, 59 per cent.; subscribers from outlying cities and towns, 15 per cent. In other words, three-quarters of this new public of the Boston Symphony Orchestra live outside of Boston and a considerable number of this visiting public come from about seventy-five cities or towns of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

The orchestra will give its second concert of the Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8.

BLOCH CONCERTO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Globe

Purcell, Saint-Saens and Wagner Also on Program

Dec. 25

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings, with piano obbligato, was the chief novelty on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. A trumpet voluntary by Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Saint-Saens' symphony with organ, were the other numbers.

This afternoon concert in the regular series shifted to Thursday to avoid falling on Christmas Day, was heard by an audience including an unusual number of occasional visitors to these affairs. Subscribers had obviously given away tickets with unwonted prodigality. The rush seats were not all taken.

Mr Koussevitzky conducted with less zest than usual until the sonorous climax in the last movement of Saint-Saens' symphony, which he made vividly rhythmic.

The Purcell voluntary proved noisy and ineffective. The fault lay not in the music itself, which is an interesting specimen of 17th century routine, but in the arrangement for orchestra and the conducting. The trumpet part is apparently of almost unplayable difficulty, as is the case with the original trumpet parts to many works by Bach and Handel. It was performed yesterday with obvious and painful effort. The organ failed to blend gracefully with the other instruments. All the lines of the music were blurred. Mr Koussevitzky tried to redeem the performance by harsh accentuation and crude volume of tone, which only made matters worse.

Bloch's concerto grosso, composed last year and lately published, is an interesting free treatment of old musical forms. The piece is less original in harmony, less intense in mood than most of Bloch. Much of the music is derivative, not a little of it perilously near banality. But it is cleverly and attractively written. The performance was satisfactory, hardly more.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky in the vein for Wagner. The Prelude to "Parsifal" is a feebler thing than that to "Tristan" or than that to "Die Meistersinger." Yesterday it was dragged out, and occasionally the orchestra was overdriven, not merely at the climax. Mr Koussevitzky's conducting varies with his moods, and yesterday was not one of his good days.

Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony he no doubt intended, when he wrote it, for his masterpiece. And that is what it has turned out to be. It holds a place in the orchestral repertory, something only the symphonies of Franck and of Chausson among his compatriots and contemporaries have done. This music is smoothly written, facile, yet not without solidity, and in an acceptable imitation of the grand manner.

Saint-Saens does not go in for extended development, he prefers to write more as Brahms wrote variations. There is a main theme which in various transformations keeps recurring. He has eliminated many of the conventional repeats. His orchestra, beside the organ, includes most of the instruments Wagner had used which are not found in Beethoven's scores. It appears that he was the first symphonic composer to venture to extend the orchestra beyond what Beethoven had employed. So great and so stupid is the force of tradition.

One felt again yesterday that the present seating of the orchestra is not as effective as most of the former arrangements. The second violins are often inaudible, for one thing. One felt again that Mr Koussevitzky does not care as much as one wishes he did for quality of tone. He strives not so much for purity of tone as for sonority. The brass especially is allowed and even compelled to play far too thoatily, and far too loudly. As an instrument the orchestra now often resembles a fine piano which is at the mercy of a relentless virtuoso.

P. H.

Boston Herald Dec. 25 '15

SYMPHONY GIVES TENTH CONCERT

Feature of Its Program Is Bloch "Concerto Grosso" for Strings and Piano

PLAYED FOR FIRST TIME IN THIS CITY

BY PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet Voluntary for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ; Bloch, Concerto Grosso for strings and piano obligato; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Symphony, C minor, No. 3.

The pieces by Purcell and Bloch were played for the first time in Boston. Some were surprised to find on the day before Christmas the Prelude to "Parsifal" on the program; music that is associated with the Passion of our Lord rather than with the Divine Birth and the rejoicing of the heavenly host. The music itself seemed very old, if not stale. Hearing it yesterday—the performance was not an impressive one—one could not help recalling the answer of George Moore, who was asked at Bayreuth years ago how he liked the opera as a whole: "Holy water in a German beer-barrel."

It would be interesting to know where Sir Henry Wood found the theme of Purcell's Voluntary or Prelude, or Interlude. Sir Henry has a way of selecting pages from the great English composer's works, "editing" them, and putting them together for a Suite. This Voluntary is short and stirring; music for the entrance of a Tsar about to be crowned, a warrior returning triumphant and exulting in his chariot; a royal banqueting hall, as when "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." The solo trumpet passages were brilliantly played by Mr. Mager.

Bloch's Concerto was composed in 1924-5, and first performed in Cleveland last June. It is described as written in 18th century form, but "modernized." Is it possible that this composer is harking back to the old form of Corelli, Handel Bach, just as Stravinsky has of late forsaken Russia and its folk tunes, foresworn the paganism that inspired "Sacre du Printemps" and is adapting himself, or trying to adapt himself, to formulas and the idiom of the 18th century.

Felicien David was so fascinated by the Orient—witness his "Desert" and his "Lalla Rook"—that as he persisted in this vein, Auber wished that the worthy David would dismount from his camel. Is it possible that Mr. Bloch no longer recalls the ghetto and the pogroms, the glory of Solomon's court and the waters of Babylon? That he no longer is interested in Jezebel as the heroine of an opera? Much of his music, perhaps the best of it, has been charged with the Hebraic spirit. At times he has been as eloquent and impassioned as any wild and shaggy prophet denouncing the cities of Israel's foes; or crying "Woe," as he saw the haughty daughters of Zion walking with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing and making a tinkling with their feet.

Only in the Dirge of this concerto do we find the Bloch of the "Jewish Cycle," and to us this Dirge is the most original, the most compelling portion of the work. The first movement seems a rather labored imitation of old masters. The Finale, in fugue form, has chiefly academic interest. The Pastorale is charming, not at all in the conventional manner, that wishes to remind one of lush meadows, shepherds piping, happy farmers with ribboned hats and rakes dancing with milkmaids (see the first act of many operettas). But in the Dirge we hear, as in other music by this composer, the wailing of an oppressed race, not any selfish expression of individual grief. Here is music that at times is the cry of agony, as of the persecuted, weeping and groaning by the historic wall, mourning the past glory.

It is the fashion now for the lions of the London press, old and young, to roar their contempt for Saint-Saens and all his works. It is true that this composer was an eclaetic; he had a great gift for assimilation; he could write at will in the manner of any preceding musician of genius; but he, too, was endowed with great gifts; notably a singular clarity in thought and expression; a keen sense of logical construction and development, also of the value of economy in the use of orchestral resources; a fine taste and an elegance peculiar to him. This symphony with the organ is surely among the best of his many compositions. Though it is nearly 40 years old, it is still fresh and vigorous. While musicians may well admire its structure, though they may wish that the last section were not so long drawn out; that there were not an anticipation of the one great climax, the people hear this music gladly. The performance was engrossing by its beauty and strength. The concert will be repeated on Saturday night. The program for the concerts of next week, as it is now announced is as follows: Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello ([illegible]); Strauss A Alpine [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

SEDGWICK CONCERT STAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

1 1925

ra, under th
ed from a tr
the affair of
will play in H

MUSICAL PROVIDENCE

Is Providence keeping up with the rest of the country in the encouragement and development of music? Perhaps we may take pride in the success which attends the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concerts offered, almost every few weeks, by the best artists available. But it is not so easy to find that Providence makes any constructive contribution to the program of music which is supported by the country at large to an extent perhaps unrealized by many people.

The Civic Development Department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States makes our shortcoming painfully apparent when it points out that there are today 49 symphony orchestras maintained in American cities. And lest we think that these are all in larger cities than Providence, it is illuminating to learn that Boulder, Colorado, with a population of 10,989, supports its own symphony orchestra. Again, there is Denver, with a population only slightly larger than Providence, with its magnificent civic outdoor auditorium in which musical feasts are a frequent occurrence. Indeed the Denver Civic Orchestra maintains its own training school for players. The municipal opera in St. Louis is famous; Baltimore is experimenting with low cost admission tickets; little Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, has won world-wide recognition for its annual Bach Festival. Nearer home, the Worcester Music Festival shows what a city of 200,000 can do.

Far from contributing to the musical progress of America, Providence does not even show a respectable auditorium in which to hold the concerts of visiting musicians. How many Providence people have groaned with shame at the shabby old barn on South Main street where we have to welcome talent often worthy of an artistic and beautiful background for their efforts.

So long as Providence puts up with Infantry Hall instead of putting up for an auditorium worthy of a city of its size and supposed culture, we shall have to be content with pointing, with what pride we can muster, to our purchases of radios and talking machines.

TURN T DEC. NOT FF THIS PA 205 fou WERE LEFT

By Serge Koussevitzky

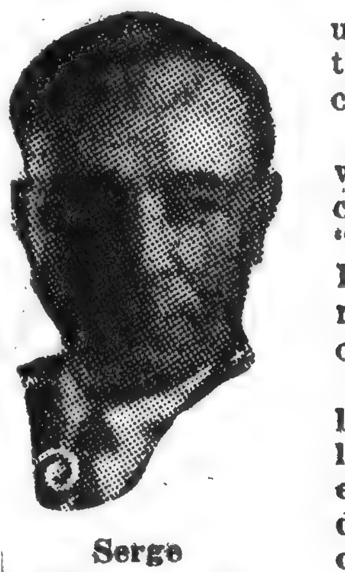
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The Greatest Man of the Quarter Century Is Einstein"

AMERICAN Dec

THE quarter-century now ending has changed the world we live in so radically that the year 1900 appears to us as a far-away era of touching naivete, an epoch when we were playing toys and thought they were real things.

The dreams of Jules Verne and H. G. Wells are overshadowed by actual technical wonders. The yearnings of Leonardo da Vinci—to fly like a bird—has become reality. And a boy of 1925 trying to describe a bird says: "It looks like an airplane."



Serge Koussevitzky

The moving pictures created a new art of unheard of possibilities. It seems miraculous to those who remember the first attempts of the cinema.

In the mid-ocean we are able to correspond with our friends on either side. In New York we can hear a concert from San Francisco. We can "radio" pictures and autographs. In my childhood I used to be fond of fantastic stories—but I do not recall any one so bold as the fantastic story of the year 1925 A. D.

The war swept over the world; a series of revolutions followed. The idea of monarchism and absolutism perished. But the great spirit of Liberty endured through the years of struggle and held decisive victory at the very threshold of the quarter-century in the treaties of Locarno. The idea of the United States of Europe has been born.

The greatest man of the passing quarter-century is, to my mind, Albert Einstein. He summarized all that had been done before; he abolished absolutism in the world of ideas; he gave the key-word, Relativity. The time is relative; the motion is relative. If I cannot seize it from the scientific point of view, I can feel it by intuition.

My native country suffered fullest measure during the years past. I have faith in the resurrection of Russia; she is in the process of resurrection already—despite all the sufferings, despite all the chains.

In my art, in music, the change was not less spectacular. Musical craftsmanship has attained its heights; young men armed with every technique have produced dozens of musical able ability. Stravinsky, the idol of the standing figure in the art of today, truly rep e epoch. One of his fervent admirers, a French ra ring a ky's Tps."

Advertiser Dec. 25

TELEPHONE LIBERTY 4000

TWO NOVELTIES ARE PRESENTED BY SYMPHONY

Henry Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary" was offered as a novelty appropriate to the season at the Symphony yesterday afternoon. This work is arranged for three trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, side drum and organ, and as conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, it showed great strength and clarity. It is somewhat similar to a "Trumpet Prelude" of Purcell's, which was played last year by Stokowski of the Philadelhpia Orchestra. Both of these pieces were arranged by Sir Henry Wood from Purcell's works.

Rather less interesting was Ernest Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Despite Mr. Koussevitzky's direction and the presence of Jesus Sanroma at the piano, the concerto proved somewhat of a disappointment. It seemed a slightly chaotic composition, cast in the eighteenth century form, but highly modernized.

These novelties concluded, Mr Koussevitzky passed on to the sweep and roll of Wagner's "Prelude to Parsifal." The entire second part of the program was taken up with Saint-Saens "Symphony in C minor," a work in which syncopated rhythm and a sort of tricky gayety have

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN CITIZEN

DEC 2 0 1925

Boston Symphony Orchestra Finds a New Public

An examination of the subscription lists to the newly added series of Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, has led to an interesting disclosure.

The hour for this new series was set at 3:15, largely for the convenience of out-of-town patrons. Before the opening concert on the first of December the series was within a few seats of being fully subscribed. A classification of the records yields the following results: Subscribers living in the city of Boston, 26 per cent.; subscribers living in the suburbs of Boston, 59 per cent.; subscribers from outlying cities and towns, 15 per cent. In other words, three-quarters of this new public of the Boston Symphony Orchestra live outside of Boston and a considerable number of this visiting public come from about seventy-five cities or towns of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

The orchestra will give its second concert of the Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8.

BLOCH CONCERTO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Globe

Purcell, Saint-Saens and Wagner Also on Program

Dec. 25

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings, with piano obbligato, was the chief novelty on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. A trumpet voluntary by Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Saint-Saens' symphony with organ, were the other numbers.

This afternoon concert in the regular series shifted to Thursday to avoid falling on Christmas Day, was heard by an audience including an unusual number of occasional visitors to these affairs. Subscribers had obviously given away tickets with unwonted prodigality. The rush seats were not all taken.

Mr Koussevitzky conducted with less zest than usual until the sonorous climax in the last movement of Saint-Saens' symphony, which he made vividly rhythmic.

The Purcell voluntary proved noisy and ineffective. The fault lay not in the music itself, which is an interesting specimen of 17th century routine, but in the arrangement for orchestra and the conducting. The trumpet part is apparently of almost unplayable difficulty, as is the case with the original trumpet parts to many works by Bach and Handel. It was performed yesterday with obvious and painful effort. The organ failed to blend gracefully with the other instruments. All the lines of the music were blurred. Mr Koussevitzky tried to redeem the performance by harsh accentuation and crude volume of tone, which only made matters worse.

Bloch's concerto grosso, composed last year and lately published, is an interesting free treatment of old musical forms. The piece is less original in harmony, less intense in mood than most of Bloch. Much of the music is derivative, not a little of it perilously near banality. But it is cleverly and attractively written. The performance was satisfactory, hardly more.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky in the vein for Wagner. The Prelude to "Parsifal" is a feebler thing than that to "Tristan" or than that to "Die Meistersinger." Yesterday it was dragged out, and occasionally the orchestra was overdriven, not merely at the climax. Mr Koussevitzky's conducting varies with his moods, and yesterday was not one of his good days.

Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony he no doubt intended, when he wrote it, for his masterpiece. And that is what it has turned out to be. It holds a place in the orchestral repertory, something only the symphonies of Franck and of Chausson among his compatriots and contemporaries have done. This music is smoothly written, facile, yet not without solidity, and in an acceptable imitation of the grand manner.

Saint-Saens does not go in for extended development, he prefers to write more as Brahms wrote variations. There is a main theme which in various transformations keeps recurring. He has eliminated many of the conventional repeats. His orchestra, beside the organ, includes most of the instruments Wagner had used which are not found in Beethoven's scores. It appears that he was the first symphonic composer to venture to extend the orchestra beyond what Beethoven had employed. So great and so stupid is the force of tradition.

One felt again yesterday that the present seating of the orchestra is not as effective as most of the former arrangements. The second violins are often inaudible, for one thing. One felt again that Mr Koussevitzky does not care as much as one wishes he did for quality of tone. He strives not so much for purity of tone as for sonority. The brass especially is allowed and even compelled to play far too thoatily, and far too loudly. As an instrument the orchestra now often resembles a fine piano which is at the mercy of a relentless virtuoso.

P. R.

Boston Herald Dec. 25 '15

SYMPHONY GIVES TENTH CONCERT

Feature of Its Program Is Bloch "Concerto Grosso" for Strings and Piano

PLAYED FOR FIRST TIME IN THIS CITY

BY PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet Voluntary for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ; Bloch, Concerto Grosso for strings and piano obligato; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Symphony, C minor, No. 3.

The pieces by Purcell and Bloch were played for the first time in Boston. Some were surprised to find on the day before Christmas the Prelude to "Parsifal" on the program; music that is associated with the Passion of our Lord rather than with the Divine Birth and the rejoicing of the heavenly host. The music itself seemed very old, if not stale. Hearing it yesterday—the performance was not an impressive one—one could not help recalling the answer of George Moore, who was asked at Bayreuth years ago how he liked the opera as a whole: "Holy water in a German beer-barrel."

It would be interesting to know where Sir Henry Wood found the theme of Purcell's Voluntary or Prelude, or Interlude. Sir Henry has a way of selecting pages from the great English composer's works, "editing" them, and putting them together for a Suite. This Voluntary is short and stirring; music for the entrance of a Tsar about to be crowned, a warrior returning triumphant and exulting in his chariot; a royal banqueting hall, as when "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." The solo trumpet passages were brilliantly played by Mr. Mager.

Bloch's Concerto was composed in 1924-5, and first performed in Cleveland last June. It is described as written in 18th century form, but "modernized." Is it possible that this composer is harking back to the old form of Corelli, Handel Bach, just as Stravinsky has of late forsaken Russia and its folk tunes, foresworn the paganism that inspired "Sacre du Printemps" and is adapting himself, or trying to adapt himself, to formulas and the idiom of the 18th century.

Felicien David was so fascinated by the Orient—witness his "Desert" and his "Lalla Rook"—that as he persisted in this vein, Auber wished that the worthy David would dismount from his camel. Is it possible that Mr. Bloch no longer recalls the ghetto and the pogroms, the glory of Solomon's court and the waters of Babylon? That he no longer is interested in Jezebel as the heroine of an opera? Much of his music, perhaps the best of it, has been charged with the Hebraic spirit. At times he has been as eloquent and impassioned as any wild and shaggy prophet denouncing the cities of Israel's foes; or crying "Woe," as he saw the haughty daughters of Zion walking with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing and making a tinkling with their feet.

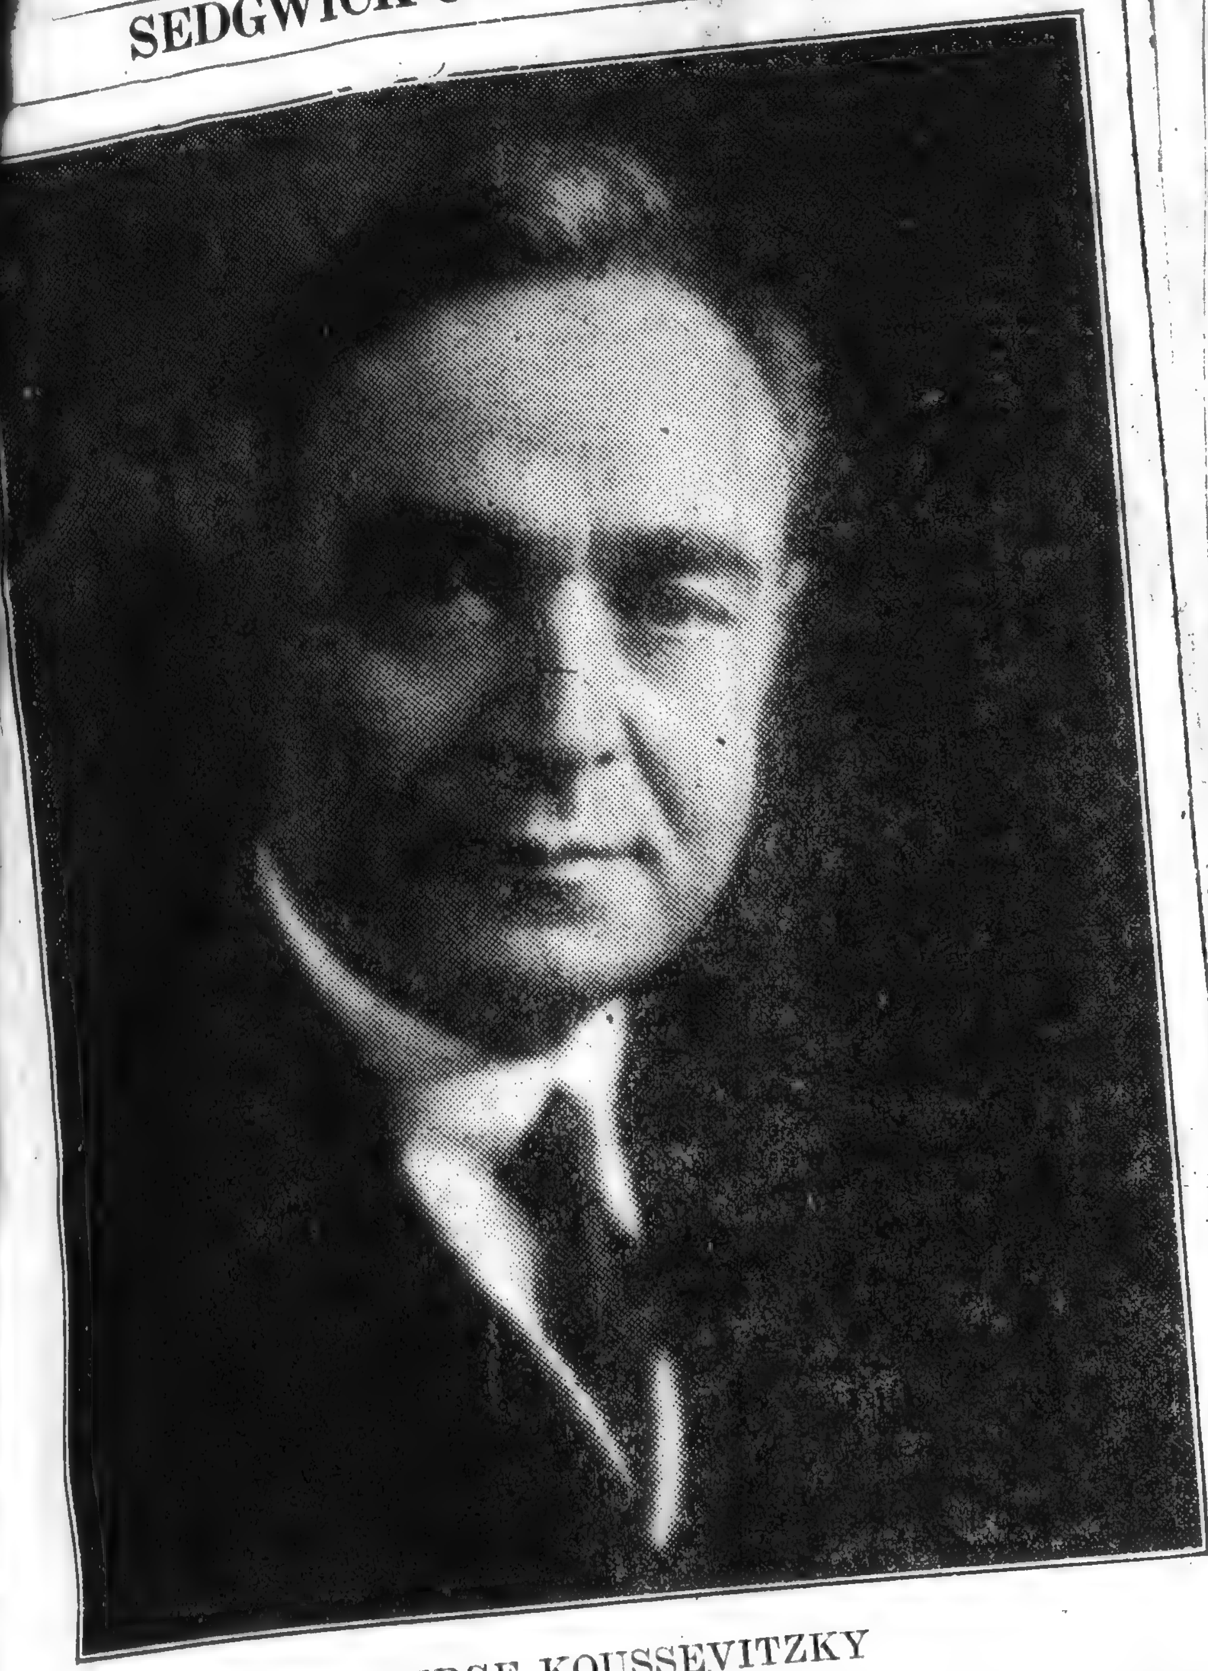
Only in the Dirge of this concerto do we find the Bloch of the "Jewish Cycle," and to us this Dirge is the most original, the most compelling portion of the work. The first movement seems a rather labored imitation of old masters. The Finale, in fugue form, has chiefly academic interest. The Pastorale is charming, not at all in the conventional manner, that wishes to remind one of lush meadows, shepherds piping, happy farmers with ribboned hats and rakes dancing with milkmaids (see the first act of many operettas). But in the Dirge we hear, as in other music by this composer, the wailing of an oppressed race, not any selfish expression of individual grief. Here is music that at times is the cry of agony, as of the persecuted, weeping and groaning by the historic wall, mourning the past glory.

It is the fashion now for the lions of the London press, old and young, to roar their contempt for Saint-Saens and all his works. It is true that this composer was an eclaetic; he had a great gift for assimilation; he could write at will in the manner of any preceding musician of genius; but he, too, was endowed with great gifts; notably a singular clarity in thought and expression; a keen sense of logical construction and development, also of the value of economy in the use of orchestral resources; a fine taste and an elegance peculiar to him. This symphony with the organ is surely among the best of his many compositions. Though it is nearly 40 years old, it is still fresh and vigorous. While musicians may well admire its structure, though they may wish that the last section were not so long drawn out; that there were not an anticipation of the one great climax, the people hear this music gladly. The performance was engrossing by its beauty and strength. The concert will be repeated on Saturday night. The program for the concerts of next week, as it is now announced is as follows: Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello (Pr. [illegible]); Strauss A Alpine

TIGHT BINDING INFORMATION OBSCURED

DEC 2 0 1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT STAR



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, has recently returned from a trip to Canada where their concerts were greeted as "the affair of the season" wherever they went. The orchestra will play in Hartford, February 7 cou[illegible] he rest of the [illegible] development of music? Perhaps [illegible] pride in the success which attends the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concerts offered, almost every few weeks, by the best artists available. But it is not so easy to find that Providence makes any constructive contribution to the program of music which is supported by the country at large to an extent perhaps unrealized by many people.

E

The Civic Development Department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States makes our shortcoming painfully apparent when it points out that there are today 49 symphony orchestras maintained in American cities. And lest we think that these are all in larger cities than Providence, it is illuminating to learn that Boulder, Colorado, with a population of 10,989, supports its own symphony orchestra. Again, there is Denver, with a population only slightly larger than Providence, with its magnificent civic outdoor auditorium in which musical feasts are a frequent occurrence. Indeed the Denver Civic Orchestra maintains its own training school for players. The municipal opera in St. Louis is famous; Baltimore is experimenting with low cost admission tickets; little Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, has won world-wide recognition for its annual Bach Festival. Nearer home, the Worcester Music Festival shows what a city of 200,000 can do.

Far from contributing to the musical progress of America, Providence does not even show a respectable auditorium in which to hold the concerts of visiting musicians. How many Providence people have groaned with shame at the shabby old barn on South Main street where we have to welcome talent often worthy of an artistic and beautiful background for their efforts.

So long as Providence puts up with Infantry Hall instead of putting up for an auditorium worthy of a city of its size and supposed culture, we shall have to be content with pointing, with what pride we can muster, to our purchases of [illegible]os and talking machines.

TURN TO PAGE 205 for
DEC. NOTICES [illegible] WERE LEFT OFF THIS PAGE

Henry Wood from Purcell's works.

Rather less interesting was Ernest Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Despite Mr. Koussevitzky's direction and the presence of Jesus Sanroma at the piano, the concerto proved somewhat of a disappointment. It seemed a slightly chaotic composition, cast in the eighteenth century form, but highly modernized.

These novelties concluded, Mr Koussevitzky passed on to the sweep and roll of Wagner's "Prelude to Parsifal." The entire second part of the program was taken up with Saint-Saens "Symphony in C minor," a work in which syncopated rhythm and a sort of tricky gayety have their place side by side with the more serious passages.

An examination of the subscription lists to the newly added series of Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, has led to an interesting disclosure.

The hour for this new series was set at 3:15, largely for the convenience of out-of-town patrons. Before the opening concert on the first of December the series was within a few seats of being fully subscribed. A classification of the records yields the following results: Subscribers living in the city of Boston, 26 per cent.; subscribers living in the suburbs of Boston, 59 per cent.; subscribers from outlying cities and towns, 15 per cent. In other words, three-quarters of this new public of the Boston Symphony Orchestra live outside of Boston and a considerable number of this visiting public come from about seventy-five cities or towns of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

The orchestra will give its second concert of the Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8.

By Serge Koussevitzky

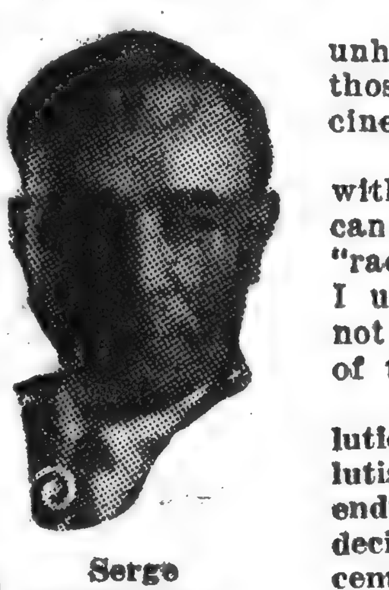
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The Greatest Man of the Quarter Century Is Einstein"

AMERICAN Dec

THE quarter-century now ending has changed the world we live in so radically that the year 1900 appears to us as a far-away era of touching naivete, an epoch when we were playing toys and thought they were real things.

The dreams of Jules Verne and H. G. Wells are overshadowed by actual technical wonders. The yearnings of Leonardo da Vinci—to fly like a bird—has become reality. And a boy of 1925 trying to describe a bird says: "It looks like an airplane."



Serge Koussevitzky

The moving pictures created a new art of unheard of possibilities. It seems miraculous to those who remember the first attempts of the cinema.

In the mid-ocean we are able to correspond with our friends on either side. In New York we can hear a concert from San Francisco. We can "radio" pictures and autographs. In my childhood I used to be fond of fantastic stories—but I do not recall any one so bold as the fantastic story of the year 1925 A. D.

The war swept over the world; a series of revolutions followed. The idea of monarchism and absolutism perished. But the great spirit of Liberty endured through the years of struggle and held decisive victory at the very threshold of the quarter-century in the treaties of Locarno. The idea of the United States of Europe has been born.

The greatest man of the passing quarter-century is, to my mind, Albert Einstein. He summarized all that had been done before; he abolished absolutism in the world of ideas; he gave the key-word, Relativity. The time is relative; the motion is relative. If I cannot seize it from the scientific point of view, I can feel it by intuition.

My native country suffered fullest measure during the years past. I have faith in the resurrection of Russia; she is in the process of resurrection already—despite all the sufferings, despite all the chains.

In my art, in music, the change was not less spectacular. Musical craftsmanship has attained its heights; young men armed with every contrivance of a super-technique have produced dozens of musical compositions of remarkable ability. Stravinsky, the idol of the youth and the most outstanding figure in the art of today, truly represents the spirit of the epoch. One of his fervent admirers, a French musician, wrote to Stravinsky from the front that in the shattering roar of the war he actually recognized the moods of Stravinsky's "Sacre do Printemps."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Globe

Purcell, Saint-Saens and Wagner Also on Program

Dec. 25

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings, with piano obbligato, was the chief novelty on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. A trumpet voluntary by Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Saint-Saens' symphony with organ, were the other numbers.

This afternoon concert in the regular series shifted to Thursday to avoid falling on Christmas Day, was heard by an audience including an unusual number of occasional visitors to these affairs. Subscribers had obviously given away tickets with unwonted prodigality. The rush seats were not all taken.

Mr Koussevitzky conducted with less zest than usual until the sonorous climax in the last movement of Saint-Saens' symphony, which he made vividly rhythmic.

The Purcell voluntary proved noisy and ineffective. The fault lay not in the music itself, which is an interesting specimen of 17th century routine, but in the arrangement for orchestra and the conducting. The trumpet part is apparently of almost unplayable difficulty, as is the case with the original trumpet parts to many works by Bach and Handel. It was performed yesterday with obvious and painful effort. The organ failed to blend gracefully with the other instruments. All the lines of the music were blurred. Mr Koussevitzky tried to redeem the performance by harsh accentuation and crude volume of tone, which only made matters worse.

Bloch's concerto grosso, composed last year and lately published, is an interesting free treatment of old musical forms. The piece is less original in harmony, less intense in mood than most of Bloch. Much of the music is derivative, not a little of it perilously near banality. But it is cleverly and attractively written. The performance was satisfactory, hardly more.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky in the vein for Wagner. The Prelude to "Parsifal" is a feebler thing than that to "Tristan" or than that to "Die Meistersinger." Yesterday it was dragged out, and occasionally the orchestra was overdriven, not merely at the climax. Mr Koussevitzky's conducting varies with his moods, and yesterday was not one of his good days.

Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony he no doubt intended, when he wrote it, for his masterpiece. And that is what it has turned out to be. It holds a place in the orchestral repertory, something only the symphonies of Franck and of Chausson among his compatriots and contemporaries have done. This music is smoothly written, facile, yet not without solidity, and in an acceptable imitation of the grand manner.

Saint-Saens does not go in for extended development, he prefers to write more as Brahms wrote variations. There is a main theme which in various transformations keeps recurring. He has eliminated many of the conventional repeats. His orchestra, beside the organ, includes most of the instruments Wagner had used which are not found in Beethoven's scores. It appears that he was the first symphonic composer to venture to extend the orchestra beyond what Beethoven had employed. So great and so stupid is the force of tradition.

One felt again yesterday that the present seating of the orchestra is not as effective as most of the former arrangements. The second violins are often inaudible, for one thing. One felt again that Mr Koussevitzky does not care as much as one wishes he did for quality of tone. He strives not so much for purity of tone as for sonority. The brass especially is allowed and even compelled to play far too thoatily, and far too loudly. As an instrument the orchestra now often resembles a fine piano which is at the mercy of a relentless virtuoso.

P. R.

Boston Herald
Dec. 25 '15

SYMPHONY GIVES TENTH CONCERT

Feature of Its Program Is Bloch "Concerto Grosso" for Strings and Piano

PLAYED FOR FIRST TIME IN THIS CITY

BY PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet Voluntary for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ; Bloch, Concerto Grosso for strings and piano obligato; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Symphony, C minor, No. 3.

The pieces by Purcell and Bloch were played for the first time in Boston. Some were surprised to find on the day before Christmas the Prelude to "Parsifal" on the program; music that is associated with the Passion of our Lord rather than with the Divine Birth and the rejoicing of the heavenly host. The music itself seemed very old, if not stale. Hearing it yesterday—the performance was not an impressive one—one could not help recalling the answer of George Moore, who was asked at Bayreuth years ago how he liked the opera as a whole: "Holy water in a German beer-barrel."

It would be interesting to know where Sir Henry Wood found the theme of Purcell's Voluntary or Prelude, or Interlude. Sir Henry has a way of selecting pages from the great English composer's works, "editing" them, and putting them together for a Suite. This Voluntary is short and stirring; music for the entrance of a Tsar about to be crowned, a warrior returning triumphant and exulting in his chariot; a royal banqueting hall, as when "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." The solo trumpet passages were brilliantly played by Mr. Mager.

Bloch's Concerto was composed in 1924-5, and first performed in Cleveland last June. It is described as written in 18th century form, but "modernized." Is it possible that this composer is harking back to the old form of Corelli, Handel Bach, just as Stravinsky has of late forsaken Russia and its folk tunes, foresworn the paganism that inspired "Sacre du Printemps" and is adapting himself, or trying to adapt himself, to formulas and the idiom of the 18th century.

Felicien David was so fascinated by the Orient—witness his "Desert" and his "Lalla Rook"—that as he persisted in this vein, Auber wished that the worthy David would dismount from his camel. Is it possible that Mr. Bloch no longer recalls the ghetto and the pogroms, the glory of Solomon's court and the waters of Babylon? That he no longer is interested in Jezebel as the heroine of an opera? Much of his music, perhaps the best of it, has been charged with the Hebraic spirit. At times he has been as eloquent and impassioned as any wild and shaggy prophet denouncing the cities of Israel's foes; or crying "Woe," as he saw the haughty daughters of Zion walking with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing and making a tinkling with their feet.

Only in the Dirge of this concerto do we find the Bloch of the "Jewish Cycle," and to us this Dirge is the most original, the most compelling portion of the work. The first movement seems a rather labored imitation of old masters. The Finale, in fugue form, has chiefly academic interest. The Pastorale is charming, not at all in the conventional manner, that wishes to remind one of lush meadows, shepherds piping, happy farmers with ribboned hats and rakes dancing with milkmaids (see the first act of many operettas). But in the Dirge we hear, as in other music by this composer, the wailing of an oppressed race, not any selfish expression of individual grief. Here is music that at times is the cry of agony, as of the persecuted, weeping and groaning by the historic wall, mourning the past glory.

It is the fashion now for the lions of the London press, old and young, to roar their contempt for Saint-Saens and all his works. It is true that this composer was an eclaetic; he had a great gift for assimilation; he could write at will in the manner of any preceding musician of genius; but he, too, was endowed with great gifts; notably a singular clarity in thought and expression; a keen sense of logical construction and development, also of the value of economy in the use of orchestral resources; a fine taste and an elegance peculiar to him. This symphony with the organ is surely among the best of his many compositions. Though it is nearly 40 years old, it is still fresh and vigorous. While musicians may well admire its structure, though they may wish that the last section were not so long drawn out; that there were not an anticipation of the one great climax, the people hear this music gladly. The performance was engrossing by its beauty and strength. The concert will be repeated on Saturday night. The program for the concerts of next week, as it is now announced is as follows: Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello [illegible]; Strauss A[illegible] Alpine [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

INFORMATION OBSCURED

1925

SEDGWICK CONCERT STAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, has recently returned from a trip to Canada where their concerts were greeted as "the affair of the season" wherever they went. The orchestra will play in Hartford, February 7

E

...he rest of the cou... development of music? Perhaps we may take pride in the success which attends the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concerts offered, almost every few weeks, by the best artists available. But it is not so easy to find that Providence makes any constructive contribution to the program of music which is supported by the country at large to an extent perhaps unrealized by many people.

The Civic Development Department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States makes our shortcoming painfully apparent when it points out that there are today 49 symphony orchestras maintained in American cities. And lest we think that these are all in larger cities than Providence, it is illuminating to learn that Boulder, Colorado, with a population of 10,989, supports its own symphony orchestra. Again, there is Denver, with a population only slightly larger than Providence, with its magnificent civic outdoor auditorium in which musical feasts are a frequent occurrence. Indeed the Denver Civic Orchestra maintains its own training school for players. The municipal opera in St. Louis is famous; Baltimore is experimenting with low cost admission tickets; little Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, has won world-wide recognition for its annual Bach Festival. Nearer home, the Worcester Music Festival shows what a city of 200,000 can do.

Far from contributing to the musical progress of America, Providence does not even show a respectable auditorium in which to hold the concerts of visiting musicians. How many Providence people have groaned with shame at the shabby old barn on South Main street where we have to welcome talent often worthy of an artistic and beautiful background for their efforts.

So long as Providence puts up with Infantry Hall instead of putting up for an auditorium worthy of a city of its size and supposed culture, we shall have to be content with pointing, with what pride we can muster, to our purchases of ...os and talking machines.

TURN ... 205 for
Dec. Notice ... WERE LEFT
OF THIS PA...

By Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The Greatest Man of the Quarter Century Is Einstein"

AMERICAN Dec

THE quarter-century now ending has changed the world we live in so radically that the year 1900 appears to us as a far-away era of touching naivete, an epoch when we were playing toys and thought they were real things.

The dreams of Jules Verne and H. G. Wells are overshadowed by actual technical wonders. The yearnings of Leonardo da Vinci—to fly like a bird—has become reality. And a boy of 1925 trying to describe a bird says: "It looks like an airplane."

Serge Koussevitzky

The moving pictures created a new art of unheard of possibilities. It seems miraculous to those who remember the first attempts of the cinema.

In the mid-ocean we are able to correspond with our friends on either side. In New York we can hear a concert from San Francisco. We can "radio" pictures and autographs. In my childhood I used to be fond of fantastic stories—but I do not recall any one so bold as the fantastic story of the year 1925 A. D.

The war swept over the world; a series of revolutions followed. The idea of monarchism and absolutism perished. But the great spirit of Liberty endured through the years of struggle and held decisive victory at the very threshold of the quarter-century in the treaties of Locarno. The idea of the United States of Europe has been born.

The greatest man of the passing quarter-century is, to my mind, Albert Einstein. He summarized all that had been done before; he abolished absolutism in the world of ideas; he gave the key-word, Relativity. The time is relative; the motion is relative. If I cannot seize it from the scientific point of view, I can feel it by intuition.

My native country suffered fullest measure during the years past. I have faith in the resurrection of Russia; she is in the process of resurrection already—despite all the sufferings, despite all the chains.

In my art, in music, the change was not less spectacular. Musical craftsmanship has attained its heights; young men armed with every contrivance of a super-technique have produced dozens of musical compositions of remarkable ability. Stravinsky, the idol of the youth and the most outstanding figure in the art of today, truly represents the spirit of the epoch. One of his fervent admirers, a French musician, wrote to Stravinsky from the front that in the shattering roar of the war he actually recognized the moods of Stravinsky's "Sacre do Printemps."

Henry Wood from Purcell's works.

Rather less interesting was Ernest Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Despite Mr. Koussevitzky's direction and the presence of Jesus Sanroma at the piano, the concerto proved somewhat of a disappointment. It seemed a slightly chaotic composition, cast in the eighteenth century form, but highly modernized.

These novelties concluded, Mr Koussevitzky passed on to the sweep and roll of Wagner's "Prelude to Parsifal." The entire second part of the program was taken up with Saint-Saens "Symphony in C minor," a work in which syncopated rhythm and a sort of tricky gayety have their place side by side with the more serious passages.

An examination of the subscription lists to the newly added series of Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, has led to an interesting disclosure.

The hour for this new series was set at 3:15, largely for the convenience of out-of-town patrons. Before the opening concert on the first of December the series was within a few seats of being fully subscribed. A classification of the records yields the following results: Subscribers living in the city of Boston, 26 per cent.; subscribers living in the suburbs of Boston, 59 per cent.; subscribers from outlying cities and towns, 15 per cent. In other words, three-quarters of this new public of the Boston Symphony Orchestra live outside of Boston and a considerable number of this visiting public come from about seventy-five cities or towns of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

The orchestra will give its second concert of the Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8.

10

43

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Globe

Purcell, Saint-Saens and Wagner Also on Program

Dec. 25

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings, with piano obbligato, was the chief novelty on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. A trumpet voluntary by Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Saint-Saens' symphony with organ, were the other numbers.

This afternoon concert in the regular series shifted to Thursday to avoid falling on Christmas Day, was heard by an audience including an unusual number of occasional visitors to these affairs. Subscribers had obviously given away tickets with unwonted prodigality. The rush seats were not all taken.

Mr Koussevitzky conducted with less zest than usual until the sonorous climax in the last movement of Saint-Saens' symphony, which he made vividly rhythmic.

The Purcell voluntary proved noisy and ineffective. The fault lay not in the music itself, which is an interesting specimen of 17th century routine, but in the arrangement for orchestra and the conducting. The trumpet part is apparently of almost unplayable difficulty, as is the case with the original trumpet parts to many works by Bach and Handel. It was performed yesterday with obvious and painful effort. The organ failed to blend gracefully with the other instruments. All the lines of the music were blurred. Mr Koussevitzky tried to redeem the performance by harsh accentuation and crude volume of tone, which only made matters worse.

Bloch's concerto grosso, composed last year and lately published, is an interesting free treatment of old musical forms. The piece is less original in harmony, less intense in mood than most of Bloch. Much of the music is derivative, not a little of it perilously near banality. But it is cleverly and attractively written. The performance was satisfactory, hardly more.

Nor was Mr Koussevitzky in the vein for Wagner. The Prelude to "Parsifal" is a feebler thing than that to "Tristan" or than that to "Die Meistersinger." Yesterday it was dragged out, and occasionally the orchestra was overdriven, not merely at the climax. Mr Koussevitzky's conducting varies with his moods, and yesterday was not one of his good days.

Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony he no doubt intended, when he wrote it, for his masterpiece. And that is what it has turned out to be. It holds a place in the orchestral repertory, something only the symphonies of Franck and of Chausson among his compatriots and contemporaries have done. This music is smoothly written, facile, yet not without solidity, and in an acceptable imitation of the grand manner.

Saint-Saens does not go in for extended development, he prefers to write more as Brahms wrote variations. There is a main theme which in various transformations keeps recurring. He has eliminated many of the conventional repeats. His orchestra, beside the organ, includes most of the instruments Wagner had used which are not found in Beethoven's scores. It appears that he was the first symphonic composer to venture to extend the orchestra beyond what Beethoven had employed. So great and so stupid is the force of tradition.

One felt again yesterday that the present seating of the orchestra is not as effective as most of the former arrangements. The second violins are often inaudible, for one thing. One felt again that Mr Koussevitzky does not care as much as one wishes he did for quality of tone. He strives not so much for purity of tone as for sonority. The brass especially is allowed and even compelled to play far too thoatily, and far too loudly. As an instrument the orchestra now often resembles a fine piano which is at the mercy of a relentless virtuoso.

P. R.

Boston Herald
Dec. 25 15

SYMPHONY GIVES TENTH CONCERT

Feature of Its Program Is Bloch "Concerto Grosso" for Strings and Piano

PLAYED FOR FIRST TIME IN THIS CITY

BY PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet Voluntary for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ; Bloch, Concerto Grosso for strings and piano obligato; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Symphony, C minor, No. 3.

The pieces by Purcell and Bloch were played for the first time in Boston. Some were surprised to find on the day before Christmas the Prelude to "Parsifal" on the program; music that is associated with the Passion of our Lord rather than with the Divine Birth and the rejoicing of the heavenly host. The music itself seemed very old, if not stale. Hearing it yesterday—the performance was not an impressive one—one could not help recalling the answer of George Moore, who was asked at Bayreuth years ago how he liked the opera as a whole: "Holy water in a German beer-barrel."

It would be interesting to know where Sir Henry Wood found the theme of Purcell's Voluntary or Prelude, or Interlude. Sir Henry has a way of selecting pages from the great English composer's works, "editing" them, and putting them together for a Suite. This Voluntary is short and stirring; music for the entrance of a Tsar about to be crowned, a warrior returning triumphant and exulting in his chariot; a royal banqueting hall, as when "Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his Lords, and drank wine before the thousand." The solo trumpet passages were brilliantly played by Mr. Mager.

Bloch's Concerto was composed in 1924-5, and first performed in Cleveland last June. It is described as written in 18th century form, but "modernized." Is it possible that this composer is harking back to the old form of Corelli, Handel Bach, just as Stravinsky has of late forsaken Russia and its folk tunes, foresworn the paganism that inspired "Sacre du Printemps" and is adapting himself, or trying to adapt himself, to formulas and the idiom of the 18th century.

Felicien David was so fascinated by the Orient—witness his "Desert" and his "Lalla Rook"—that as he persisted in this vein, Auber wished that the worthy David would dismount from his camel. Is it possible that Mr. Bloch no longer recalls the ghetto and the pogroms, the glory of Solomon's court and the waters of Babylon? That he no longer is interested in Jezebel as the heroine of an opera? Much of his music, perhaps the best of it, has been charged with the Hebraic spirit. At times he has been as eloquent and impassioned as any wild and shaggy prophet denouncing the cities of Israel's foes; or crying "Woe," as he saw the haughty daughters of Zion walking with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing and making a tinkling with their feet.

Only in the Dirge of this concerto do we find the Bloch of the "Jewish Cycle," and to us this Dirge is the most original, the most compelling portion of the work. The first movement seems a rather labored imitation of old masters. The Finale, in fugue form, has chiefly academic interest. The Pastorale is charming, not at all in the conventional manner, that wishes to remind one of lush meadows, shepherds piping, happy farmers with ribboned hats and rakes dancing with milkmaids (see the first act of many operettas). But in the Dirge we hear, as in other music by this composer, the wailing of an oppressed race, not any selfish expression of individual grief. Here is music that at times is the cry of agony, as of the persecuted, weeping and groaning by the historic wall, mourning the past glory.

It is the fashion now for the lions of the London press, old and young, to roar their contempt for Saint-Saens and all his works. It is true that this composer was an eclaetic; he had a great gift for assimilation; he could write at will in the manner of any preceding musician of genius; but he, too, was endowed with great gifts; notably a singular clarity in thought and expression; a keen sense of logical construction and development, also of the value of economy in the use of orchestral resources; a fine taste and an elegance peculiar to him. This symphony with the organ is surely among the best of his many compositions. Though it is nearly 40 years old, it is still fresh and vigorous. While musicians may well admire its structure, though they may wish that the last section were not so long drawn out; that there were not an anticipation of the one great climax, the people hear this music gladly. The performance was engrossing by its beauty and strength. The concert will be repeated on Saturday night. The program for the concerts of next week, as it is now announced is as follows: Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello (...); Strauss A... Alpine ...

158

HOLIDAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Boston Post

Purcell Gets Place on List for First Time

Dec. 25

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although no music specifically related to Christmas appears upon it, the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky made for the Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tomorrow evening is by no means inappropriate to the holiday season.

PURCELL'S TRUMPET PIECE

For truly joyous beginning there is a Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, transcribed by Sir Henry Wood, while a note of fitting solemnity is sounded in the Prelude to "Parsifal," and each of these moods is further emphasized in Saint-Saens' Symphony, for orchestra with organ. Nor is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra with piano obbligato, a modernizing of an ancient form and style, unsuited to the occasion.

Yesterday for the first time the name of England's greatest composer appeared upon a programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This noisy arrangement of Sir Henry's, for three trumpets, threo trombones, kettledrums, side-drum and organ, is less to be admired than Mr. Stokowski's version of this or of a markedly similar piece played last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra and more discreetly scored for three trumpets, oboes, bassoons and strings. Be that as it may, however, the music itself was good to hear yesterday and in the brilliant first trumpet part Mr. Mager was granted rare opportunity to display his skill in florid playing.

Bloch's Concerto Pleases

Likewise heard for the first time in Boston, Bloch's Concerto Grosso proved a very different piece from that com
Viola and Orchestra
In out-ve.
rend ain ue

is at once intellectually stimulating and emotionally stirring. It may be said again that Bloch is a contemporary composer whose every utterance is masterly.

With Jesus Sanroma to carry the piano part the Concerto was finely played by all concerned.

Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony

Following upon this honest, forthright music and upon the Prelude to "Parisfal," which yesterday received a profoundly impressive performance, the huge machine that is Saint-Saens' C-minor Symphony seemed more than ever a contrived and artificial music. Nevertheless, for all its smug religiosity that smacks of Gounod and its grandiloquence that out-Liszts Liszt, this Symphony, especially when played with the euphony and brilliance that marked the performance of yesterday, is not unagreeable to hear. Saint-Saens in this particular instance had nothing of great moment to impart, but he says his say with an adriotness, a sureness of touch, an infallible sense of musical and in- ... that even after

---

SER Advertiser SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1925

ALPINE SYMPHONY HAS BELATED BOSTON DEBUT

Richard Strauss' musical travelogue, otherwise known as the "Alpine Symphony," made its Hub debut yesterday at the Symphony matinee.

After even the first hearing anyone could guess why Dr. Muck decided to welcome it back in 1916, when orchestras outside of Boston were playing it. But for the fact that it is played without intermission, going on and on for an hour, it would probably have been heard by a gradually shrinking audience yesterday. Dr. Strauss is a prodigious person, but when he wrote this "Alpine Symphony," he was often nodding.

The musical hike takes the audience from sunrise to sunset through the forest and over the mountains, with stops at brook, waterfall and glacier. The inevitable thunderstorm comes fortunately toward the close of day, when the hikers are only too content to sit down in the nearest cave. On the whole the storm is the most vivid feature of the excursion.

Strauss writes with consummate cleverness, but not in this instance with any particular flights of imagination. The woods have Wagnerian echoes. There are tiresome moments, as if the merry mountaineers were worried by the footing. It is not Strauss at his best. In fact, it is rather high-class movie music.

Much more delightful, all in all, was old Johann Sebastian Bach's classic third suite in D major, with the seraphic second movement air; a work faultlessly led by Mr. Koussevitzky.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

"An Alpine Symphony" Heard for First Time Here

Dec. 19

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "An Alpine Symphony," published in 1915, was played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston. The war kept us from hearing this music until Stravinsky had definitely taken Strauss' place as the leading purveyor of orchestral novelties and representative of the latest thing in music in the minds of that dilettanti always eager, like the Athenians of old, for some new thing.

A brilliant performance, of deafening sonority, was greeted with remarkably enthusiastic applause. The audience waited at the end of the concert to recall Mr Koussevitzky thrice and bring the players to their feet.

Since Strauss' piece lasts about three-quarters of an hour, played without pause, Mr Koussevitzky put only one other number on the program, Bach's beautiful suite in D major, the one containing the familiar air, wrongly known as "for the G string." This music was charmingly played, but the audience, like all popular audiences, did not like Bach, and applauded tepidly.

"An Alpine Symphony" is not a symphony in the usual sense of the word at all; it is not a motion picture in tones, constructed musically after the fashion of an act in a Wagnerian music drama, with recurrent "leading motives." The story told by the descriptive titles put by Strauss above the separate sections of the printed score is of a day spent by a hero (possibly the composer himself) in climbing among the Alps. The ascent is begun while it is still night. Sunrise, wandering through woodland, up to the beautiful mountain pastures which are in the strict sense of the word the "Alps," venturing on a glacier, the summit, a mist, and then a thunderstorm during the descent, sunset, and again night, complete the picture.

Strauss' other and earlier tone poems have taught one to expect of him a megalomaniac passion for sheer volume of tone, and a thoroughly Teutonic attention to every detail in the complex pattern of his score. With the exception of a single theme in "Don Juan" and a couple more in "Till Eulenspiegel," he has never hit upon the unforgettable bits of tune out of which a Wagner can spin and weave his grandiose musical structures.

Strauss has every musical gift save only the one most needful, thematic originality. There is not in "An Alpine Symphony" even a single really great theme. The musical ideas in the work are all derivative and often commonplace.

Strauss, by his marvellous use of harmonies, and his uncanny control of all the possible sonorities and novel tone blendings in instrumentation, manages to suggest with genuine poetic power some of the sights and sounds he would depict. His thunderstorm is more imaginative, as well as more lifelike, than the one in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The music intended to deal with Night is also vividly imagined. By flooding the ear with slow sustained harmonies from full-voiced brass choirs, and turning his phrases majestically, he stimulates adroitly at climaxes genuine musical sublimity. But the true sublime is not in his power to attain.

It is curious how clearly this music composed in the year of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring", dates from the 1890s. Strauss marks definitely the end of an epoch, whether or not Stravinsky turns out to mark the beginning of another period. The epoch of which Strauss is se, the has te only nusical red on young fervor canted.
en and nost of rs, just ruined o came ht have d never sic. He ted his imental deinem
d other-
P. R.

Herald

TURDAY, DECEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY GIVES STRAUSS 'ALPINE'

Ninth Concert Is Eloquent and Brilliant Performance

BACH'S SUITE ALSO ON FINE PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Bach's Suite, D major, No. 3, and Richard Strauss's "Alpina" Symphony.

This symphony was first produced at Berlin ten years ago. Although it has been performed in several cities of the United States (in three in 1916), it was heard in Boston yesterday for the first time.

Reuben Pettingill, the hero of the Artemus Ward's story "Pyrotechny," was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife, with which he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. "He carved excellent soldiers also."

"I remember his masterpiece," says Artemus; "it was 'Napoleon crossing the Alps.' Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps. An Alp or two more would have improved it; but, as a whole it was a wonderful piece of work, and what a wonderful piece of work is a wooden man, when his legs and arms are all right."

Strauss is an extraordinarily skilful elderly man in the use of an orchestra; is his "Alpino" Symphony short of Alps?

In other words did he attempt to accomplish the impossible?

He has composed a panoramic, musical moving picture of the Alps. The audience is supposed to climb, personally conducted by good Mr. Strauss as guide—though the audience is not securely roped to him. It starts in time to see the sunrise, enters the woods—yesterday it seemed as if the guide and his followers would never come out of them—wanders by the brookside, enjoys the sight of a pretty waterfall, admires the scenery, enters the mountain pasture and hears the cow bells, plunges through underbrush, sees from on high a glorious view, is alarmed by the hush of nature before a terrific thunderstorm, descends, arriving safely below in time for the evening meal, looking at the setting sun, and, later, hearing the voices of the night.

Strauss neglected, unfortunately, to allude musically to the celebrated Edelweiss, nor did he, like Baedeker, point out places of rest and refreshment on the way that are "well recommended," with moderate prices.

In a way this symphony reminds one of "The Plains: Ode Symphonie," by Jabez Tarbox, which was reviewed at length by the late John Phoenix. He began his masterly article: "The symphonie opens upon the wide and boundless plains in longitude 115 degrees W., latitude 35 degrees, 21 minutes, .03 seconds and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitt river. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long (topographically) drawn note from an E-flat clarinet. . . . A few notes on the piccolo calls the attention to a solitary antelope picking up mescal beans in the foreground."

The "Alpine" symphony is a curious mixture of the ideal and the realistic; of the lofty and the commonplace; of platitudes thinly hidden by gorgeous orchestral dress; of passages conspicuous for genuine beauty; of pages that are mere padding. As is not uncommon with Strauss, the thematic material is often common, or vulgar, if one prefers that word.

Yet what composer living but Strauss could have written the superb pages of the "vision" by which the hearer looks from the summit towards the four quarters of the earth? Or the exquisite measures, simple measures, given to a few strings?

Mr. Finck thinks that Strauss may have caught the idea of his "Waterfall" music from hearing "the Cascade of Jewels" in the opera "Ariane and Blue Beard." We have no proof that Strauss ever saw the opera or the score. He is wholly competent to find music for any waterfall. (It is strange that he has never written music for Niagara or for the wonderful African falls.) His thunder storm is impressive, if one cares for that sort of thing; it is thunderously amusing, and one likes to see the man turning the crank of the wind machine; but the ominous hush before the tempest, with the suggestion of frightened, questioning birds, is, indeed, poetic and at the same time musical. Nor should the fanfare of horns announcing "the entrance into the forest" be forgotten, though this fanfare might be for any chase, forest or no forest.

Straus for once wrote his own program. What does he think of an earnest commentator, the writer of a guide-book to the symphony, who pointed out that "the cold air of the glacier is indicated by a transformation of the 'waterfall' theme, with new material?"

The "Alpine" symphony is not a "masterpiece." As a work of art it is not to be compared with "Tille Eulanspiegel," "Salome" or "Rosenkavalier." Some of the pages of the symphony might take the place of a lecturer in a "Travel Talk of the Glories of the Alps," though the audience would then recognize the fact that no music can reproduce the emotion of one gazing on the awful majesty of the Jungfrau or the wildness of the Diablerets; nor can one paint in tones sunrise and sunset, whether he employs ingeniously an ascending or descending scale.

No, Strauss, lake Reuben Pettingill with his jack-knife, is extraordinari

---

STRAUSS' "AN ALPINE SYMPHONY"

Post Dec 19

First Hearing of Tone Poem Written in 1915

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"An Alpine Symphony," the last to date of the tone-poems of Richard Strauss, makes the bulk of the programme of yesterday afternoon's and this evening's Symphony Concerts. With it for preface and judicious contrast Mr. Koussevitzky has placed Bach's Suite in D major, that of the beautiful and familiar air for violins.

AMAZINGLY SCORED

More than a decade old is this "Alpine Symphony," and, although it is hardly one of its composer's more important productions, it was high time that we of Boston made its acquaintance. To Mr. Koussevitzky, then, all praise both for his initiative and for the enormous pains that he must obviously have taken to bring this long and elaborate score to so finished and so eloquent a performance.

To speak first of the more successful portions of this colossal tone-poem, both the passage, of a fine breadth, that occurs when the traveller who is protagonist of the piece has reached the mountain-top, and the long and musing epilogue are of the greater if not the greatest Strauss. Highly effective as tone-painting, though of a lower order of musical invention, are the beginning and the end of the work, respectively suggestive of sunrise and sunset, the corruscatingly brilliant music of the waterfall and the exciting, dynamically overpowering storm in which such extra-musical aids as wind-machine and thunder-machine are employed to swell the tumult. Between times come numerous other episodes; some of passing interest, others that represent Strauss at his feeblest.

An amazing exercise in instrumentation, remarkable in this respect even for Strauss, and for the most part

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

JAN 3 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Next Tuesday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the second concert of the new historical series of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. WORLD

JAN 3 1926

Boston Symphony in Two Concerts Here

"An Alpine Symphony," by Richard Strauss, will be a feature of the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which are to take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This tone poem of nature, Strauss's last orchestral work on a large scale, was composed about ten years ago. It was then performed in New York and subsequently forgotten in the preoccupation of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 3 1926

* * *

GOOSSENS IS BUSY

After conducting six concerts of the New York Symphony, Eugene Goossens will act as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in three performances. The remainder of the season he will devote to the Rochester Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 3 1926

Wagnerian Table Talk

By EDWARD CUSHING

GENERAL MANAGER GATTI-CASAZZA is feasting us this week to a little more Wagner: the season's first "Die Walkure" has been announced for Thursday evening

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 3 1926

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Serge Koussewitsky will conduct. The programs are as follows:

Thursday evening, Jan. 7:

Purcell ....Trumpet Voluntary
Copland............Music for the Theater
Strauss ....Ein Alpensinfonie

Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9:

Mendelssohn ...."Italian" Symphony
Bloch..........Concerto Grosso for Strings
Wagner..........Excerpts from "Tristan"

There will be no soloist at either of these concerts. The Copland Suite recently had a first New York performance at a concert given by the League of Composers. The Strauss work has not been performed for a number of seasons. Bloch's Concerto is a novelty to New York. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted it at a recent concert in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 3 1926

The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, will pay its second visit of the season this week. Thursday night's Carnegie Hall program, to be repeated Friday in Brooklyn, includes Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theater," played here recently by the League of Composers and Richard Strauss's Alpine Symphony. This was composed in 1914, played here in 1916 and then virtually forgotten here until July, 1924, when Fritz Reiner gave it at a Stadium concert.

Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty of Saturday afternoon is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings with piano, composed in the West in 1924-'25 and already played in Los Angeles, Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston. While adopting an eighteenth century form, Mr. Bloch does not confine himself wholly to a form of that period.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 8 1926

Boston Symphony to Play Work by Brooklyn Composer at Second Academy of Music Concert January 8.

A notable novelty on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second Brooklyn concert, scheduled for Friday evening of this week at the Academy of Music (under Institute auspices), will be Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," recently heard at the season's first concert by the League of Composers. Mr. Copland is a young composer of Brooklyn, and a student for three years at the American School of Music at Fontainebleau. He has written a number of works, of which his Symphony for Orchestra and Organ was played in New York (under Walter Damrosch) and in Boston (under Serge Koussevitzky) last season. "Music for the Theatre" is in the modern, American musical idiom. Its movements include—Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue.

At Friday's concert, Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce for the first time in Brooklyn, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, Op. 64. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has written, first appeared at the beginning of the war and was then performed in Germany, American and elsewhere. It was revived by Fritz Reiner at the 1924 Stadium Concerts and by Mr. Koussevitzky recently in Boston, where it met with instant success and was repeated by general request. The "Alpine" is a nature symphony and has the following sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night—Sunrise—The Ascent—Entering the Woods—Wandering by the Brook—At the Waterfall—Scenery—On Flowering Paths—The Mountain Pasture—Off the Path Through Thicket and Underbrush—On the Glacier—Vision—The Fog Rises—The Sun is Gradually Obscured—Elegy—Stillness Before the Storm—The Thunderstorm—Descent—Sunset — Sou
—Night.

The programme's opening n ber is Purcell's "Trumpet V tary," arranged by Sir Henry V for organ, trumpets, trombones rums

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
JAN 2 1926

ONCERTS
OPERA FO
NEXT WEE

HOLIDAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

158

Boston Post

Purcell Gets Place on List for First Time

De. 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although no music specifically related to Christmas appears upon it, the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky made for the Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tomorrow evening is by no means inappropriate to the holiday season.

PURCELL'S TRUMPET PIECE

For truly joyous beginning there is a Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, transcribed by Sir Henry Wood, while a note of fitting solemnity is sounded in the Prelude to "Parsifal," and each of these moods is further emphasized in Saint-Saens' Symphony, for orchestra with organ. Nor is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra with piano obbligato, a modernizing of an ancient form and style, unsuited to the occasion.

Yesterday for the first time the name of England's greatest composer appeared upon a programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This noisy arrangement of Sir Henry's, for three trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, side-drum and organ, is less to be admired than Mr. Stokowski's version of this or of a markedly similar piece played last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra and more discreetly scored for three trumpets, oboes, bassoons and strings. Be that as it may, however, the music itself was good to hear yesterday and in the brilliant first trumpet part Mr. Mager was granted rare opportunity to display his skill in florid playing.

Bloch's Concerto Pleases

Likewise heard for the first time in Boston, Bloch's Concerto Grosso proved a very different piece from that com[illegible] Viola and Orchestra In [illegible] out- [illegible] ve. [illegible] re- [illegible] nd [illegible] ain [illegible] ue

is at once intellectually stimulating and emotionally stirring. It may be said again that Bloch is a contemporary composer whose every utterance is masterly.

With Jesus Sanroma to carry the piano part the Concerto was finely played by all concerned.

Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony

Following upon this honest, forthright music and upon the Prelude to "Parisfal," which yesterday received a profoundly impressive performance, the huge machine that is Saint-Saens' C-minor Symphony seemed more than ever a contrived and artificial music. Nevertheless, for all its smug religiosity that smacks of Gounod and its grandiloquence that out-Liszts Liszt, this Symphony, especially when played with the euphony and brilliance that marked the performance of yesterday, is not unagreeable to hear. Saint-Saens in this particular instance had nothing of great moment to impart, but he says his say with an adriotness, a sureness of touch, an infallible sense of musical and in[illegible] even after

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

Advertiser SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1925

ALPINE SYMPHONY HAS BELATED BOSTON DEBUT

Richard Strauss' musical travelogue, otherwise known as the "Alpine Symphony," made its Hub debut yesterday at the Symphony matinee.

After even the first hearing anyone could guess why Dr. Muck decided to welcome it back in 1916, when orchestras outside of Boston were playing it. But for the fact that it is played without intermission, going on and on for an hour, it would probably have been heard by a gradually shrinking audience yesterday. Dr. Strauss is a prodigious person, but when he wrote this "Alpine Symphony," he was often nodding.

The musical hike takes the audience from sunrise to sunset through the forest and over the mountains, with stops at brook, waterfall and glacier. The inevitable thunderstorm comes fortunately toward the close of day, when the hikers are only too content to sit down in the nearest cave. On the whole the storm is the most vivid feature of the excursion.

Strauss writes with consummate cleverness, but not in this instance with any particular flights of imagination. The woods have Wagnerian echoes. There are tiresome moments, as if the merry mountaineers were worried by the footing. It is not Strauss at his best. In fact, it is rather high-class movie music.

Much more delightful, all in all, was old Johann Sebastian Bach's classic third suite in D major, with the seraphic second movement air; a work faultlessly led by Mr. Koussevitzky.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

"An Alpine Symphony" Heard for First Time Here

Dec. 19

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "An Alpine Symphony," published in 1915, was played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston. The war kept us from hearing this music until Stravinsky had definitely taken Strauss' place as the leading purveyor of orchestral novelties and representative of the latest thing in music in the minds of that dilettanti always eager, like the Athenians of old, for some new thing.

A brilliant performance, of deafening sonority, was greeted with remarkably enthusiastic applause. The audience waited at the end of the concert to recall Mr Koussevitzky thrice and bring the players to their feet.

Since Strauss' piece lasts about three-quarters of an hour, played without pause, Mr Koussevitzky put only one other number on the program, Bach's beautiful suite in D major, the one containing the familiar air, wrongly known as "for the G string." This music was charmingly played, but the audience, like all popular audiences, did not like Bach, and applauded tepidly.

"An Alpine Symphony" is not a symphony in the usual sense of the word at all; it is not a motion picture in tones, constructed musically after the fashion of an act in a Wagnerian music drama, with recurrent "leading motives." The story told by the descriptive titles put by Strauss above the separate sections of the printed score is of a day spent by a hero (possibly the composer himself) in climbing among the Alps. The ascent is begun while it is still night. Sunrise, wandering through woodland, up to the beautiful mountain pastures which are in the strict sense of the word the "Alps," venturing on a glacier, the summit, a mist, and then a thunderstorm during the descent, sunset, and again night, complete the picture.

Strauss' other and earlier tone poems have taught one to expect of him a megalomaniac passion for sheer volume of tone, and a thoroughly Teutonic attention to every detail in the complex pattern of his score. With the exception of a single theme in "Don Juan" and a couple more in "Till Eulenspiegel," he has never hit upon the unforgettable bits of tune out of which a Wagner can spin and weave his grandiose musical structures.

Strauss has every musical gift save only the one most needful, thematic originality. There is not in "An Alpine Symphony" even a single really great theme. The musical ideas in the work are all derivative and often commonplace.

Strauss, by his marvellous use of harmonies, and his uncanny control of all the possible sonorities and novel tone blendings in instrumentation, manages to suggest with genuine poetic power some of the sights and sounds he would depict. His thunderstorm is more imaginative, as well as more lifelike, than the one in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The music intended to deal with Night is also vividly imagined. By flooding the ear with slow sustained harmonies from full-voiced brass choirs, and turning his phrases majestically, he stimulates adroitly at climaxes genuine musical sublimity. But the true sublime is not in his power to attain.

It is curious how clearly this music composed in the year of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring", dates from the 1880s. Strauss marks definitely the end of an epoch, whether or not Stravinsky turns out to mark the beginning of another period. The epoch of which Strauss is [illegible] se, the [illegible] has [illegible] e only [illegible] nusical [illegible] ed on [illegible] young [illegible] fervor [illegible] canted. [illegible] en and [illegible] nost of [illegible] rs, just [illegible] ruined [illegible] o came [illegible] ht have [illegible] d never [illegible] sic. He [illegible] ted his [illegible] imental [illegible] deinem [illegible] d other-

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 3 1926

Wagnerian Table Talk

By EDWARD CUSHING

GENERAL MANAGER GATTI-CASAZZA is feasting us this week to a little more Wagner: the season's first "Die Walkure" has [illegible]nced for Thursday evening [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 3 1926

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Serge Koussewitsky will conduct. The programs are as follows:

Thursday evening, Jan. 7:

Purcell	Trumpet Voluntary
Copland	Music for the Theater
Strauss	Ein Alpensinfonie

Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9:

Mendelssohn	"Italian" Symphony
Bloch	Concerto Grosso for Strings
Wagner	Excerpts from "Tristan"

There will be no soloist at either of these concerts. The Copland Suite recently had a first New York performance at a concert given by the League of Composers. The Strauss work has not been performed for a number of seasons. Bloch's Concerto is a novelty to New York. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted it at a recent concert in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 3 1926

The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, will pay its second visit of the season this week. Thursday night's Carnegie Hall program, to be repeated Friday in Brooklyn, includes Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theater," played here recently by the League of Composers and Richard Strauss's Alpine Symphony. This was composed in 1914, played here in 1916 and then virtually forgotten here until July, 1924, when Fritz Reiner gave it at a Stadium concert.

Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty of Saturday afternoon is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings with piano, composed in the West in 1924-'25 and already played in Los Angeles, Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston. While adopting an eighteenth century form, Mr. Bloch does not confine himself wholly to a form of that period.

JAN 3 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Next Tuesday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the second concert of the new historical series of the [illegible] will

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. WORLD

JAN 3 1926

Boston Symphony in Two Concerts Here

"An Alpine Symphony," by Richard Strauss, will be a feature of the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which are to take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This tone poem [illegible] nature, Strauss's last orchestral work on a large scale, was composed about ten years ago. It was then performed in New York and subsequently forgotten in the preoccupation of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN [illegible]

* * *

GOOSSENS IS BUSY

After conducting six concerts of the New York Symphony, Eugene Goossens will act as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in three performances. The remainder of [illegible] season he will devote to the [illegible]ster Orchestra.

Herald

TURDAY, DECEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY GIVES STRAUSS 'ALPINE'

Ninth Concert Is Eloquent and Brilliant Performance

BACH'S SUITE ALSO ON FINE PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Bach's Suite, D major, No. 3, and Richard Strauss's "Alpina" Symphony.

This symphony was first produced at Berlin ten years ago. Although it has been performed in several cities of the United States (in three in 1916), it was heard in Boston yesterday for the first time.

Reuben Pettingill, the hero of the Artemus Ward's story "Pyrotechny," was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife, with which he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. "He carved excellent soldiers also."

"I remember his masterpiece," says Artemus; "it was 'Napoleon crossing the Alps.' Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps. An Alp or two more would have improved it; but, as a whole it was a wonderful piece of work, and what a wonderful piece of work is a wooden man, when his legs and arms are all right."

Strauss is an extraordinarily skilful elderly man in the use of an orchestra; is his "Alpino" Symphony short of Alps?

In other words did he attempt to accomplish the impossible?

He has composed a panoramic, musical moving picture of the Alps. The audience is supposed to climb, personally conducted by good Mr. Strauss as guide—though the audience is not securely roped to him. It starts in time to see the sunrise, enters the woods—yesterday it seemed as if the guide and his followers would never come out of them—wanders by the brookside, enjoys the sight of a pretty waterfall, admires the scenery, enters the mountain pasture and hears the cow bells, plunges through underbrush, sees from on high a glorious view, is alarmed by the hush of nature before a terrific thunderstorm, descends, arriving safely below in time for the evening meal, looking at the setting sun, and, later, hearing the voices of the night.

Strauss neglected, unfortunately, to allude musically to the celebrated Edelweiss, nor did he, like Baedeker, point out places of rest and refreshment on the way that are "well recommended," with moderate prices.

In a way this symphony reminds one of "The Plains: Ode Symphonie," by Jabez Tarbox, which was reviewed at length by the late John Phoenix. He began his masterly article: "The symphonie opens upon the wide and boundless plains in longitude 115 degrees W., latitude 35 degrees, 21 minutes, .03 seconds and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitt river. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long (topographically) drawn note from an E-flat clarinet. . . . A few notes on the piccolo calls the attention to a solitary antelope picking up mescal beans in the foreground."

The "Alpine" symphony is a curious mixture of the ideal and the realistic; of the lofty and the commonplace; of platitudes thinly hidden by gorgeous orchestral dress; of passages conspicuous for genuine beauty; of pages that are mere padding. As is not uncommon with Strauss, the thematic material is often common, or vulgar, if one prefers that word.

Yet what composer living but Strauss could have written the superb pages of the "vision" by which the hearer looks from the summit towards the four quarters of the earth? Or the exquisite measures, simple measures, given to a few strings?

Mr. Finck thinks that Strauss may have caught the idea of his "Waterfall" music from hearing "the Cascade of Jewels" in the opera "Ariane and Blue Beard." We have no proof that Strauss ever saw the opera or the score. He is wholly competent to find music for any waterfall. (It is strange that he has never written music for Niagara or for the wonderful African falls.) His thunder storm is impressive, if one cares for that sort of thing; it is thunderously amusing, and one likes to see the man turning the crank of the wind machine; but the ominous hush before the tempest, with the suggestion of frightened, questioning birds, is, indeed, poetic and at the same time musical. Nor should the fanfare of horns announcing "the entrance into the forest" be forgotten, though this fanfare might be for any chase, forest or no forest.

Straus for once wrote his own program. What does he think of an earnest commentator, the writer of a guidebook to the symphony, who pointed out that "the cold air of the glacier is indicated by a transformation of the 'waterfall' theme, with new material?"

The "Alpine" symphony is not a "masterpiece." As a work of art it is not to be compared with "Tille Eulanspiegel," "Salome" or "Rosenkavalier." Some of the pages of the symphony might take the place of a lecturer in a "Travel Talk of the Glories of the Alps," though the audience would then recognize the fact that no music can reproduce the emotion of one gazing on the awful majesty of the Jungfrau or the wildness of the Diablerets; nor can one paint in tones sunrise and sunset, whether he employs ingenious[illegible] an ascending or descending scale.

No, Strauss, lake Reuben Petting[illegible] with his jack-knife, is extraordinari[illegible]

STRAUSS' "AN ALPINE SYMPHONY"

Post Dec 19

First Hearing of Tone Poem Written in 1915

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"An Alpine Symphony," the last to date of the tone-poems of Richard Strauss, makes the bulk of the programme of yesterday afternoon's and this evening's Symphony Concerts. With it for preface and judicious contrast Mr. Koussevitzky has placed Bach's Suite in D major, that of the beautiful and familiar air for violins.

AMAZINGLY SCORED

More than a decade old is this "Alpine Symphony," and, although it is hardly one of its composer's more important productions, it was high time that we of Boston made its acquaintance. To Mr. Koussevitzky, then, all praise both for his initiative and for the enormous pains that he must obviously have taken to bring this long and elaborate score to so finished and so eloquent a performance.

To speak first of the more successful portions of this colossal tone-poem, both the passage, of a fine breadth, that occurs when the traveller who is protagonist of the piece has reached the mountain-top, and the long and musing epilogue are of the greater if not the greatest Strauss. Highly effective as tone-painting, though of a lower order of musical invention, are the beginning and the end of the work, respectively suggestive of sunrise and sunset, the corruscatingly brilliant music of the waterfall and the exciting, dynamically overpowering storm in which such extra-musical aids as wind-machine and thunder-machine are employed to swell the tumult. Between times come numerous other episodes; some of passing interest, others that represent Strauss at his feeblest.

An amazing exercise in instrumentation, remarkable in this respect even for Strauss, and for the most part

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

Boston Symphony [illegible] Work by [illegible] at Second Brooklyn [illegible] Concert [illegible]

[illegible] Night—Sunrise—The Ascent—Entering the Wood—Wandering by the Brook—At the Waterfall—[illegible] Scenery—On Flowering Paths—The Mountain Pasture—Off the Path Through Thicket and Underbrush—On the Glacier—Vision—The Fog Rises—The Sun is Gradually Obscured—Elegy—Stillness B[illegible]fore the Storm—The Thund[illegible]storm—Descent—Sunset—Sou[illegible] —Night.

The programme's opening n[illegible]ber is Purcell's "Trumpet Vo[illegible]tary," arranged by Sir Henry W[illegible] [illegible]or organ, trumpets, trombones, [illegible]rums.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 19[illegible]

[illegible] of Ernest Bloch, [illegible] this city will be [illegible] that his new suite [illegible] viola was played [illegible] by the Boston Sym[illegible] under the direction [illegible]vitsky. The soloist [illegible] Concerning this [illegible] work, Philip Hale [illegible]s suite is a personal [illegible] a musical photogram [illegible]elf or let us say [illegible]cally psychological [illegible] Ernest Bloch's min[illegible] certain works reveal [illegible] Tchaikovsky, with [illegible]ression, suffering from [illegible] inevitable death, at tim[illegible] despair. Bloch has known pover[illegible] of recognition. And [illegible]braic spirit that blazes [illegible] rages and inspires [illegible] in the books of the

THIS CLIPPING F[illegible]
NEW YORK

JA[illegible]

THE Philadelphia Orc[illegible] direction of Leopol[illegible] play its sixth Carnegie [illegible] Tuesday evening. The [illegible] of the Fifth Symphony [illegible] Loeffler's "Canticle of th[illegible] Povla Frijsh in the [illegible] Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sch[illegible] symphony and the Loef[illegible] heard here for the [illegible] "Scheherazade" music wil[illegible] y the clavilux, with Th[illegible] he keyboard of the instr[illegible] pioneer in the use of [illegible]rt and inventor of the [illegible]osed the visual setting [illegible]orsakoff work.

[illegible] Koussevitzky and the B[illegible] Orchestra will give their [illegible] concerts in New York [illegible] Thursday evening and Sat[illegible] Carnegie Hall. They w[illegible] "Alpine Symphony" at the [illegible]ert and "Music for the Th[illegible] Copland, the American com[illegible] gram will be introduced [illegible] "Voluntary" of Purcell, a[illegible] Henry Wood. The matin[illegible] include Berlioz's overture [illegible] Cellini,' Mendelssohn's [illegible]ny," Bloch's "C[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FRO[illegible]
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
JAN 2 1926

CONCERTS [illegible] OPERA FO[illegible] NEXT WEE[illegible]

[illegible]cipal interest amo[illegible] [illegible] concerts are the app[illegible] [illegible] Casella, the Itali[illegible] [illegible] conductor of th[illegible] [illegible] Orchestra on [illegible] [illegible] the Philadel[illegible] [illegible]tra's programme under [illegible]kowski on Tuesday. [illegible] will play some u[illegible] [illegible] by Monteverdi, D[illegible] nocturnes and his o[illegible]

[illegible] Stokowski will intro[illegible] Symphony of Nikol[illegible]ky, a contemporary [illegible] has written eight of [illegible] unknown here. Pov[illegible] sing the solo part [illegible] [illegible]ffler's new "Canticle [illegible] and Rimsky-K[illegible] [illegible]heherazade" will be g[illegible] [illegible]mas Wilfred's keybo[illegible] [illegible] known as the "cl[illegible] [illegible] outstanding even[illegible] [illegible] are the appearance [illegible] [illegible]ssens at the head of [illegible] Symphony Thursday [illegible] [illegible] Orchestra under [illegible] on Wednesday, Ethel [illegible] [illegible]cting the Philharmon[illegible] [illegible] and the Boston S[illegible] [illegible]erts on Thursday [illegible] featuring Strauss's [illegible]phony at the one a[illegible] [illegible]h's new concerto gro[illegible]

[illegible] more important [illegible] John McCormack [illegible]

HOLIDAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

158

Boston Post

Purcell Gets Place on List for First Time

Dec. 25

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although no music specifically related to Christmas appears upon it, the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky made for the Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tomorrow evening is by no means inappropriate to the holiday season.

PURCELL'S TRUMPET PIECE

For truly joyous beginning there is a Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, transcribed by Sir Henry Wood, while a note of fitting solemnity is sounded in the Prelude to "Parsifal," and each of these moods is further emphasized in Saint-Saens' Symphony, for orchestra with organ. Nor is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra with piano obbligato, a modernizing of an ancient form and style, unsuited to the occasion.

Yesterday for the first time the name of England's greatest composer appeared upon a programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This noisy arrangement of Sir Henry's, for three trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, side-drum and organ, is less to be admired than Mr. Stokowski's version of this or of a markedly similar piece played last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra and more discreetly scored for three trumpets, oboes, bassoons and strings. Be that as it may, however, the music itself was good to hear yesterday and in the brilliant first trumpet part Mr. Mager was granted rare opportunity to display his skill in florid playing.

Bloch's Concerto Pleases

Likewise heard for the first time in Boston, Bloch's Concerto Grosso proved a very different piece from that composer's Suite for Viola and Orchestra performed here a few weeks ago. In this later music Bloch is more outspoken, less cryptic and introspective. He has, in fact, successfully recaptured the Handelian largeness and stride. Even the Dirge has a certain breadth and vigor, and the final Fugue is at once intellectually stimulating and emotionally stirring. It may be said again that Bloch is a contemporary composer whose every utterance is masterly.

With Jesus Sanroma to carry the piano part the Concerto was finely played by all concerned.

Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony

Following upon this honest, forthright music and upon the Prelude to "Parsifal," which yesterday received a profoundly impressive performance, the huge machine that is Saint-Saens' C-minor Symphony seemed more than ever a contrived and artificial music. Nevertheless, for all its smug religiosity that smacks of Gounod and its grandiloquence that out-Liszts Liszt, this Symphony, especially when played with the euphony and brilliance that marked the performance of yesterday, is not unagreeable to hear. Saint-Saens in this particular instance had nothing of great moment to impart, but he says his say with an adroitness, a sureness of touch, an infallible sense of musical and in- [illegible] that even after

---

IN STOCK
Ives Tracks,
Bridges, Tunnels,

Advertiser SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1925

ALPINE SYMPHONY HAS BELATED BOSTON DEBUT

Richard Strauss' musical travelogue, otherwise known as the "Alpine Symphony," made its Hub debut yesterday at the Symphony matinee.

After even the first hearing anyone could guess why Dr. Muck decided to welcome it back in 1916, when orchestras outside of Boston were playing it. But for the fact that it is played without intermission, going on and on for an hour, it would probably have been heard by a gradually shrinking audience yesterday. Dr. Strauss is a prodigious person, but when he wrote this "Alpine Symphony," he was often nodding.

The musical hike takes the audience from sunrise to sunset through the forest and over the mountains, with stops at brook, waterfall and glacier. The inevitable thunderstorm comes fortunately toward the close of day, when the hikers are only too content to sit down in the nearest cave. On the whole the storm is the most vivid feature of the excursion.

Strauss writes with consummate cleverness, but not in this instance with any particular flights of imagination. The woods have Wagnerian echoes. There are tiresome moments, as if the merry mountaineers were worried by the footing. It is not Strauss at his best. In fact, it is rather high-class movie music.

Much more delightful, all in all, was old Johann Sebastian Bach's classic third suite in D major, with the seraphic second movement air; a work faultlessly led by Mr. Koussevitzky.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

"An Alpine Symphony" Heard for First Time Here

Dec. 19

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "An Alpine Symphony," published in 1915, was played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston. The war kept us from hearing this music until Stravinsky had definitely taken Strauss' place as the leading purveyor of orchestral novelties and representative of the latest thing in music in the minds of that dilettanti always eager, like the Athenians of old, for some new thing.

A brilliant performance, of deafening sonority, was greeted with remarkably enthusiastic applause. The audience waited at the end of the concert to recall Mr Koussevitzky thrice and bring the players to their feet.

Since Strauss' piece lasts about three-quarters of an hour, played without pause, Mr Koussevitzky put only one other number on the program, Bach's beautiful suite in D major, the one containing the familiar air, wrongly known as "for the G string." This music was charmingly played, but the audience, like all popular audiences, did not like Bach, and applauded tepidly.

"An Alpine Symphony" is not a symphony in the usual sense of the word at all; it is not a motion picture in tones, constructed musically after the fashion of an act in a Wagnerian music drama, with recurrent "leading motives." The story told by the descriptive titles put by Strauss above the separate sections of the printed score is of a day spent by a hero (possibly the composer himself) in climbing among the Alps. The ascent is begun while it is still night. Sunrise, wandering through woodland, up to the beautiful mountain pastures which are in the strict sense of the word the "Alps," venturing on a glacier, the summit, a mist, and then a thunderstorm during the descent, sunset, and again night, complete the picture.

Strauss' other and earlier tone poems have taught one to expect of him a megalomaniac passion for sheer volume of tone, and a thoroughly Teutonic attention to every detail in the complex pattern of his score. With the exception of a single theme in "Don Juan" and a couple more in "Till Eulenspiegel," he has never hit upon the unforgettable bits of tune out of which a Wagner can spin and weave his grandiose musical structures.

Strauss has every musical gift save only the one most needful, thematic originality. There is not in "An Alpine Symphony" even a single really great theme. The musical ideas in the work are all derivative and often commonplace.

Strauss, by his marvellous use of harmonies, and his uncanny control of all the possible sonorities and novel tone blendings in instrumentation, manages to suggest with genuine poetic power some of the sights and sounds he would depict. His thunderstorm is more imaginative, as well as more lifelike, than the one in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The music intended to deal with Night is also vividly imagined. By flooding the ear with slow sustained harmonies from full-voiced brass choirs, and turning his phrases majestically, he stimulates adroitly at climaxes genuine musical sublimity. But the true sublime is not in his power to attain.

It is curious how clearly this music composed in the year of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring", dates from the 1890s. Strauss marks definitely the end of an epoch, whether or not Stravinsky turns out to mark the beginning of another period. The epoch of which Strauss is [illegible] se, the [illegible] has [illegible] e only [illegible] musical [illegible] red on [illegible] young [illegible] fervor [illegible] canted. [illegible] en and [illegible] nost of [illegible] rs, just [illegible] ruined [illegible] o came [illegible] ht have [illegible] d never [illegible] sic. He [illegible] ted his [illegible] imental [illegible] deinem [illegible] d other-

P. R.

Herald

TURDAY, DECEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY GIVES STRAUSS 'ALPINE'

Ninth Concert Is Eloquent and Brilliant Performance

BACH'S SUITE ALSO ON FINE PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Bach's Suite, D major, No. 3, and Richard Strauss's "Alpina" Symphony.

This symphony was first produced at Berlin ten years ago. Although it has been performed in several cities of the United States (in three in 1916), it was heard in Boston yesterday for the first time.

Reuben Pettingill, the hero of the Artemus Ward's story "Pyrotechny," was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife, with which he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. "He carved excellent soldiers also."

"I remember his masterpiece," says Artemus; "it was 'Napoleon crossing the Alps.' Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps. An Alp or two more would have improved it; but, as a whole it was a wonderful piece of work, and what a wonderful piece of work is a wooden man, when his legs and arms are all right."

Strauss is an extraordinarily skilful elderly man in the use of an orchestra; is his "Alpino" Symphony short of Alps?

In other words did he attempt to accomplish the impossible?

He has composed a panoramic, musical moving picture of the Alps. The audience is supposed to climb, personally conducted by good Mr. Strauss as guide—though the audience is not securely roped to him. It starts in time to see the sunrise, enters the woods—yesterday it seemed as if the guide and his followers would never come out of them—wanders by the brookside, enjoys the sight of a pretty waterfall, admires the scenery, enters the mountain pasture and hears the cow bells, plunges through underbrush, sees from on high a glorious view, is alarmed by the hush of nature before a terrific thunderstorm, descends, arriving safely below in time for the evening meal, looking at the setting sun, and, later, hearing the voices of the night.

Strauss neglected, unfortunately, to allude musically to the celebrated Edelweiss, nor did he, like Baedeker, point out places of rest and refreshment on the way that are "well recommended," with moderate prices.

In a way this symphony reminds one of "The Plains: Ode Symphonie," by Jabez Tarbox, which was reviewed at length by the late John Phoenix. He began his masterly article: "The symphonie opens upon the wide and boundless plains in longitude 115 degrees W., latitude 35 degrees, 21 minutes, .03 seconds and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitt river. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long (topographically) drawn note from an E-flat clarinet. . . . A few notes on the piccolo calls the attention to a solitary antelope picking up mescal beans in the foreground."

The "Alpine" symphony is a curious mixture of the ideal and the realistic; of the lofty and the commonplace; of platitudes thinly hidden by gorgeous orchestral dress; of passages conspicuous for genuine beauty; of pages that are mere padding. As is not uncommon with Strauss, the thematic material is often common, or vulgar, if one prefers that word.

Yet what composer living but Strauss could have written the superb pages of the "vision" by which the hearer looks from the summit towards the four quarters of the earth? Or the exquisite measures, simple measures, given to a few strings?

Mr. Finck thinks that Strauss may have caught the idea of his "Waterfall" music from hearing "the Cascade of Jewels" in the opera "Ariane and Blue Beard." We have no proof that Strauss ever saw the opera or the score. He is wholly competent to find music for any waterfall. (It is strange that he has never written music for Niagara or for the wonderful African falls.) His thunder storm is impressive, if one cares for that sort of thing; it is thunderously amusing, and one likes to see the man turning the crank of the wind machine; but the ominous hush before the tempest, with the suggestion of frightened, questioning birds, is, indeed, poetic and at the same time musical. Nor should the fanfare of horns announcing "the entrance into the forest" be forgotten, though this fanfare might be for any chase, forest or no forest.

Straus for once wrote his own program. What does he think of an earnest commentator, the writer of a guide-book to the symphony, who pointed out that "the cold air of the glacier is indicated by a transformation of the 'waterfall' theme, with new material?"

The "Alpine" symphony is not a "masterpiece." As a work of art it is not to be compared with "Tille Eulanspiegel," "Salome" or "Rosenkavalier." Some of the pages of the symphony might take the place of a lecturer in a "Travel Talk of the Glories of the Alps," though the audience would then recognize the fact that no music can reproduce the emotion of one gazing on the awful majesty of the Jungfrau or the wildness of the Diablerets; nor can one paint in tones sunrise and sunset, whether he employs ingeniously an ascending or descending scale.

No, Strauss, lake Reuben Pettingill with his jack-knife, is extraordinarily [illegible]

STRAUSS' "AN ALPINE SYMPHONY"

Post Dec 19

First Hearing of Tone Poem Written in 1915

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"An Alpine Symphony," the last to date of the tone-poems of Richard Strauss, makes the bulk of the programme of yesterday afternoon's and this evening's Symphony Concerts. With it for preface and judicious contrast Mr. Koussevitzky has placed Bach's Suite in D major, that of the beautiful and familiar air for violins.

AMAZINGLY SCORED

More than a decade old is this "Alpine Symphony," and, although it is hardly one of its composer's more important productions, it was high time that we of Boston made its acquaintance. To Mr. Koussevitzky, then, all praise both for his initiative and for the enormous pains that he must obviously have taken to bring this long and elaborate score to so finished and so eloquent a performance.

To speak first of the more successful portions of this colossal tone-poem, both the passage, of a fine breadth, that occurs when the traveller who is protagonist of the piece has reached the mountain-top, and the long and musing epilogue are of the greater if not the greatest Strauss. Highly effective as tone-painting, though of a lower order of musical invention, are the beginning and the end of the work, respectively suggestive of sunrise and sunset, the corruscatingly brilliant music of the waterfall and the exciting, dynamically overpowering storm in which such extra-musical aids as wind-machine and thunder-machine are employed to swell the tumult. Between times come numerous other episodes; some of passing interest, others that represent Strauss at his feeblest.

An amazing exercise in instrumentation, remarkable in this respect even for Strauss, and for the most part agreeable and occasionally stimulating to hear, the "Alpine Symphony" must yet be placed upon a somewhat lower level than any of the preceding tone-poems, with the possible exception of the early "Macbeth." And, oddly enough, its harmonic idiom represents a regression, not an advance. Strauss here writes with an almost classic simplicity that at its best results in breadth of utterance and elevation of mood, and at its worst in bald ingenuousness.

Yesterday the "Alpine Symphony" was well received, although there was hardly the extraordinary enthusiasm that is said to have greeted the piece at its first performance in Berlin 10 years ago last October.

---

time in Brooklyn, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, Op. 64. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has written, first appeared at the beginning of the war and was then performed in Germany, American and elsewhere. It was revived by Fritz Reiner at the 1924 Stadium Concerts and by Mr. Koussevitzky recently in Boston, where it met with instant success and was repeated by general request. The "Alpine" is a nature symphony and has the following sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night—Sunrise—The Ascent—Entering the Woods—Wandering by the Brook—At the Waterfall—Scenery—On Flowering Paths—The Mountain Pasture—Off the Path Through Thicket and Underbrush—On the Glacier—Vision—"The Fog Rises—The Sun is Gradually Obscured—Elegy—Stillness Before the Storm—The Thunderstorm—Descent—Sunset — Sou[illegible] —Night.

The programme's opening number is Purcell's "Trumpet V[illegible] tary," arranged by Sir Henry W[illegible] for organ, trumpets, trombones, [illegible] rums.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 3 1926

Wagnerian Table Talk

By EDWARD CUSHING

GENERAL MANAGER GATTI-CASAZZA is feasting us this week to a little more Wagner: the season's first "Die Walkure" has been announced for Thursday evening, in direct and unmitigated conflict with the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But for the true and perfect Wagnerians conflicts count little—the true and perfect Wagnerian would probably rather have his first "Walkure" than all the concerts which the Bostonians give in a year. I know, for instance, that I will be at the Metropolitan, and not at Carnegie Hall on this particular Thursday, and that I will listen with increasing wonderment to one of the most beautiful scores ever devised by mortal musician.

AN 3 1926

Boston Symphony in Two Concerts Here

"An Alpine Symphony," by Richard Strauss, will be a feature of the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which are to take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This tone poem [illegible] nature, Strauss's last orchestral work on a large scale, was composed about ten years ago. It was then performed in New York and subsequently forgotten in the preoccupation of the war.

At the Thursday concert Koussevitzky will also present "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland. This score, by a young American composer, has attracted considerable attention in the last two seasons.

[illegible] guest conduc- [illegible] Boston Symphony in three [illegible] rmances. The remainder of [illegible] eason he will devote to the [illegible] ster Orchestra.

Purc[illegible] ......Trumpet Voluntary
Copland............Music for the Theater
Strauss ....Ein Alpensinfonie

Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9:

Mendelssohn ...."Italian" Symphony
Bloch..........Concerto Grosso for Strings
Wagner..........Excerpts from "Tristan"

There will be no soloist at either of these concerts. The Copland Suite recently had a first New York performance at a concert given by the League of Composers. The Strauss work has not been performed for a number of seasons. Bloch's Concerto is a novelty to New York. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted it at a recent concert in Boston.

[illegible] Alpine Symphony. This was composed in 1914, played here in 1916 and then virtually forgotten here until July, 1924, when Fritz Reiner gave it at a Stadium concert.

Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty of Saturday afternoon is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings with piano, composed in the West in 1924-'25 and already played in Los Angeles, Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston. While adopting an eighteenth century form, Mr. Bloch does not confine himself wholly to a form of that period.

JAN 2 — 1

of Ernest Bloch [illegible] this city will be [illegible] that his new suite [illegible] viola was played [illegible] by the Boston Sy[illegible] under the direction [illegible] itzky. The soloist [illegible] concerning this [illegible] York, Philip Hale [illegible] suite is a personal [illegible] musical photogram [illegible] elf, or let us say [illegible] cally psychological [illegible] Ernest Bloch's mi[illegible] certain works reveal [illegible] Tchaikovsky, with [illegible] ression, suffering from [illegible] inevitable death, at tim[illegible] despair. Bloch has known pover[illegible] of recognition. And [illegible] braic spirit that makes [illegible] rages and inspires [illegible] in the books of the

---

THIS CLIPPING F[illegible]
NEW YORK [illegible]

JA[illegible]

THE Philadelphia Or[illegible] direction of Leopo[illegible] play its sixth Carnegie [illegible] Tuesday evening. The [illegible] of the Fifth Symphony [illegible] Loeffler's "Canticle of th[illegible] Povla Frijsh in the [illegible] Rimsky-Korsakoff "Sch[illegible] symphony and the Loef[illegible] heard here for the [illegible] "Scheherazade" music wi[illegible] by the clavilux, with Th[illegible] the keyboard of the instr[illegible] a pioneer in the use of [illegible] art and inventor of the cl[illegible] posed the visual setting [illegible] Korsakoff work.

Koussevitzky and the B[illegible] Orchestra will give their [illegible] concerts in New York [illegible] Thursday evening and Sat[illegible] in Carnegie Hall. They w[illegible] "Alpine Symphony" at the [illegible] cert and "Music for the Th[illegible] Copland, the American com[illegible] gram will be introduced [illegible] Voluntary" of Purcell, a[illegible] Henry Wood. The matin[illegible] include Berlioz's overture [illegible] Cellini," Mendelssohn's [illegible] phony," Bloch's [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
JAN 2 — 1926

CONCERTS [illegible] OPERA FO[illegible] [illegible]XT WEE[illegible]

[illegible]

HOLIDAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

158

Boston Post

Purcell Gets Place on List for First Time

Dec. 25

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although no music specifically related to Christmas appears upon it, the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky made for the Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tomorrow evening is by no means inappropriate to the holiday season.

PURCELL'S TRUMPET PIECE

For truly joyous beginning there is a Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, transcribed by Sir Henry Wood, while a note of fitting solemnity is sounded in the Prelude to "Parsifal," and each of these moods is further emphasized in Saint-Saens' Symphony, for orchestra with organ. Nor is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso, for string orchestra with piano obbligato, a modernizing of an ancient form and style, unsuited to the occasion.

Yesterday for the first time the name of England's greatest composer appeared upon a programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This noisy arrangement of Sir Henry's, for three trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, side-drum and organ, is less to be admired than Mr. Stokowski's version of this or of a markedly similar piece played last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra and more discreetly scored for three trumpets, oboes, bassoons and strings. Be that as it may, however, the music itself was good to hear yesterday and in the brilliant first trumpet part Mr. Mager was granted rare opportunity to display his skill in florid playing.

Bloch's Concerto Pleases

Likewise heard for the first time in Boston, Bloch's Concerto Grosso proved a very different piece from that com

is at once intellectually stimulating and emotionally stirring. It may be said again that Bloch is a contemporary composer whose every utterance is masterly.

With Jesus Sanroma to carry the piano part the Concerto was finely played by all concerned.

Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony

Following upon this honest, forthright music and upon the Prelude to "Parisfal," which yesterday received a profoundly impressive performance, the huge machine that is Saint-Saens' C-minor Symphony seemed more than ever a contrived and artificial music. Nevertheless, for all its smug religiosity that smacks of Gounod and its grandiloquence that out-Liszts Liszt, this Symphony, especially when played with the euphony and brilliance that marked the performance of yesterday, is not unagreeable to hear. Saint-Saens in this particular instance had nothing of great moment to impart, but he says his say with an adriotness, a sureness of touch, an infallible sense of musical and instrumental effect that, even after nearly 40 years, may not be resisted.

And such is the power of sheer sound, although no great thought lie behind it, that the effulgent close of this Symphony provoked yesterday a storm of applause conspicuous even in these Koussevitzkian days.

BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

3 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Next Tuesday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the second concert of the new historical series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place. Serge Koussevitzky will present Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Berliz' "Ballet of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March"; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Scherzo, Schumann's "Carnvala" excerpts and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Advertiser SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1925

ALPINE SYMPHONY HAS BELATED BOSTON DEBUT

Richard Strauss' musical travelogue, otherwise known as the "Alpine Symphony," made its Hub debut yesterday at the Symphony matinee.

After even the first hearing anyone could guess why Dr. Muck decided to welcome it back in 1916, when orchestras outside of Boston were playing it. But for the fact that it is played without intermission, going on and on for an hour, it would probably have been heard by a gradually shrinking audience yesterday. Dr. Strauss is a prodigious person, but when he wrote this "Alpine Symphony," he was often nodding.

The musical hike takes the audience from sunrise to sunset through the forest and over the mountains, with stops at brook, waterfall and glacier. The inevitable thunderstorm comes fortunately toward the close of day, when the hikers are only too content to sit down in the nearest cave. On the whole the storm is the most vivid feature of the excursion.

Strauss writes with consummate cleverness, but not in this instance with any particular flights of imagination. The woods have Wagnerian echoes. There are tiresome moments, as if the merry mountaineers were worried by the footing. It is not Strauss at his best. In fact, it is rather high-class movie music.

Much more delightful, all in all, was old Johann Sebastian Bach's classic third suite in D major, with the seraphic second movement air; a work faultlessly led by Mr. Koussevitzky.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

"An Alpine Symphony" Heard for First Time Here

Dec. 19

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "An Alpine Symphony," published in 1915, was played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston. The war kept us from hearing this music until Stravinsky had definitely taken Strauss' place as the leading purveyor of orchestral novelties and representative of the latest thing in music in the minds of that dilettanti always eager, like the Athenians of old, for some new thing.

A brilliant performance, of deafening sonority, was greeted with remarkably enthusiastic applause. The audience waited at the end of the concert to recall Mr Koussevitzky thrice and bring the players to their feet.

Since Strauss' piece lasts about three-quarters of an hour, played without pause, Mr Koussevitzky put only one other number on the program, Bach's beautiful suite in D major, the one containing the familiar air, wrongly known as "for the G string." This music was charmingly played, but the audience, like all popular audiences, did not like Bach, and applauded tepidly.

"An Alpine Symphony" is not a symphony in the usual sense of the word at all; it is not a motion picture in tones, constructed musically after the fashion of an act in a Wagnerian music drama, with recurrent "leading motives." The story told by the descriptive titles put by Strauss above the separate sections of the printed score is of a day spent by a hero (possibly the composer himself) in climbing among the Alps. The ascent is begun while it is still night. Sunrise, wandering through woodland, up to the beautiful mountain pastures which are in the strict sense of the word the "Alps," venturing on a glacier, the summit, a mist, and then a thunderstorm during the descent, sunset, and again night, complete the picture.

Strauss' other and earlier tone poems have taught one to expect of him a megalomaniac passion for sheer volume of tone, and a thoroughly Teutonic attention to every detail in the complex pattern of his score. With the exception of a single theme in "Don Juan" and a couple more in "Till Eulenspiegel," he has never hit upon the unforgettable bits of tune out of which a Wagner can spin and weave his grandiose musical structures.

Strauss has every musical gift save only the one most needful, thematic originality. There is not in "An Alpine Symphony" even a single really great theme. The musical ideas in the work are all derivative and often commonplace.

Strauss, by his marvellous use of harmonies, and his uncanny control of all the possible sonorities and novel tone blendings in instrumentation, manages to suggest with genuine poetic power some of the sights and sounds he would depict. His thunderstorm is more imaginative, as well as more lifelike, than the one in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The music intended to deal with Night is also vividly imagined. By flooding the ear with slow sustained harmonies from full-voiced brass choirs, and turning his phrases majestically, he stimulates adroitly at climaxes genuine musical sublimity. But the true sublime is not in his power to attain.

It is curious how clearly this music composed in the year of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring", dates from the 1890s. Strauss marks definitely the end of an epoch, whether or not Stravinsky turns out to mark the beginning of another period. The epoch of which Strauss is the last notable figure is, of course, the post Wagnerian. Schoenberg has escaped from Wagnerian influence only by inventing an entirely new musical language. Strauss, not nurtured on Wagner, came to his music as a young man with all the proverbial fervor of the convert, and has never recanted.

But it is plain that Beethoven and Wagner between them ruined most of the lesser 19th-century composers, just as Michelangelo and Raphael ruined most of the lesser painters who came after them in Italy. Strauss might have achieved greater things if he had never heard a note of Wagner's music. He might, for instance, have trusted his gift for honest Teutonic sentimental melody, shown in the song, "Mit deinem blauen Augen." But it happened otherwise.

P. R.

---

gated conflict wit
But for the true true and perfec
"Walkure" than
I know, for ins
Carnegie Hall increasing wo

Trumpet Voluntary
Copland .... Music for the Theater
Strauss .... Ein Alpensinfonie

Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9:

Mendelssohn .... "Italian" Symphony
Bloch .... Concerto Grosso for Strings
Wagner .... Excerpts from "Tristan"

There will be no soloist at either of these concerts. The Copland Suite recently had a first New York performance at a concert given by the League of Composers. The Strauss work has not been performed for a number of seasons. Bloch's Concerto is a novelty to New York. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted it at a recent concert in Boston.

ymphony. This was composed in 1914, played here in 1916 and then virtually forgotten here until July, 1924, when Fritz Reiner gave it at a Stadium concert.

Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty of Saturday afternoon is Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for strings with piano, composed in the West in 1924-'25 and already played in Los Angeles, Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston. While adopting an eighteenth century form, Mr. Bloch does not confine himself wholly to a form of that period.

---

guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in three performances. The remainder of the season he will devote to the ster Orchestra.

Herald

TURDAY, DECEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY GIVES STRAUSS 'ALPINE'

Ninth Concert Is Eloquent and Brilliant Performance

BACH'S SUITE ALSO ON FINE PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Bach's Suite, D major, No. 3, and Richard Strauss's "Alpina" Symphony.

This symphony was first produced at Berlin ten years ago. Although it has been performed in several cities of the United States (in three in 1916), it was heard in Boston yesterday for the first time.

Reuben Pettingill, the hero of the Artemus Ward's story "Pyrotechny," was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife, with which he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. "He carved excellent soldiers also."

"I remember his masterpiece," says Artemus; "it was 'Napoleon crossing the Alps.' Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps. An Alp or two more would have improved it; but, as a whole it was a wonderful piece of work, and what a wonderful piece of work is a wooden man, when his legs and arms are all right."

Strauss is an extraordinarily skilful elderly man in the use of an orchestra; is his "Alpino" Symphony short of Alps?

In other words did he attempt to accomplish the impossible?

He has composed a panoramic, musical moving picture of the Alps. The audience is supposed to climb, personally conducted by good Mr. Strauss as guide—though the audience is not securely roped to him. It starts in time to see the sunrise, enters the woods—yesterday it seemed as if the guide and his followers would never come out of them—wanders by the brookside, enjoys the sight of a pretty waterfall, admires the scenery, enters the mountain pasture and hears the cow bells, plunges through underbrush, sees from on high a glorious view, is alarmed by the hush of nature before a terrific thunderstorm, descends, arriving safely below in time for the evening meal, looking at the setting sun, and, later, hearing the voices of the night.

Strauss neglected, unfortunately, to allude musically to the celebrated Edelweiss, nor did he, like Baedeker, point out places of rest and refreshment on the way that are "well recommended," with moderate prices.

In a way this symphony reminds one of "The Plains: Ode Symphonie," by Jabez Tarbox, which was reviewed at length by the late John Phoenix. He began his masterly article: "The symphonie opens upon the wide and boundless plains in longitude 115 degrees W., latitude 35 degrees, 21 minutes, .03 seconds and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitt river. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long (topographically) drawn note from an E-flat clarinet. . . . A few notes on the piccolo calls the attention to a solitary antelope picking up mescal beans in the foreground."

The "Alpine" symphony is a curious mixture of the ideal and the realistic; of the lofty and the commonplace; of platitudes thinly hidden by gorgeous orchestral dress; of passages conspicuous for genuine beauty; of pages that are mere padding. As is not uncommon with Strauss, the thematic material is often common, or vulgar, if one prefers that word.

Yet what composer living but Strauss could have written the superb pages of the "vision" by which the hearer looks from the summit towards the four quarters of the earth? Or the exquisite measures, simple measures, given to a few strings?

Mr. Finck thinks that Strauss may have caught the idea of his "Waterfall" music from hearing "the Cascade of Jewels" in the opera "Ariane and Blue Beard." We have no proof that Strauss ever saw the opera or the score. He is wholly competent to find music for any waterfall. (It is strange that he has never written music for Niagara or for the wonderful African falls.) His thunder storm is impressive, if one cares for that sort of thing; it is thunderously amusing, and one likes to see the man turning the crank of the wind machine; but the ominous hush before the tempest, with the suggestion of frightened, questioning birds, is, indeed, poetic and at the same time musical. Nor should the fanfare of horns announcing "the entrance into the forest" be forgotten, though this fanfare might be for any chase, forest or no forest.

Straus for once wrote his own program. What does he think of an earnest commentator, the writer of a guidebook to the symphony, who pointed out that "the cold air of the glacier is indicated by a transformation of the 'waterfall' theme, with new material?"

The "Alpine" symphony is not a "masterpiece." As a work of art it is not to be compared with "Tille Eulanspiegel," "Salome" or "Rosenkavalier." Some of the pages of the symphony might take the place of a lecturer in a "Travel Talk of the Glories of the Alps," though the audience would then recognize the fact that no music can reproduce the emotion of one gazing on the awful majesty of the Jungfrau or the wildness of the Diablerets; nor can one paint in tones sunrise and sunset, whether he employs ingeniously an ascending or descending scale.

No, Strauss, lake Reuben Pettingill with his jack-knife, is extraordinarily

---

STRAUSS' "AN ALPINE SYMPHONY"

Post Dec 19

First Hearing of Tone Poem Written in 1915

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"An Alpine Symphony," the last to date of the tone-poems of Richard Strauss, makes the bulk of the programme of yesterday afternoon's and this evening's Symphony Concerts. With it for preface and judicious contrast Mr. Koussevitzky has placed Bach's Suite in D major, that of the beautiful and familiar air for violins.

AMAZINGLY SCORED

More than a decade old is this "Alpine Symphony," and, although it is hardly one of its composer's more important productions, it was high time that we of Boston made its acquaintance. To Mr. Koussevitzky, then, all praise both for his initiative and for the enormous pains that he must obviously have taken to bring this long and elaborate score to so finished and so eloquent a performance.

To speak first of the more successful portions of this colossal tone-poem, both the passage, of a fine breadth, that occurs when the traveller who is protagonist of the piece has reached the mountain-top, and the long and musing epilogue are of the greater if not the greatest Strauss. Highly effective as tone-painting, though of a lower order of musical invention, are the beginning and the end of the work, respectively suggestive of sunrise and sunset, the corruscatingly brilliant music of the waterfall and the exciting, dynamically overpowering storm in which such extra-musical aids as wind-machine and thunder-machine are employed to swell the tumult. Between times come numerous other episodes; some of passing interest, others that represent Strauss at his feeblest.

An amazing exercise in instrumentation, remarkable in this respect even for Strauss, and for the most part agreeable and occasionally stimulating to hear, the "Alpine Symphony" must yet be placed upon a somewhat lower level than any of the preceding tone-poems, with the possible exception of the early "Macbeth." And, oddly enough, its harmonic idiom represents a regression, not an advance. Strauss here writes with an almost classic simplicity that at its best results in breadth of utterance and elevation of mood, and at its worst in bald ingenuousness.

Yesterday the "Alpine Symphony" was well received, although there was hardly the extraordinary enthusiasm that is said to have greeted the piece at its first performance in Berlin, 10 years ago last October.

---

time in Brooklyn, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, Op. 64. This work, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has written, first appeared at the beginning of the war and was then performed in Germany, American and elsewhere. It was revived by Fritz Reiner at the 1924 Stadium Concerts and by Mr. Koussevitzky recently in Boston, where it met with instant success and was repeated by general request. The "Alpine" is a nature symphony and has the following sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night-Sunrise—The Ascent—Entering the Woods—Wandering by the Brook—At the Waterfall—Scenery—On Flowering Paths—The Mountain Pasture—Off the Path Through Thicket and Underbrush—On the Glacier—Vision—"The Fog Rises—The Sun is Gradually Obscured—Elegy—Stillness Before the Storm—The Thunderstorm—Descent—Sunset—Sou—Night.

The programme's opening number is Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary," arranged by Sir Henry Wood for organ, trumpets, trombones, drums

---

JAN 2

THIS CLIPPING F
NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
JAN 2 1926

sir his
T marked a ap was very we at the end M
Mr. Copland t share the applause of the movement m
much superior to the here, which gave th was not perceptible
this richer coloring and stances of a second he have changed one's esti actual worth of the com matter that cannot, unha cided here and now.

The performance of the S phone constituted another demonstration of the virtuos tonal splendor of the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Koussevi playing last night was exhibition of sonority, te sion, elasticity and respon the part of the players.
phony itself exposes the fam
tues and defects of Strauss.
almost all of the orchestral ments in existence in a chara manner of his own. He wri criptively, imitatively, of the d Alps when everything happen cowbell to a thunderstorm. N unprogrammed; there are no in which the hearer is left fre agine what he pleases. Text musical signposts are everywhe listener cannot escape them.

What is impressive, for all Strauss's magnificent mastery portion and of line, his unfailin of his themes, his preparation achievement of climax. Then, too, not bad to hear something diat even if it is too often commonpla invention; to encounter again in m a certain good German muscularity and healthiness of style, and ever and anon a truly beautiful arch of melody, a truly cumulative page of masterly development. The net impression o this interpretation, however, was les of a symphony than of a performanc
The performance justified only sup latives, for Mr. Koussevitsky and his men. It was a sheer glory for rejoicing for the un

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 – 1926

* * *

Friends of Ernest Bloch, who is well known in this city, will be interested to learn that his new suite for orchestra and viola was played in Boston recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Jean Lefranc. Concerning this important new work, Philip Hale wrote as follows:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. I reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and sou as certain works reveal the self-tor turing Tchaikovsky, with his fits o depression, suffering from the obsessio of inevitable death, at times shriekin his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, sufferin lack of recognition. And in him th Hebraic spirit that blazes and mock and rages and inspires to lofty poet strains in the books of the old prophe is

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

JAN 2 – 1926

THE Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski will play its sixth Carnegie Hall concert on Tuesday evening. The program consists of the Fifth Symphony of Miaskowsky, Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," with Mme. Povla Frijsh in the soprano role, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." The symphony and the Loeffler work will be heard here for the first time. The "Scheherazade" music will be accompanied by the clavilux, with Thomas Wilfred at the keyboard of the instrument. Wilfred, a pioneer in the use of light as a fine art and inventor of the clavilux, has composed the visual setting for the Rimsky-Korsakoff work.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their second pair of concerts in New York this season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They will play Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" at the Thursday concert and "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland, the American composer. The program will be introduced by a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood. The matinee program will include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini,' Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Bloch's "C rosso" for) and Ra- No. 3. ll be the rt of the orrow at atre. Jo- for his

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
JAN 2 – 1926

CONCERTS AND OPERA FOR NEXT WEEK

Of principal interest among next week's concerts are the appearance of Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, as conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening and the Philadelphia Orchestra's programme under Leopold Stokowski on Tuesday. Mr. Casella will play some unfamiliar music by Monteverdi, Debussy's three nocturnes and his own "Italia."

Mr. Stokowski will introduce the Fifth Symphony of Nikolai Miaskovsky, a contemporary Russian who has written eight of them and all unknown here. Povla Frijsh will sing the solo part of C. M. Loeffeler's new "Canticle of the Sun," and Rimsky-Korsokov's "Scheherazade" will be given with Thomas Wilfred's keyboard color machine known as the "clavilux."

Other outstanding events of the week are the appearance of Eugene Goossens at the head of the New York Symphony Thursday, the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner on Wednesday, Ethel Leginska directing the Philharmonic tomorrow and the Boston Symphony's concerts on Thursday and Saturday, featuring Strauss's "Alpine" symphony at the one and Ernest Bloch's new concerto grosso at the other.

The more important recitals include John McCormack tomorrow

JAN [illegible] 1926

Koussewitsky to Conduct Novelties at the Academy

THE program announced for the second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday evening will be conducted by Serge Koussewitzky. A first Brooklyn performance of Richard Strauss' Alpine Symphony will be given. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night; sunrise; the ascent; entering the woods; wandering by the brook; at the waterfall; scenery; on flowering paths; the mountain pasture; off the path th brush; on rises; the elegy;

with Organ, performed by the Symphony Society in New York last season, and his "Music for the Theater" performed by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York this season, have been the most conspicuous. "Music for the Theater" is a suite whose movements include "Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue."

The concert will be introduced by a trumpet voluntary of Purcell, the early English composer, which has been arranged by Sir Henry Wood gan, trumpets, trombones and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 3 1926

Boston Symphony Programs.

Serge Koussevitzky will present the following programs at the second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York this season for concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 7, at 8.30, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, at 2.30. At the Thursday concert Koussevitzky will revive Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony," and also present "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland. This score, by the young American composer whose music has attracted

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 3 – 1926

Brahms and Strauss of "Till Eulenspiegel," it traverses familiar—and popular—ground.

Mr. Koussevitzky's first program will revive Richard Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," which has been heard before in New York and which retails, professedly, the impressions and reveries of one who wanders in the Alps. Strauss employs for his purpose an enormous orchestra, composing with partly descriptive, partly poetic intent. It is well that this work of his later period should be heard again, even though it has not carried with public or reviewers as have the earlier symphonic poems. It is a work which invites the capacities of a virtuoso conductor, and Mr. Koussevitzky is surely that. Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," which Mr. Koussevitzky performed with a small orchestra of Boston Symphony players at the concert given by the League of Composers Nov. 28 in Town Hall, will be repeated by him with the full orchestra. He believes in Mr. Copland and is proceeding with the conviction of one who believes to repeat a work which was not liked at first hearing by the reviewers of this city. It is an admirable and courageous deed on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky, and the reviewers will have opportunity, too rare when new compositions are produced, of confirming their suspicions or changing their opinions. But they will have to be shown. The trumpet voluntary by Purcell is an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood from a manuscript in the British Museum of the short piece which has also been arranged by Mr. Stokowski and played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is among the composers who have been quick to encourage and perform the music of Ernst Bloch. He has produced in Boston the suite for viola and orchestra, which should be heard here. He will play on Saturday afternoon for the first time in New York Bloch's latest score, published by Birchard of Boston, the "Concerto Grosso," written in the old style for string orchestra with piano obbligato. The work has already been heard, once under the composer's direction in Cleveland, in Philadelphia, in Chicago and in Boston. It contains an energetic prelude with strongly accented thematic material, punctuated by great chords; a dirge of simplicity and deep feeling, in a manner slightly Hebraic, though far from the wildness and poignancy of Bloch's avowedly Hebraic compositions; a "Pastorale," unconventional in style and interrupted with alternating "rustic dances," and a vigorous, strongly rhythmed fugue, into which is woven a thematic reminiscence of the first movement. This work was composed by Mr. Bloch in California two years ago. Is he, like Stravinsky, like many modern Frenchmen, now looking back to old forms and old methods of writing music for new inspiration?

These concerts are

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 5 – 1926

ORCHESTRAL ACTIVITIES

Three visiting orchestras will play here in Carnegie Hall on three successive days. To-night the Philadelphia Orchestra will present unfamiliar works of Miaskowsky and Loeffler, To-morrow night the Cincinnati Orchestra will present Brahms's fourth symphony and several shorter works. Thursday night the Boston Symphony is to play Strauss's "Alpine" symphony. Two young conductors will make their symphonic debuts with local orchestras during the week. Thursday afternoon Eugene Goossens is to lead the Symphony Society and Saturday evening Alfredo Casella will direct the State Symphony Orchestra, both in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~TIMES~~
HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant

JAN 6 – 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of atttntion in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer; for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Aft-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~TIMES~~
HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant

JAN 8 – 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The entire musical season holds no greater treat than the Boston Symphony concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. On this occasion the orchestra will appear in this city for the second time under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The feature of the program will be Scriabian's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," an unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the Western world. Mr. Koussevitsky was a friend of the late Scriabian, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer, for probably, it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenute Cillini;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who will also offer Giovanni Martinelli, first tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, in a recital of popular operatic numbers at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats and boxes for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 6 – 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunday

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Symphony Which Will Play at "Y" Concert.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his re-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

JAN 9 – 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to have a distinguished guest conductor, Eugene Goossens, at the next Providence concert which will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, January 19th. This English celebrity is likewise to appear at the regular pair of Boston concerts of the same week.

Goossens is looked upon in England as one of the most important conductors of the day, and in musical centres everywhere he is highly thought of as a composer. His English career as conductor has been mostly confined to the Queen's Hall orchestra of London, and the orchestra of Sir Thomas Beecham, with which he conducted operatic as well as concert performances. Goossens first came to this country in 1923 to direct the orchestra of the Rochester school of music. He is now conducting a series of guest appearances in New York over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goosens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting programme. Weber's overture to "Freischutz;" Brahms' "Fourth Symphony in E Minor;" Wagner's "Prelude and Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde;" and Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

JAN 6 – 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunda

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under Y. M. C. A. auspices.

It will consist of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

JAN 8 – 1926

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS "ALPINE" SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, for last night's concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, revived Richard Strauss's "Alpine" symphony as the principal matter of the evening. It had not been done here for a number of years, but at its first hearing it was admittedly one of Strauss's weakest efforts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 9 – 1926

MUSICAL ALPS

It took Richard Strauss just one hundred days to write the score of his Alpine symphony which was featured at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, and the music sounds as if it were tossed off merely to show his virtuosity as a composer. In the matter of technical difficulties it reaches the high water mark in Strauss's career. Musically, it is one of his least noteworthy efforts. But Strauss has a faculty for being interesting, even when inspiration is at low ebb. There are fine sonorous passages in the Alpine symphony, though there is little originality. If a lesser composer had written it, it would have attracted wide interest, but more is expected of the composer of "Salome," "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Hero's Life."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston leader, is a virtuoso conductor, and his orchestra is one of the best in the world. So the performance was brilliant. The trumpets and horns blew their top notes thrillingly. The full sonorous tone of the strings was good to hear. The wood winds and percussion instruments performed all but impossible feats of skill. Even the cow bells, which appear in the score, were manipulated cleverly. But it takes more than cow bells, high notes and fine sonorities to make a great symphony. It is ten years since Strauss wrote this musical picture of the highest Alps, and outside of three or four performances by the Philharmonic Society it has been neglected in New York. Even last night's virtuoso performance did not make it sound like inspired music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 - 1926

* * *

Friends of Ernest Bloch, who is well known in this city, will be interested to learn that his new suite for orchestra and viola was played in Boston recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky. The soloist was Jean Lefranc. Concerning this important new work, Philip Hale wrote as follows:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffering, lack of recognition. And in him the Hebraic spirit that blazes and mocks and rages and inspires to lofty poetic strains in the books of the old prophe…

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

JAN 2 - 1926

THE Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski will play its sixth Carnegie Hall concert on Tuesday evening. The program consists of the Fifth Symphony of Miaskowsky, Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," with Mme. Povla Frijsh in the soprano role, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." The symphony and the Loeffler work will be heard here for the first time. The "Scheherazade" music will be accompanied by the clavilux, with Thomas Wilfred at the keyboard of the instrument. Wilfred, a pioneer in the use of light as a fine art and inventor of the clavilux, has composed the visual setting for the Rimsky-Korsakoff work.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their second pair of concerts in New York this season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They will play Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" at the Thursday concert and "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland, the American composer. The program will be introduced by a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood. The matinee program will include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini,' Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Bloch's "C… rosso" for …) and Ra… No. 3. … ill be the … ert of the … orrow at … atre. Jo… for his

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
JAN 2 - 1926

CONCERTS AND OPERA FOR NEXT WEEK

Of principal interest among next week's concerts are the appearance of Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, as conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening and the Philadelphia Orchestra's programme under Leopold Stokowski on Tuesday. Mr. Casella will play some unfamiliar music by Monteverdi, Debussy's three nocturnes and his own "Italia."

Mr. Stokowski will introduce the Fifth Symphony of Nikolai Miaskovsky, a contemporary Russian who has written eight of them and all unknown here. Povla Frijsh will sing the solo part of C. M. Loeffeler's new "Canticle of the Sun," and Rimsky-Korsokov's "Scheherazade" will be given with Thomas Wilfred's keyboard color machine known as the "clavilux."

Other outstanding events of the week are the appearance of Eugene Goossens at the head of the New York Symphony Thursday, the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner on Wednesday, Ethel Leginska directing the Philharmonic tomorrow and the Boston Symphony's concerts on Thursday and Saturday, featuring Strauss's "Alpine" symphony at the one and Ernest Bloch's new concerto grosso at the other.

The more important recitals include John McCormack tomorrow

PROV…

JAN 3 - 1926

Koussewitsky to Conduct Novelties at the Academy

THE program announced for the second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday evening will be conducted by Serge Koussewitzky. A first Brooklyn performance of Richard Strauss' Alpine Symphony will be given. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has …

… sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night; sunrise; the ascent; entering the woods; wandering by the brook; at the waterfall; scenery; on flowering paths; the mountain pasture; off the path th… brush; on t… rises; the … elegy; sti…

… with Organ, performed by the Symphony Society in New York last season, and his "Music for the Theater" performed by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York this season, have been the most conspicuous. "Music for the Theater" is a suite whose movements include "Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue."

The concert will be introduced by a trumpet voluntary of Purcell, the early English composer, which has been arranged by Sir Henry Wood … gan, trumpets, trombones and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 3 1926

Boston Symphony Programs.

Serge Koussevitzky will present the following programs at the second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York this season for concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 7, at 8.30, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, at 2.30. At the Thursday concert Koussevitzky will revive Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony," and also present "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland. This score, by the young American composer whose music has attracted

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 3 - 1926

… Berlioz, Brahms and Strauss of "Till Eulenspiegel." It traverses familiar—and popular—ground.

Mr. Koussevitzky's first program will revive Richard Strauss's "Alpine Symphony," which has been heard before in New York and which retails, professedly, the impressions and reveries of one who wanders in the Alps. Strauss employs for his purpose an enormous orchestra, composing with partly descriptive, partly poetic intent. It is well that this work of his later period should be heard again, even though it has not carried with public or reviewers as have the earlier symphonic poems. It is a work which invites the capacities of a virtuoso conductor, and Mr. Koussevitzky is surely that. Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," which Mr. Koussevitzky performed with a small orchestra of Boston Symphony players at the concert given by the League of Composers Nov. 28 in Town Hall, will be repeated by him with the full orchestra. He believes in Mr. Copland and is proceeding with the conviction of one who believes to repeat a work which was not liked at first hearing by the reviewers of this city. It is an admirable and courageous deed on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky, and the reviewers will have opportunity, too rare when new compositions are produced, of confirming their suspicions or changing their opinions. But they will have to be shown. The trumpet voluntary by Purcell is an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood from a manuscript in the British Museum of the short piece which has also been arranged by Mr. Stokowski and played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is among the composers who have been quick to encourage and perform the music of Ernst Bloch. He has produced in Boston the suite for viola and orchestra, which should be heard here. He will play on Saturday afternoon for the first time in New York Bloch's latest score, published by Birchard of Boston, the "Concerto Grosso," written in the old style for string orchestra with piano obbligato. The work has already been heard, once under the composer's direction in Cleveland, in Philadelphia, in Chicago and in Boston. It contains an energetic prelude with strongly accented thematic material, punctuated by great chords; a dirge of simplicity and deep feeling, in a manner slightly Hebraic, though far from the wildness and poignancy of Bloch's avowedly Hebraic compositions; a "Pastorale," unconventional in style and interrupted with alternating "rustic dances," and a vigorous, strongly rhythmed fugue, into which is woven a thematic reminiscence of the first movement. This work was composed by Mr. Bloch in California two years ago. Is he, like Stravinsky, like many modern Frenchmen, also looking back to old forms and old methods of writing music for new inspiration?

These concerts are …

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 3 - 1926

ORCHESTRAL ACTIVITIES

Three visiting orchestras will play here in Carnegie Hall on three successive days. To-night the Philadelphia Orchestra will present unfamiliar works of Miaskowsky and Loeffler. To-morrow night the Cincinnati Orchestra will present Brahms's fourth symphony and several shorter works. Thursday night the Boston Symphony is to play Strauss's "Alpine" symphony. Two young conductors will make their symphonic debuts with local orchestras during the week. Thursday afternoon Eugene Goossens is to lead the Symphony Society and Saturday evening Alfredo Casella will direct the State Symphony Orchestra, both in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~TIMES~~
HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant

JAN 6 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of atttntion in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer; for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon … elude … to … of Nu…

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~TIMES~~
HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant

JAN 8 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The entire musical season holds no greater treat than the Boston Symphony concert at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 7. On this occasion the orchestra will appear in this city for the second time under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The feature of the program will be Scriabian's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," an unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of attention in the Western world. Mr. Koussevitsky was a friend of the late Scriabian, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer, for probably, it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenute Cillini;" Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun;" and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who will also offer Giovanni Martinelli, first tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, in a recital of popular operatic numbers at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats and boxes for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 6 - 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunday

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Symphony Which Will Play at "Y" Concert.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his re…

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

JAN 9 - 1926

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to have a distinguished guest conductor, Eugene Goossens, at the next Providence concert which will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, January 19th. This English celebrity is likewise to appear at the regular pair of Boston concerts of the same week.

Goossens is looked upon in England as one of the most important conductors of the day, and in musical centres everywhere he is highly thought of as a composer. His English career as conductor has been mostly confined to the Queen's Hall orchestra of London, and the orchestra of Sir Thomas Beecham, with which he conducted operatic as well as concert performances. Goossens first came to this country in 1923 to direct the orchestra of the Rochester school of music. He is now conducting a series of guest appearances in New York over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goosens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting programme. Weber's overture to "Freischutz;" Brahms' "Fourth Symphony in E Minor;" Wagner's "Prelude and Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde;" and Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

JAN 6 - 1926 159

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunda

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under Y. M. C. A. auspices.

It will consist of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS "ALPINE" SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, for last night's concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, revived Richard Strauss's "Alpine" symphony as the principal matter of the evening. It had not been done here for a number of years, but at its first hearing it was admittedly one of Strauss's weakest efforts. Its re… origi… ung… pla…

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

MUSICAL ALPS

It took Richard Strauss just one hundred days to write the score of his Alpine symphony which was featured at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, and the music sounds as if it were tossed off merely to show his virtuosity as a composer. In the matter of technical difficulties it reaches the high water mark in Strauss's career. Musically, it is one of his least noteworthy efforts. But Strauss has a faculty for being interesting, even when inspiration is at low ebb. There are fine sonorous passages in the Alpine symphony, though there is little originality. If a lesser composer had written it, it would have attracted wide interest, but more is expected of the composer of "Salome," "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Hero's Life."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston leader, is a virtuoso conductor, and his orchestra is one of the best in the world. So the performance was brilliant. The trumpets and horns blew their top notes thrillingly. The full sonorous tone of the strings was good to hear. The wood winds and percussion instruments performed all but impossible feats of skill. Even the cow bells, which appear in the score, were manipulated cleverly. But it takes more than cow bells, high notes and fine sonorities to make a great symphony. It is ten years since Strauss wrote this musical picture of the highest Alps, and outside of three or four performances by the Philharmonic Society it has been neglected in New York. Even last night's virtuoso performance did not make it sound like inspired music.

… standing. The audience showe… pleasure. This audience has b… again what the Boston Symphon… diences were of yore in this circl… the most distinguished … gatherings that any sympho… to … resident or visiting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 – 1926

* * *

Friends of Ernest Bloch, who is well nown in this city, will be interested o learn that his new suite for orchestra and viola was played in Boston recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Jean Lefranc. Concerning this important new work, Philip Hale wrote as follows:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograph of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits o depression, suffering from the obsessio of inevitable death, at times shriekin his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, sufferin lack of recognition. And in him th Hebraic spirit that blazes and mock and rages and inspires to lofty poet strains in the books of the old prophe is his heritage and his inspiration.

"There are noble measures, there are scornful pages; there is wildness and there is peace in this strange rhapsodic suite. Whatever one may think of it, may say, it is not musi to be carelessly dismissed with an [illegible] don't like it,' much less is it to [illegible] ignored, for it is the music of a m[illegible]n who feels deeply, has worked out [illegible] own idiom, has invented his sing[illegible] often effective, impressive orches- [illegible] led by Mr.

symphony and the Loeffler work will be heard here for the first time. The "Scheherazade" music will be accompanied by the clavilux, with Thomas Wilfred at the keyboard of the instrument. Wilfred, a pioneer in the use of light as a fine art and inventor of the clavilux, has composed the visual setting for the Rimsky-Korsakoff work.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their second pair of concerts in New York this season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They will play Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" at the Thursday concert and "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland, the American composer. The program will be introduced by a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood. The matinee program will include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini,' Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for strings (first time in New York) and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 3.

Marcel Salzinger, baritone, will be the soloist at the second noon concert of the Sunday Symphony Society tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock in Hampden's Theatre. Jo- [illegible] for his

---

OPERA FOR NEXT WEEK

Of principal interest among next week's concerts are the appearance of Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, as conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening and the Philadelphia Orchestra's programme under Leopold Stokowski on Tuesday. Mr. Casella will play some unfamiliar music by Monteverdi, Debussy's three nocturnes and his own "Italia."

Mr. Stokowski will introduce the Fifth Symphony of Nikolai Miaskovsky, a contemporary Russian who has written eight of them and all unknown here. Povla Frijsh will sing the solo part of C. M. Loeffeler's new "Canticle of the Sun," and Rimsky-Korsokov's "Scheherazade" will be given with Thomas Wilfred's keyboard color machine known as the "clavilux."

Other outstanding events of the week are the appearance of Eugene Goossens at the head of the New York Symphony Thursday, the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner on Wednesday, Ethel Leginska directing the Philharmonic tomorrow and the Boston Symphony's concerts on Thursday and Saturday, featuring Strauss's "Alpine" symphony at the one and Ernest Bloch's new concerto grosso at the other.

The more important recitals include John McCormack tomorrow

JAN 3 1926

Koussewitsky to Conduct Novelties at the Academy

THE program announced for the second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday evening will be conducted by Serge Koussewitzky. A first Brooklyn performance of Richard Strauss' Alpine Symphony will be given. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has written, first appeared at the beginning of the war and was then performed in Germany, America and elsewhere. It was revived recently by Mr. Koussewitzky in Boston, where it met with success and was repeated by request. The Alpine Symphony has the following sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night; sunrise; the ascent; entering the woods; wandering by the brook; at the waterfall; scenery; on flowering paths; th[illegible]untain pasture; off the path th[illegible] brush; on [illegible] rises; the [illegible] elegy; sti[illegible] the thund[illegible] sounds; [illegible]

There w[illegible] this pr[illegible] "Music f[illegible] (Mr. Cop[illegible] of Brookl[illegible] ber of wo[illegible]

with Organ, performed by the Symphony Society in New York last season, and his "Music for the Theater" performed by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York this season, have been the most conspicuous. "Music for the Theater" is a suite whose movements include "Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue."

The concert will be introduced by a trumpet voluntary of Purcell, the early English composer, which has been arranged by Sir Henry Wood [illegible]gan, trumpets, trombones and

---

"Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland. This score, by the young American composer whose music has attracted considerable attention in the last two seasons, introduces the following movements: Prologue, dance, interlude, burlesque and epilogue. The program will be introduced by an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood of a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, scored for organ, trumpets, trombones and drums.

At the matinee Koussevitzky will perform for the first time in New York Bloch's latest published score, "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony" will also be played on this program, which will open with a sonata by the early composer, Gaillard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, and close with the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

Purcell is an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood from a manuscript in the British Museum of the short piece which has also been arranged by Mr. Stokowski and played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is among the composers who have been quick to encourage and perform the music of Ernst Bloch. He has produced in Boston the suite for viola and orchestra, which should be heard here. He will play on Saturday afternoon for the first time in New York Bloch's latest score, published by Birchard of Boston, the "Concerto Grosso," written in the old style for string orchestra with piano obbligato. The work has already been heard, once under the composer's direction in Cleveland, in Philadelphia, in Chicago and in Boston. It contains an energetic prelude with strongly accented thematic material, punctuated by great chords; a dirge of simplicity and deep feeling, in a manner slightly Hebraic, though far from the wildness and poignancy of Bloch's avowedly Hebraic compositions; a "Pastorale," unconventional in style and interrupted with alternating "rustic dances," and a vigorous, strongly rhythmed fugue, into which is woven a thematic reminiscence of the first movement. This work was composed by Mr. Bloch in California two years ago. Is he, like Stravinsky, like many modern Frenchmen, also looking back to old forms and old methods of writing music for new inspiration?

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

JAN 5 – 1926

Orchestras Scheduled.

Two interesting orchestra events are booked for February. On the third of the month the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance of the season. This organization, in its second year under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, is always a welcome visitor. The concluding concert of the series by the New York Symphony will be held on February 10, when an all-Wagner program will be offered. Several numbers demanding a large chorus will be included in the program.

Courant

JAN 6 – 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of atttntion in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer; for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of A Faun"; and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick who will also present Giovanni Martinelli, famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be received.

---

bers at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats and boxes for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 6 – 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunday

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Symphony Which Will Play at "Y" Concert.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

This occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores.

The Terrace door will be open at o'clock and the front doors at 2[illegible] The concert will begin at 3.

JAN 6 – 1926 159

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunda

Program of Variety Is A ranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under Y. M. C. A. auspices.

It will consist of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

This occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores.

The Terrace door will be open at 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

Richard Strauss's "Alpine" symphony as the principal matter of the evening. It had not been done here for a number of years, but at its first hearing it was admittedly one of Strauss's weakest efforts. Its repetition scarcely changed the original verdict. The piece is of ungodly length, diffuse, commonplace in ideas and their development—in short, a great to-do about very little.

Aside from the Strauss symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky played a trumpet voluntary by Purcell and young Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," an effective and well made piece of work done by this conductor recently at one of the League of Composers' concerts.

h hi fe Bo ne if his matte reaches Strauss's [illegible] it is one of his least noteworthy efforts. But Strauss has a faculty for being interesting, even when inspiration is at low ebb. There are fine sonorous passages in the Alpine symphony, though there is little originality. If a lesser composer had written it, it would have attracted wide interest, but more is expected of the composer of "Salome," "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Hero's Life."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston leader, is a virtuoso conductor, and his orchestra is one of the best in the world. So the performance was brilliant. The trumpets and horns blew their top notes thrillingly. The full sonorous tone of the strings was good to hear. The wood winds and percussion instruments performed all but impossible feats of skill. Even the cow bells, which appear in the score, were manipulated cleverly. But it takes more than cow bells, high notes and fine sonorities to make a great symphony. It is ten years since Strauss wrote this musical picture of the highest Alps, and outside of three or four performances by the Philharmonic Society it has been neglected in New York. Even last night's virtuoso performance did not make it sound like inspired music.

[illegible] standing. The audience showe pleasure. This audience has [illegible] again what the Boston Symphon diences were of yore in this citi of the most distinguished [illegible] gatherings that any sympho[illegible] to au[illegible] resident or visiting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 - 1926

* * *

Friends of Ernest Bloch, who is well known in this city, will be interested to learn that his new suite for orchestra and viola was played in Boston recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky. The soloist was Jean Lefranc. Concerning this important new work, Philip Hale wrote as follows:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograpn of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffering lack of recognition. And in him the Hebraic spirit that blazes and mocks and rages and inspires to lofty poetic strains in the books of the old prophets is his heritage and his inspiration.

"There are noble measures, there are scornful pages; there is wildness and there is peace in this strange rhapsodic suite. Whatever one may think of it, may say, it is not music to be carelessly dismissed with an 'I don't like it,' much less is it to be ignored, for it is the music of a man who feels deeply, has worked out his own idiom, has invented his singular ... often effective impressive orches- ... led by Mr.

JAN 3 1926

Koussewitsky to Conduct Novelties at the Academy

THE program announced for the second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday evening will be conducted by Serge Koussewitzky. A first Brooklyn performance of Richard Strauss' Alpine Symphony will be given. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has written, first appeared at the beginning of the war and was then performed in Germany, America and elsewhere. It was revived recently by Mr. Koussewitzky in Boston, where it met with success and was repeated by request. The Alpine Symphony has the following sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night; sunrise; the ascent; entering the woods; wandering by the brook; at the waterfall; scenery; on flowering paths; the mountain pasture; off the path th... brush; on t... rises; the ... elegy; sti... the thund... sounds; ni...

There w... this pro... "Music fo... (Mr. Cop... of Brookl... ber of wor...

with Organ, performed by the Symphony Society in New York last season, and his "Music for the Theater" performed by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York this season, have been the most conspicuous. "Music for the Theater" is a suite whose movements include "Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue."

The concert will be introduced by a trumpet voluntary of Purcell, the early English composer, which has been arranged by Sir Henry Wood ... gan, trumpets, trombones and ...

"Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland. This score, by the young American composer whose music has attracted considerable attention in the last two seasons, introduces the following movements: Prologue, dance, interlude, burlesque and epilogue. The program will be introduced by an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood of a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, scored for organ, trumpets, trombones and drums.

At the matinee Koussevitzky will perform for the first time in New York Bloch's latest published score, "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony" will also be played on this program, which will open with a sonata by the early composer, Gaillard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, and close with the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

Purcell is an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood from a manuscript in the British Museum of the short piece which has also been arranged by Mr. Stokowski and played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is among the composers who have been quick to encourage and perform the music of Ernst Bloch. He has produced in Boston the suite for viola and orchestra, which should be heard here. He will play on Saturday afternoon for the first time in New York Bloch's latest score, published by Birchard of Boston, the "Concerto Grosso," written in the old style for string orchestra with piano obbligato. The work has already been heard, once under the composer's direction in Cleveland, in Philadelphia, in Chicago and in Boston. It contains an energetic prelude with strongly accented thematic material, punctuated by great chords; a dirge of simplicity and deep feeling, in a manner slightly Hebraic, though far from the wildness and poignancy of Bloch's avowedly Hebraic compositions; a "Pastorale," unconventional in style and interrupted with alternating "rustic dances," and a vigorous, strongly rhythmed fugue, into which is woven a thematic reminiscence of the first movement. This work was composed by Mr. Bloch in California two years ago. Is he, like Stravinsky, like many modern Frenchmen, also looking back to old forms and old methods of writing music for new inspiration?

These concerts are ...

---

symphony and the Loeffler work will be heard here for the first time. The "Scheherazade" music will be accompanied by the clavilux, with Thomas Wilfred at the keyboard of the instrument. Wilfred, a pioneer in the use of light as a fine art and inventor of the clavilux, has composed the visual setting for the Rimsky-Korsakoff work.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their second pair of concerts in New York this season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They will play Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" at the Thursday concert and "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland, the American composer. The program will be introduced by a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood. The matinee program will include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini,' Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for strings (first time in New York) and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 3.

Marcel Salzinger, baritone, will be the soloist at the second noon concert of the Sunday Symphony Society tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock in Hampden's Theatre. Jo- ... for his

---

OPERA FOR NEXT WEEK

Of principal interest among next week's concerts are the appearance of Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, as conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening and the Philadelphia Orchestra's programme under Leopold Stokowski on Tuesday. Mr. Casella will play some unfamiliar music by Monteverdi, Debussy's three nocturnes and his own "Italia."

Mr. Stokowski will introduce the Fifth Symphony of Nikolai Miaskovsky, a contemporary Russian who has written eight of them and all unknown here. Povla Frijsh will sing the solo part of C. M. Loeffeler's new "Canticle of the Sun," and Rimsky-Korsokov's "Scheherazade" will be given with Thomas Wilfred's keyboard color machine known as the "clavilux."

Other outstanding events of the week are the appearance of Eugene Goossens at the head of the New York Symphony Thursday, the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner on Wednesday, Ethel Leginska directing the Philharmonic tomorrow and the Boston Symphony's concerts on Thursday and Saturday, featuring Strauss's "Alpine" symphony at the one and Ernest Bloch's new concerto grosso at the other.

The more important recitals include John McCormack tomorrow

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

Orchestras Scheduled.

Two interesting orchestra events are booked for February. On the third of the month the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance of the season. This organization, in its second year under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, is always a welcome visitor. The concluding concert of the series by the New York Symphony will be held on February 10, when an all-Wagner program will be offered. Several numbers demanding a large chorus will be included in the program.

JAN 6 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of atttntion in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer; for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of A Faun"; and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick who will also present Giovanni Martinelli, famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be received.

... bers at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats and boxes for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 6 - 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunday

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Symphony Which Will Play at "Y" Concert.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

This occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores.

The Terrace door will be open at 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

JAN 6 - 1926 159

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunda

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under Y. M. C. A. auspices.

It will consist of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

This occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores.

The Terrace door will be open at 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

Richard Strauss's "Alpine" symphony as the principal matter of the evening. It had not been done here for a number of years, but at its first hearing it was admittedly one of Strauss's weakest efforts. Its repetition scarcely changed the original verdict. The piece is of ungodly length, diffuse, commonplace in ideas and their development—in short, a great to-do about very little.

Aside from the Strauss symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky played a trumpet voluntary by Purcell and young Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," an effective and well made piece of work done by this conductor recently at one of the League of Composers' concerts.

... Strauss's ..., it is one of his least noteworthy efforts. But Strauss has a faculty for being interesting, even when inspiration is at low ebb. There are fine sonorous passages in the Alpine symphony, though there is little originality. If a lesser composer had written it, it would have attracted wide interest, but more is expected of the composer of "Salome," "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Hero's Life."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston leader, is a virtuoso conductor, and his orchestra is one of the best in the world. So the performance was brilliant. The trumpets and horns blew their top notes thrillingly. The full sonorous tone of the strings was good to hear. The wood winds and percussion instruments performed all but impossible feats of skill. Even the cow bells, which appear in the score, were manipulated cleverly. But it takes more than cow bells, high notes and fine sonorities to make a great symphony. It is ten years since Strauss wrote this musical picture of the highest Alps, and outside of three or four performances by the Philharmonic Society it has been neglected in New York. Even last night's virtuoso performance did not make it sound like inspired music.

---

ear and a ... standing. The audience showe... pleasure. This audience has b... again what the Boston Symphon... diences were of yore in this cit... of the most distinguished ... gatherings that any sympho... to a... ... resident or visiting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 2 - 1926

* * *

Friends of Ernest Bloch, who is well known in this city, will be interested to learn that his new suite for orchestra and viola was played in Boston recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky. The soloist was Jean Lefranc. Concerning this important new work, Philip Hale wrote as follows:

"This suite is a personal expression; it is a musical photograpn of the man himself; or let us say that it is a musically psychological document. It reflects Ernest Bloch's mind and soul as certain works reveal the self-torturing Tchaikovsky, with his fits of depression, suffering from the obsession of inevitable death, at times shrieking his despair.

"Bloch has known poverty, suffering lack of recognition. And in him the Hebraic spirit that blazes and mocks and rages and inspires to lofty poetic strains in the books of the old prophets is his heritage and his inspiration.

"There are noble measures, there are scornful pages; there is wildness and there is peace in this strange rhapsodic suite. Whatever one may think of it, may say, it is not music to be carelessly dismissed with an 'I don't like it,' much less is it to be ignored, for it is the music of a man who feels deeply, has worked out his own idiom, has invented his singular often effective impressive orches- led by Mr.

JAN 3 1926

Koussewitsky to Conduct Novelties at the Academy

THE program announced for the second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday evening will be conducted by Serge Koussewitzky. A first Brooklyn performance of Richard Strauss' Alpine Symphony will be given. This, the last large symphonic work which the eminent German composer has written, first appeared at the beginning of the war and was then performed in Germany, America and elsewhere. It was revived recently by Mr. Koussewitzky in Boston, where it met with success and was repeated by request. The Alpine Symphony has the following sub-titles written in the score by the composer:

Night; sunrise; the ascent; entering the woods; wandering by the brook; at the waterfall; scenery; on flowering paths; the mountain pasture; off the path through thicket and underbrush; on the glacier; vision; the fog rises; the sun is gradually obscured; elegy; stillness before the storm; the thunderstorm; descent; sunset; sounds; night.

There will be another novelty on this program—Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theater."

Mr. Copland is a young composer of Brooklyn. He has written a number of works, of which his Symphony with Organ, performed by the Symphony Society in New York last season, and his "Music for the Theater" performed by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York this season, have been the most conspicuous. "Music for the Theater" is a suite whose movements include "Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque and Epilogue."

The concert will be introduced by a trumpet voluntary of Purcell, the early English composer, which has been arranged by Sir Henry Wood for organ, trumpets, trombones and drums.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 6 - 1926

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunday

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Symphony Which Will Play at "Y" Concert.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

This occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores.

The Terrace door will be open at 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

JAN 6 - 1926 159

Boston Symphony Will Play Sunda

Program of Variety Is Arranged for Auditorium Concert.

A program of variety will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the concert in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under Y. M. C. A. auspices.

It will consist of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, probably the best known of any Russian music. It was the last large score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement; of the second movement in five rhythm; the rushing march movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing.

The closing number by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular and well known of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

This occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores.

The Terrace door will be open at 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

---

symphony and the Loeffler work will be heard here for the first time. The "Scheherazade" music will be accompanied by the clavilux, with Thomas Wilfred at the keyboard of the instrument. Wilfred, a pioneer in the use of light as a fine art and inventor of the clavilux, has composed the visual setting for the Rimsky-Korsakoff work.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their second pair of concerts in New York this season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They will play Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" at the Thursday concert and "Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland, the American composer. The program will be introduced by a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, arranged by Sir Henry Wood. The matinee program will include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini,' Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Bloch's "Concerto Grosso" for strings (first time in New York) and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 3.

Marcel Salzinger, baritone, will be the soloist at the second noon concert of the Sunday Symphony Society tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock in Hampden's Theatre. Jo- for his

---

"Music for the Theatre," by Aaron Copland. This score, by the young American composer whose music has attracted considerable attention in the last two seasons, introduces the following movements: Prologue, dance, interlude, burlesque and epilogue. The program will be introduced by an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood of a "Trumpet Voluntary" of Purcell, scored for organ, trumpets, trombones and drums.

At the matinee Kousseritzky will perform for the first time in New York Bloch's latest published score, "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra with piano obbligato. Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony" will also be played on this program, which will open with a sonata by the early composer, Gaillard, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, and close with the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

OPERA FOR NEXT WEEK

Of principal interest among next week's concerts are the appearance of Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, as conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening and the Philadelphia Orchestra's programme under Leopold Stokowski on Tuesday. Mr. Casella will play some unfamiliar music by Monteverdi, Debussy's three nocturnes and his own "Italia."

Mr. Stokowski will introduce the Fifth Symphony of Nikolai Miaskovsky, a contemporary Russian who has written eight of them and all unknown here. Povla Frijsh will sing the solo part of C. M. Loeffeler's new "Canticle of the Sun," and Rimsky-Korsokov's "Scheherazade" will be given with Thomas Wilfred's keyboard color machine known as the "clavilux."

Other outstanding events of the week are the appearance of Eugene Goossens at the head of the New York Symphony Thursday, the Cincinnati Orchestra under Fritz Reiner on Wednesday, Ethel Leginska directing the Philharmonic tomorrow and the Boston Symphony's concerts on Thursday and Saturday, featuring Strauss's "Alpine" symphony at the one and Ernest Bloch's new concerto grosso at the other.

The more important recitals include John McCormack tomorrow

Purcell is an arrangement by Sir Henry Wood from a manuscript in the British Museum of the short piece which has also been arranged by Mr. Stokowski and played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is among the composers who have been quick to encourage and perform the music of Ernst Bloch. He has produced in Boston the suite for viola and orchestra, which should be heard here. He will play on Saturday afternoon for the first time in New York Bloch's latest score, published by Birchard of Boston, the "Concerto Grosso," written in the old style for string orchestra with piano obbligato. The work has already been heard, once under the composer's direction in Cleveland, in Philadelphia, in Chicago and in Boston. It contains an energetic prelude with strongly accented thematic material, punctuated by great chords; a dirge of simplicity and deep feeling, in a manner slightly Hebraic, though far from the wildness and poignancy of Bloch's avowedly Hebraic compositions; a "Pastorale," unconventional in style and interrupted with alternating "rustic dances" and a vigorous, strongly rhythmed fugue, into which is woven a thematic reminiscence of the first movement. This work was composed by Mr. Bloch in California two years ago. Is he, like Stravinsky, like many modern Frenchmen, also looking back to old forms and old methods of writing music for new inspiration?

Courant

JAN 6 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual Russian score which has attracted a great deal of atttntion in the western world, Scriabin's Third Symphony "The Divine Poem," will be the feature of the program at the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, to Hartford in a concert at the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 7. The Russian conductor was a friend of the late Scriabin, and a pioneer of his music in Russia. He may now still be called a prophet of the creative genius of this composer; for probably it has found no more sympathetic and eloquent an interpreter. The program will also include Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of A Faun"; and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick who will also present Giovanni Martinelli, famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be received.

---

bers at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, January 24. The seats and boxes for both events are now on sale at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

Richard Strauss's "Alpine" symphony as the principal matter of the evening. It had not been done here for a number of years, but at its first hearing it was admittedly one of Strauss's weakest efforts. Its repetition scarcely changed the original verdict. The piece is of ungodly length, diffuse, common place in ideas and their development—in short, a great to-do about very little.

Aside from the Strauss symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky played a trumpet voluntary by Purcell and young Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," an effective and well made piece of work done by this conductor recently at one of the League of Composers' concerts.

---

it is one of his least noteworthy efforts. But Strauss has a faculty for being interesting, even when inspiration is at low ebb. There are fine sonorous passages in the Alpine symphony, though there is little originality. If a lesser composer had written it, it would have attracted wide interest, but more is expected of the composer of "Salome," "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Hero's Life."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston leader, is a virtuoso conductor, and his orchestra is one of the best in the world. So the performance was brilliant. The trumpets and horns blew their top notes thrillingly. The full sonorous tone of the strings was good to hear. The wood winds and percussion instruments performed all but impossible feats of skill. Even the cow bells, which appear in the score, were manipulated cleverly. But it takes more than cow bells, high notes and fine sonorities to make a great symphony. It is ten years since Strauss wrote this musical picture of the highest Alps, and outside of three or four performances by the Philharmonic Society it has been neglected in New York. Even last night's virtuoso performance did not make it sound like inspired music.

---

standing. The audience showe pleasure. This audience has b again what the Boston Symphon diences were of yore in this citc of the most distinguished gatherings that any sympho to a resident or visiting.

Boston Symphony's Appearance Here, Outstanding Musical Event

Famous Orchestra to Give Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Auditorium Sunday—Big Program Expected to Draw Crowds—Serge Koussevitsky Conductor

A program of variety which is at once musically important and of direct appeal will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in its appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The program will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, one of the best known of any Russian music in this part of the world.

It was the last score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing. The "Euryanthe" overture, with its high brilliance and its songful and lovely largo, introduced by the strings in a mysterious pianissimo, is in keeping with the domantic story of Euryanthe, and the romantic nature of the composer himself.

The closing number of the program by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK POST

JAN 8 - 1926

conductor's stand before the last

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to repeat itself in a curious way. With the exception of a few short, nondescript periods under Fiedler, Paur and Rabaud, conductors who are primarily drill masters and conductors who are virtuoso interpreters seem to alternate with unfailing regularity. Mr. Gericke achieved the creation of the Boston Symphony as one of the most perfect orchestral instruments the world has known. He was succeeded by Mr. Nikisch, the renowned prima-donna conductor of his day. Mr. Gericke then came for a second term and again left a marvelously refined means of expression in the hands of Muck. After the war Mr. Monteux brought order out of chaos and rebuilt the famous organization, which had been almost as near destruction as the Rheims Cathedral. Now his place has been taken by Mr. Koussevitzky, who undoubtedly belongs in the Nikisch-Muck dynasty of the virtuoso-interpreter line.

Mr. Koussevitzky has an arresting personality and one that stimulates the popular imagination in a curious way. Before he ever set foot on these shores, there were enough people anxious to hear him, to restore the size of the Boston Symphony audiences to pre-war dimensions. Rumors about him ranged from the opinion that he was the greatest conductor this planet has ever known to the assertion that he could not read an orchestral score. This last piece of sublime nonsense almost ranks with the classic story of a lady who said that a certain other leader, who makes a habit of conducting without a score, "did not use his notes" because he "could not read music." If Mr. Koussevitzky cannot read a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

ENGLISH CONDUCTOR WILL LEAD SYMPHONY HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to have a distinguished guest conductor, Eugene Goossens, at its next Providence concert, in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 19. This English celebrity is likewise to appear at the regular pair of Boston concerts of the same week.

Goossens is looked upon in England as one of the most important conductors of the day, and in musical centres everywhere he is highly thought of as a composer. His English career as conductor has been mostly confined to the Queen's Hall Orchestra of London, and the orchestra of Sir Thomas Beecham with which he has conducted operatic as well as concert performances. Goossens first came to this country in 1923 to direct the orchestra of the Rochester School of Music. He is now conducting a series of guest appearances in New York over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goossens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting programme: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz;" Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E-minor; Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Sibelius's Tone Poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN CITIZEN

JAN 8 - 1926

Koussevitsky Presents Modern Music Here

Serge Koussevitsky's Brooklyn audience was ahorougfihly at seat last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season. The reason for this more or less unresponsive state of Mr. Koussevitsky's audience was the fact that the program was by far the most unorthodox the conductor has yet chosen fo rany concert in this borough. He presented the same program played Thursday night at Carnegie Hall, but with what different results it would be interesting to hear Mr. Koussevitsky himself state.

oT begin with, Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary," arranged by Sir Henry Wood, which opened the concert, required but a small part of the orchestra being scored for three trumpees, three trombones, kettle and side drums and organ, and when Mr. Koussevitsky joined the small group of players on the stage he was hardly expected, and received but slight welcome. Also the "Trumpet Voluntary," beautifully executed and a program rarity to be appreciated, ended before the audience quite knew what was happening, and the applause was slight.

Then came the number which, even despite the fact that civic pride should have come to the rescue for young Aaron Copland, the composer, is a Brooklynite, fell on ears that refused to accept their own eestimony. The number was Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theatre," given its first performance at the opening con

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Goossens to Lead Symphony Here

Eugene Goossens will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next Providence concert in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening. He has selected for presentation here the following programme: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor; Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Mr. Goossens has made his mark as conductor, composer and pianist in England, where he is one of the most distinctive figures of the day. He came to [illegible] as director of the Rochester

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

JAN 10 1926

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to visit Philadelphia and will be heard for the first time in a public concert here under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. The present season is the second of Mr. Koussevitzky in America at the head of the orchestra of Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

160

JAN 9 - 1926

PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in this city at 12.30 tomorrow afternoon for the program at the Auditorium. They come direct from concerts at Carnegie hall, New York city, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. One hundred musicians comprise the orchestra and a special car is required to haul the baggage.

There are 34 violins, 13 violas, 10 violincellos, 10 basses, three flutes, three oboes, three clarinets and three bassoons. Besides these there are the piccolo, the English horn, the bass horn and the contra-bassoon, eight horns, five trumpets, one tuba, two harps, two timpani, three percussions, the organ, piano and the celesta.

Koussevitsky Conducts

Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor and R. Burgen the concert master. In addition to the musicians there is the manager, W. H. Brennan, and a librarian. This is the 45th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Its appearance here creates a demand for tickets that goes beyond the capacity of the house. The program is as follows:—

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
I Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II Allegro con grazia.
III Allegro molto vivace.
IV Finale; Adagio lomentoso.
"Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," eclog by S. Mallarme ....DeBussy
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem No 3, Liszt

This great musical organization is perhaps the most popular in the world. On account of the oversubscription of tickets, the number of concerts to be given in Greater Boston this year has been increased to 73 as against 59, five years ago. It is said that this increased demand is largely

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Musical Notes

TWO ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The Goodrich Silvertown Chord Orchestra of radio fame, which has only been heard once in this city, will give two concerts at Emery's Majectic Theatre, Sunday, Jan. 17, Manager Sol. Braunig announced yesterday. Concerts will be at 3 and 8:15 p. m.

Graham McNamee, New York newspaperman and tenor, who has been a popular singer with the orchestra during its radio recitals, will appear with the unit in the coming concert.

The orchestra will also present, for the first time in this city, the Silver Masked Tenor, who has concealed his identity behind a silver mask and a golden voice for more than two years. The singer, one of the most popular radio favorites of the day always wears a mask.

Providence Post, American Legion, presented the orchestra, but not Mr. McNamee and his masked companion, in a program of dance music in this city last spring.

The orchestra will offer a different program of classical and popular numbers at each concert.

The ticket sale opens Monday at the Majestic Theatre box office.

The next Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 19th, will have a notable guest conductor, Eugene Goossens, the prominent English virtuoso and composer. Mr. Goossens is also to conduct the regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Boston at the end of the same week.

Goossens is a native of England, where he is considered by many as the principal conductor of the day. He is no less renowned as a composer, and his original compositions have been played with success in many parts of the world. First associated with the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, Goossens later became associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham's Orchestra, over which he conducted both concert and operatic performances. He has also been distinctive in conducting ballet in his own country. For three seasons, Mr. Goossens has been musical director of the Eastman School at Rochester. In the week past, he began a series of guest appearances over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goossens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting program: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor; Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and Sibelius' Tone Poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Bringing to Brooklyn the same programme played on the immediately preceding evening at Carnegie Hall in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night gave its second concert at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and decorous in the bestowal of its applause. Brooklyn audiences have never been among the first to accept the new, nor the last to reject the old.

The "new" on last night's programme was Aaron Copland's 'Music for the Theatre," conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky a month or so ago at the opening concert by the League of Composers. Mr. Copland is a native son of Brooklyn, and only twenty-six. The work heard last night was composed within the past eight months. "The composer had no play or literary idea in mind when writing 'Music for the Theatre'," Mr. Copland himself has explained "The title simply implies that, at times, this music has a quality which is suggestive of the theatre." The scoring is for small orchestra, with a goodly share of percussions, (including a "wood block") to enlieven the instrumentation. There are five short movements, denominated Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. As to contents, the composition does not quite reach major importance. At a few places there are hints, however, of inspiration. Young Mr. Copland is a modenist in spirit, but his writing is built upon very strong classical foundations. He is on the fence, it would seem. He is testing his idiom. He is on the verge of producing a genuine masterpiece. At the conclusion of his composition last night Mr. Koussevitzky drew the composer to the center of the stage, sharing with him a rather terid, or at least ultra-polite round of applause.

The "old" on last night's programme was a Trumpet Voluntary, for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ, arranged by Sir Henry Wood, the English conductor, from an old Purcell manuscript. This was the opening number, and since the Boston concerts begin on time, and since at least one Brooklyn music critic was a quarter-hour late, comment is hereby omitted.

But, for the programme's second part, came music that cannot be termed either exclusively old or new, namely, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, sketched in 1911, completed in 1915, first played in New York at a Philharmonic concert in 1916, presented at a Stadium concert (under Fritz Reiner) in the summer of 1924, and revived by the Boston Orchestra for the present season's repertoire. Last night's was the first Brooklyn performance.

During those years of non-performance, the "Alpine" Symphony, composed high in the Tyrolean Alps, was beginning to acquire for the average concertgoer, particularly the Strauss devotee, an esoteric designation; it absorbed touches of legendry; people raised their eyebrows and lowered their voices when they mentioned the "Alpine".

Nocturnal calm, the stilly hour before the dawn, too strongly reminiscent of a theme in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique"; premonition of melodic sterility that later is more fully revealed in hints of Donizetti's popular sextet, remote touches of Brahms' F major symphony and frank quotations from several of the composer's own tone-poems.

Strauss' score is a description of an Alpine day from just before dawn to just after sunset. Since, with his tonal paints, the Municher is an orchestral illustrator par excellence —using, besides the usual colors, those of [illegible], organ, wind machine, thunder machine, side drum, triangle, cow-herd bells, triple gongs and an aerophar, besides augmented strings, wind and brass—there is a beautiful sunrise, which for another composer might be termed an achievement. But Strauss, it is recalled, has in an earlier work written a more glorious sunrise. There are (in the "Alpine") interesting musical recitations of the day's thrilling (according to the programme) adventures. There is a detailed and delightful picturization of a shimmering mountain waterfall, a treatment of flowery meadows, arising mists, a dangerous moment on the glacier, "lost in the thicket," and—for the rest let there be merciful "et cetera."

It is giving no secret away to say that last night's audience was interested in the thunderstorm. Just why must remain a matter for critical conjecture, unless it was curiosity to hear the massed drums rolling and the wind-machine blowing. It came in due time. There was considerable noise, and, truth to tell, it outdid many natural storms. But noise alone doesn't make a storm; the shiver that trickles down one's spine is the test of the storm. Besides, any composer who is worth his salt can turn out a pretty good storm. In fact, who hasn't tackled the subject? It will have to be a mighty good composer, however, to surpass the first great storm, that of Beethoven's "Pastoral,' Strauss got off a fair sort of sun shower.

The "Alpine" is not a symphony, but a musical perambulation. Played without pause, it takes fifty minutes. Strauss has disregarded true and noble melody for a style that is at best needlessly sensational. The score has rhythmic vigor and many characteristic Strauss touches of novelty and daring, but the great humanness of an immortal symphony is in it nowhere to be found. It does not represent the composer in a period of inspiration. Rather does it prove that Richard Strauss at times can be the world's greatest uninspired

---

JAN 10 1926

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to visit Philadelphia and will be heard for the first time in a public concert here under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. The present season is the second of Koussevitzky in America at the head of the Orchestra of Boston. A full subscription and waiting lists are the rule in each city which this orchestra now visits. In Boston the number of concerts for this season is 76, as against 59 five years ago. This demand is largely due to the genius of Koussevitzky. He was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass. As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. He assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older master and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River, giving concerts in many towns,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 11 1926

* * *

This was the Bloch of a decade and more ago. The later Bloch is a far less perturbing figure. One listens quite comfortably, for example, to such

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EVE UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 11 1926

Orchestra Gives Musical Treat

Boston Symphony Draws Crowd of 4700 to Auditorium.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

Once a year one is sure of finding the Auditorium packed to capacity for a musical event. That is the day when the Y. M. C. A. brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town. This annual event attracted a record throng yesterday. Every seat in the Auditorium was taken, the Mahogany Room was filled and a hundred or more people stood in the foyer. The audience was estimated at 4700.

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage.

The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

Boston Symphony's Appearance Here, Outstanding Musical Event

Famous Orchestra to Give Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Auditorium Sunday—Big Program Expected to Draw Crowds—Serge Koussevitsky Conductor

A program of variety which is at once musically important and of direct appeal will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in its appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The program will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, one of the best known of any Russian music in this part of the world.

It was the last score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing. The "Euryanthe" overture, with its high brilliance and its songful and lovely largo, introduced by the strings in a mysterious pianissimo, is in keeping with the domantic story of Euryanthe, and the romantic nature of the composer himself.

The closing number of the program by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

The occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. and, in fact, the Boston symphony's appearance is always the series' most largely attended event. Each year the Y. M. C. A. has been obliged to turn away hundreds because all tickets have been issued. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. The terrace door wil be open at 2 and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NEWS

160

JAN 9 - 1926

PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in this city at 12.30 tomorrow afternoon for the program at the Auditorium. They come direct from concerts at Carnegie hall, New York city, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. One hundred musicians comprise the orchestra and a special car is required to haul the baggage.

There are 34 violins, 13 violas, 10 violincellos, 10 basses, three flutes, three oboes, three clarinets and three bassoons. Besides these there are the piccolo, the English horn, the bass horn and the contra-bassoon, eight horns, five trumpets, one tuba, two harps, two timpani, three percussions, the organ, piano and the celesta.

Koussevitsky Conducts

Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor and R. Burgen the concert master. In addition to the musicians there is the manager, W. H. Brennan, and a librarian. This is the 45th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Its appearance here creates a demand for tickets that goes beyond the capacity of the house. The program is as follows:—

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
I Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II Allegro con grazia.
III Allegro molto vivace.
IV Finale; Adagio lomentoso.
"Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," eclog by S. Mallarme ....DeBussy
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem No 3, Liszt

This great musical organization is perhaps the most popular in the world. On account of the oversubscription of tickets, the number of concerts to be given in Greater Boston this year has been increased to 76 as against 59, five years ago. It is said that this increased demand is largely due to Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America.

Leads Other Orchestras

In addition to Mr. Koussevitsky's work in America with the Boston symphony, he leads a series of concerts every season as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra, and also appears as conductor of the "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris.

In addition to the general house program that is being printed, the Y. M. C. A. is printing a special program containing the list of patrons. The patron idea is introduced for the first time this year. Persons contributing $5 are given special terrace door patron's tickets. This is done with the idea of trying to more fully meet the expenses in connection with bringing the orchestra to Springfield.

Front door tickets are issued free as usual and the regular season subscription tickets will be recognized at the terrace door. The terrace door opens at 2.00 and the front doors at 2.45 and the concert begins at 3.00. An offering will be taken following the symphony number.

The B

...preters seem to alt... ...ming regularity. Mr. Gerick... ...oved the creation of the Boston Symphony as one of the most perfect orchestral instruments the world has known. He was succeeded by Mr. Nikisch, the renowned prima-donna conductor of his day. Mr. Gericke then came for a second term and again left a marvelously refined means of expression in the hands of Muck. After the war Mr. Monteux brought order out of chaos and rebuilt the famous organization, which had been almost as near destruction as the Rheims Cathedral. Now his place has been taken by Mr. Koussevitzky, who undoubtedly belongs in the Nikisch-Muck dynasty of the virtuoso-interpreter line.

Mr. Koussevitzky has an arresting personality and one that stimulates the popular imagination in a curious way. Before he ever set foot on these shores, there were enough people anxious to hear him, to restore the size of the Boston Symphony audiences to pre-war dimensions. Rumors about him ranged from the opinion that he was the greatest conductor this planet has ever known to the assertion that he could not read an orchestral score. This last piece of sublime nonsense almost ranks with the classic story of a lady who said that a certain other leader, who makes a habit of conducting without a score, "did not use his notes" because he "could not read music." If Mr. Koussevitzky cannot read a score, then he is accomplishing a feat beside which all the achievements of all the other conductors are nothing.

Of last night's concert I unfortunately heard only the "Music for the Theatre," of Copland, as a result of my somewhat clumsy handling of a first attempt to "cover" two performances. This is not music about which one can form an opinion of much value at a first hearing. Not that it presents any idiom with which we are not more or less familiar, but its artistic purpose and intent seemed to me last night unclear. The thematic material and the way it was handled seemed two totally different things, for the joining of which I could find no particular reason.

...opened the concert, required but a small part of the orchestra being scored for three trumpees, three trombones, kettle and side drums and organ, and when Mr. Koussevitsky joined the small group of players on the stage he was hardly expected, and received but slight welcome. Also the "Trumpet Voluntary," beautifully executed and a program rarity to be appreciated, ended before the audience quite knew what was happening, and the applause was slight.

Then came the number which, even despite the fact that civic pride should have come to the rescue for young Aaron Copland, the composer, is a Brooklynite, fell on ears that refused to accept their own eestimony. The number was Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theatre," given its first performance at the opening concert of the League of Composers this season, with Mr. Koussevitsky, to whom the work is dedicated, conducting.

The applause at the close of this ultra-modern work was unimpressive and slightly questioning, and even the appearance of the young composer did not "bring down the house." The second hearing of this work brings out the real charm it hsa, an dshows how finely balanced and well-knit it is. Mr. Koussevitsky reads it with evident sympathy, and it fares extremely well in his hands.

The program ended with Strauss' little known "Alpine" symphony.

THE TRIBUN

munitions of war. This expedition w welcome addition to the infant country

"Fi... last... ...duct... ...n-
Hearing... ...On

Mr. G... ...made his mark as conductor, composer and pianist in England, where he is one of the most distinctive figures of the day. He came to America as director of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in 1923 and he still holds that position. Thursday afternoon he made the first of a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra, of which Walter Damrosch is the regular conductor. While Mr. Goossens included several modern compositions in his New York programmes, he stated that his interest in these is subordinate to that in the classical composers. His aim in all concerts, he says, is to given programmes of general interest to every school.

* * *

...where he is considered by many as the principal conductor of the day. He is no less renowned as a composer, and his original compositions have been played with success in many parts of the world. First associated with the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, Goossens later became associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham's Orchestra, over which he conducted both concert and operatic performances. He has also been distinctive in conducting ballet in his own country. For three seasons, Mr. Goossens has been musical director of the Eastman School at Rochester. In the week past, he began a series of guest appearances over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goossens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting program: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor; Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and Sibelius' Tone Poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Bringing to Brooklyn the same programme played on the immediately preceding evening at Carnegie Hall in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night gave its second concert at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and decorous in the bestowal of its applause. Brooklyn audiences have never been among the first to accept the new, nor the last to reject the old.

The "new" on last night's programme was Aaron Copland's 'Music for the Theatre," conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky a month or so ago at the opening concert by the League of Composers. Mr. Copland is a native son of Brooklyn, and only twenty-six. The work heard last night was composed within the past eight months. "The composer had no play or literary idea in mind when writing 'Music for the Theatre'," Mr. Copland himself has explained. "The title simply implies that, at times, this music has a quality which is suggestive of the theatre." The scoring is for small orchestra, with a goodly share of percussions, (including a "wood block") to enlieven the instrumentation. There are five short movements, denominated Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. As to contents, the composition does not quite reach major importance. At a few places there are hints, however, of inspiration. Young Mr. Copland is a modenist in spirit, but his writing is built upon very strong classical foundations. He is on the fence, it would seem. He is testing his idiom. He is on the verge of producing a genuine masterpiece. At the conclusion of his composition last night Mr. Koussevitzky drew the composer to the center of the stage, sharing with him a rather tepid, or at least ultra-polite round of applause.

The "old" on last night's programme was a Trumpet Voluntary, for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ, arranged by Sir Henry Wood, the English conductor, from an old Purcell manuscript. This was the opening number, and since the Boston concerts begin on time, and since at least one Brooklyn music critic was a quarter-hour late, comment is hereby omitted.

But, for the programme's second part, came music that cannot be termed either exclusively old or new, namely, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, sketched in 1911, completed in 1915, first played in New York at a Philharmonic concert in 1916, presented at a Stadium concert (under Fritz Reiner) in the summer of 1924, and revived by the Boston Orchestra for the present season's repertoire. Last night's was the first Brooklyn performance.

During those years of non-performance, the "Alpine" Symphony, composed high in the Tyrolean Alps, was beginning to acquire for the average concertgoer, particularly the Strauss devotee, an esoteric designation; it absorbed touches of legendry; people raised their eyebrows and lowered their voices when they mentioned the "Alpine".

Nocturnal calm, the stilly hour before the dawn, too strongly reminiscent of a theme in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique"; premonition of melodic sterility that later is more fully revealed in hints of Donizetti's popular sextet, remote touches of Brahms' F major symphony and frank quotations from several of the composer's own tone-poems.

Strauss' score is a description of an Alpine day from just before dawn to just after sunset. Since, with his tonal paints, the Municher is an orchestral illustrator par excellence—using, besides the usual colors, those of Heckelphone, organ, wind machine, thunder machine, side drum, triangle, cow-herd bells, triple gongs and an aerophar, besides augmented strings, wind and brass—there is a beautiful sunrise, which for another composer might be termed an achievement. But Strauss, it is recalled, has in an earlier work written a more glorious sunrise. There are (in the "Alpine") interesting musical recitations of the day's thrilling (according to the programme) adventures. There is a detailed and delightful picturization of a shimmering mountain waterfall, a treatment of flowery meadows, arising mists, a dangerous moment on the glacier, "lost in the thicket," and—for the rest let there be merciful "et cetera."

It is giving no secret away to say that last night's audience was interested in the thunderstorm. Just why must remain a matter for critical conjecture, unless it was curiosity to hear the massed drums rolling and the wind-machine blowing. It came in due time. There was considerable noise, and, truth to tell, it outdid many natural storms. But noise alone doesn't make a storm; the shiver that trickles down one's spine is the test of the storm. Besides, any composer who is worth his salt can turn out a pretty good storm. In fact, who hasn't tackled the subject? It will have to be a mighty good composer, however, to surpass the first great storm, that of Beethoven's "Pastoral,' Strauss got off a fair sort of sun shower.

The "Alpine" is not a symphony, but a musical perambulation. Played without pause, it takes fifty minutes. Strauss has disregarded true and noble melody for a style that is at best needlessly sensational. The score has rhythmic vigor and many characteristic Strauss touches of novelty and daring, but the great humanness of an immortal symphony is in it nowhere to be found. It does not represent the composer in a period of inspiration. Rather does it prove that Richard Strauss at times can be the world's greatest uninspired

---

JAN 1 0 1926

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to visit Philadelphia and will be heard for the first time in a public concert here under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. The present season is the second of Koussevitzky in America at the head of the Orchestra of Boston. A full subscription and waiting lists are the rule in each city which this orchestra now visits. In Boston the number of concerts for this season is 76, as against 59 five years ago. This demand is largely due to the genius of Koussevitzky. He was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass. As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. He assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older master and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River, giving concerts in many towns,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 1 1 1926

* * *

This was the Bloch of a decade and more ago. The later Bloch is a far less perturbing figure. One listens quite comfortably, for example, to such music as his Concerto Grosso for strings with piano obbligato that Mr. Koussevitzky played at Saturday's Boston Symphony concert.

But one does not expect or desire to listen comfortably to Ernest Bloch. That experience is not in the implied bond. If we must have these imitation musical antiques, these modernized concerti grossi and partitas after eighteenth century models, these plaster reproductions of Handel and Corelli and Bach and Vivaldi, our plea is that some one else—Stravinsky, for example—be granted a monopoly of the product. Bloch is geared for more arduous and exciting occupations.

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage. The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

Boston Sy phony's Appearance Here, Outstanding Musical Event

Famous Orchestra to Give Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Auditorium Sunday—Big Program Expected to Draw Crowds—Serge Koussevitsky Conductor

A program of variety which is at once musically important and of direct appeal will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in its appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The program will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, one of the best known of any Russian music in this part of the world.

It was the last score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the progra- Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing. The "Euryanthe" overture, with its high brilliance and its songful and lovely largo, introduced by the strings in a mysterious pianissimo, is in keeping with the domantic story of Euryanthe, and the romantic nature of the composer himself.

The closing number of the program by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

The occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. and, in fact, the Boston symphony's appearance is always the series' most largely attended event. Each year the Y. M. C. A. has been obliged to turn away hundreds because all tickets have been issued. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. The terrace door will be open at 2 and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

---

conductor's stand".

The P

c

few

Fiec

who

ducto ...preters seem to alt... ...ing regularity. Mr. Gerick... ...ved the creation of the Boston Symphony as one of the most perfect orchestral instruments the world has known. He was succeeded by Mr. Nikisch, the renowned prima-donna conductor of his day. Mr. Gericke then came for a second term and again left a marvelously refined means of expression in the hands of Muck. After the war Mr. Monteux brought order out of chaos and rebuilt the famous organization, which had been almost as near destruction as the Rheims Cathedral. Now his place has been taken by Mr. Koussevitzky, who undoubtedly belongs in the Nikisch-Muck dynasty of the virtuoso-interpreter line.

Mr. Koussevitzky has an arresting personality and one that stimulates the popular imagination in a curious way. Before he ever set foot on these shores, there were enough people anxious to hear him, to restore the size of the Boston Symphony audiences to pre-war dimensions. Rumors about him ranged from the opinion that he was the greatest conductor this planet has ever known to the assertion that he could not read an orchestral score. This last piece of sublime nonsense almost ranks with the classic story of a lady who said that a certain other leader, who makes a habit of conducting without a score, "did not use his notes" because he "could not read music." If Mr. Koussevitzky cannot read a score, then he is accomplishing a feat beside which all the achievements of all the other conductors are nothing.

Of last night's concert I unfortunately heard only the "Music for the Theatre," of Copland, as a result of my somewhat clumsy handling of a first attempt to "cover" two performances. This is not music about which one can form an opinion of much value at a first hearing. Not that it presents any idiom with which we are not more or less familiar, but its artistic purpose and intent seemed to me last night unclear. The thematic material and the way it was handled seemed two totally different things, for the joining of which I could find no particular reason.

---

s

M

V

W ... opened the concert, required but a small part of the orchestra being scored for three trumpees, three trombones, kettle and side drums and organ, and when Mr. Koussevitsky joined the small group of players on the stage he was hardly expected, and received but slight welcome. Also the "Trumpet Voluntary," beautifully executed and a program rarity to be appreciated, ended before the audience quite knew what was happening, and the applause was slight.

Then came the number which, even despite the fact that civic pride should have come to the rescue for young Aaron Copland, the composer, is a Brooklynite, fell on ears that refused to accept their own eestimony. The number was Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theatre," given its first performance at the opening concert of the League of Composers this season, with Mr. Koussevitsky, to whom the work is dedicated, conducting.

The applause at the close of this ultramodern work was unimpressive and slightly questioning, and even the appearance of the young composer did not "bring down the house." The second hearing of this work brings out the real charm it hsa, an dshows how finely balanced and well-knit it is. Mr. Koussevitsky reads it with evident sympathy, and it fares extremely well in his hands.

The program ended with Strauss' little known "Alpine" symphony.

"Fi

last duct ...n- On

Hearing

Mr. G... made his mark as conductor, composer and pianist in England, where he is one of the most distinctive figures of the day. He came to America as director of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in 1923 and he still holds that position. Thursday afternoon he made the first of a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra, of which Walter Damrosch is the regular conductor. While Mr. Goossens included several modern compositions in his New York programmes, he stated that his interest in these is subordinate to that in the classical composers. His aim in all concerts, he says, is to given programmes of general interest to every school.

* * *

... in Spring."

...s or-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NEWS

160

JAN 9 - 1926

PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in this city at 12.30 tomorrow afternoon for the program at the Auditorium. They come direct from concerts at Carnegie hall, New York city, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. One hundred musicians comprise the orchestra and a special car is required to haul the baggage.

There are 31 violins, 13 violas, 10 violincellos, 10 basses, three flutes, three oboes, three clarinets and three bassoons. Besides these there are the piccolo, the English horn, the bass horn and the contra-bassoon, eight horns, five trumpets, one tuba, two harps, two timpani, three percussions, the organ, piano and the celesta.

Koussevitsky Conducts

Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor and R. Burgen the concert master. In addition to the musicians there is the manager, W. H. Brennan, and a librarian. This is the 45th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Its appearance here creates a demand for tickets that goes beyond the capacity of the house. The program is as follows:—

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
I Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II Allegro con grazia.
III Allegro molto vivace.
IV Finale; Adagio lomentoso.
"Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," eclog by S. Mallarme ....DeBussy
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem No 3, Liszt

This great musical organization is perhaps the most popular in the world. On account of the oversubscription of tickets, the number of concerts to be given in Greater Boston this year has been increased to 76 as against 59, five years ago. It is said that this increased demand is largely due to Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America.

Leads Other Orchestras

In addition to Mr Koussevitsky's work in America with the Boston symphony, he leads a series of concerts every season as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra, and also appears as conductor of the "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris.

In addition to the general house program that is being printed, the Y. M. C. A. is printing a special program containing the list of patrons. The patron idea is introduced for the first time this year. Persons contributing $5 are given special terrace door patron's tickets. This is done with the idea of trying to more fully meet the expenses in connection with bringing the orchestra to Springfield.

Front door tickets are issued free as usual and the regular season subscription tickets will be recognized at the terrace door. The terrace door opens at 2.00 and the front doors at 2.45 and the concert begins at 3.00. An offering will be taken following the symphony number.

M

T

Bo

in

Ja

du

En

Go

pai

Bos

Go... where he is considered by many as the principal conductor of the day. He is no less renowned as a composer, and his original compositions have been played with success in many parts of the world. First associated with the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, Goossens later became associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham's Orchestra, over which he conducted both concert and operatic performances. He has also been distinctive in conducting ballet in his own country. For three seasons, Mr. Goossens has been musical director of the Eastman School at Rochester. In the week past, he began a series of guest appearances over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goossens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting program: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor; Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and Sibelius' Tone Poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Bringing to Brooklyn the same programme played on the immediately preceding evening at Carnegie Hall in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night gave its second concert at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and decorous in the bestowal of its applause. Brooklyn audiences have never been among the first to accept the new, nor the last to reject the old.

The "new" on last night's programme was Aaron Copland's 'Music for the Theatre," conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky a month or so ago at the opening concert by the League of Composers. Mr. Copland is a native son of Brooklyn, and only twenty-six. The work heard last night was composed within the past eight months. "The composer had no play or literary idea in mind when writing 'Music for the Theatre'," Mr. Copland himself has explained "The title simply implies that, at times, this music has a quality which is suggestive of the theatre." The scoring is for small orchestra, with a goodly share of percussions, (including a "wood block") to enliven the instrumentation. There are five short movements, denominated Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. As to contents, the composition does not quite reach major importance. At a few places there are hints, however, of inspiration. Young Mr. Copland is a modenist in spirit, but his writing is built upon very strong classical foundations. He is on the fence, it would seem. He is testing his idiom. He is on the verge of producing a genuine masterpiece. At the conclusion of his composition last night Mr. Koussevitzky drew the composer to the center of the stage, sharing with him a rather terid, or at least ultra-polite round of applause.

The "old" on last night's programme was a Trumpet Voluntary, for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ, arranged by Sir Henry Wood, the English conductor, from an old Purcell manuscript. This was the opening number, and since the Boston concerts begin on time, and since at least one Brooklyn music critic was a quarter-hour late, comment is hereby omitted.

But, for the programme's second part, came music that cannot be [illegible] either exclusively old or new, namely, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, sketched in 1911, completed in 1915, first played in New York at a Philharmonic concert in 1916, presented at a Stadium concert (under Fritz Reiner) in the summer of 1924, and revived by the Boston Orchestra for the present season's repertoire. Last night's was the first Brooklyn performance.

During those years of non-performance, the "Alpine" Symphony, composed high in the Tyrolean Alps, was beginning to acquire for the average concertgoer, particularly the Strauss devotee, an esoteric designation: it absorbed touches of legendry; people raised their eyebrows and lowered their voices when they mentioned the "Alpine".

Nocturnal calm, the stilly hour before the dawn, too strongly reminiscent of a theme in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique"; premonition of melodic sterility that later is more fully revealed in hints of Donizetti's popular sextet, remote touches of Brahms' F major symphony and frank quotations from several of the composer's own tone-poems.

Strauss' score is a description of an Alpine day from just before dawn to just after sunset. Since, with his tonal paints, the Municher is an orchestral illustrator par excellence [illegible] those of [illegible] machine, thunder machine, side drum, triangle, cow-herd bells, triple gongs and an aerophar, besides augmented strings, wind and brass —there is a beautiful sunrise, which for another composer might be termed an achievement. But Strauss, it is recalled, has in an earlier work written a more glorious sunrise. There are (in the "Alpine") interesting musical recitations of the day's thrilling (according to the programme) adventures. There is a detailed and delightful picturization of a shimmering mountain waterfall, a treatment of flowery meadows, arising mists, a dangerous moment on the glacier, "lost in the thicket," and—for the rest let there be merciful "et cetera."

It is giving no secret away to say that last night's audience was interested in the thunderstorm. Just why must remain a matter for critical conjecture, unless it was curiosity to hear the massed drums rolling and the wind-machine blowing. It came in due time. There was considerable noise, and, truth to tell, it outdid many natural storms. But noise alone doesn't make a storm; the shiver that trickles down one's spine is the test of the storm. Besides, any composer who is worth his salt can turn out a pretty good storm. In fact, who hasn't tackled the subject? It will have to be a mighty good composer, however, to surpass the first great storm, that of Beethoven's "Pastoral," Strauss got off a fair sort of sun shower.

The "Alpine" is not a symphony, but a musical perambulation. Played without pause, it takes fifty minutes. Strauss has disregarded true and noble melody for a style that is at best needlessly sensational. The score has rhythmic vigor and many characteristic Strauss touches of novelty and daring, but the great humanness of an immortal symphony is in it nowhere to be found. It does not represent the composer in a period of inspiration. Rather does it prove that Richard Strauss at times can be the world's greatest uninspired

---

JAN 10 1926

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to visit Philadelphia and will be heard for the first time in a public concert here under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. The present season is the second of Koussevitzky in America at the head of the Orchestra of Boston. A full subscription and waiting lists are the rule in each city which this orchestra now visits. In Boston the number of concerts for this season is 76, as against 59 five years ago. This demand is largely due to the genius of Koussevitzky. He was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass. As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. He assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older master and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River, giving concerts in many towns, small and large

ph

my

in h

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 11 1926

* * *

This was the Bloch of a decade and more ago. The later Bloch is a far less perturbing figure. One listens quite comfortably, for example, to such music as his Concerto Grosso for strings with piano obbligato that Mr. Koussevitzky played at Saturday's Boston Symphony concert.

But one does not expect or desire to listen comfortably to Ernest Bloch. That experience is not in the implied bond. If we must have these imitation musical antiques, these modernized concerti grossi and partitas after eighteenth century models, these plaster reproductions of Handel and Corelli and Bach and Vivaldi, our plea is that some one else—Stravinsky, for example—be granted a monopoly of the product. Bloch is geared for more arduous and exciting occupations.

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage.

The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

Boston Symphony's Appearance Here, Outstanding Musical Event

Famous Orchestra to Give Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Auditorium Sunday—Big Program Expected to Draw Crowds—Serge Koussevitsky Conductor

A program of variety which is at once musically important and of direct appeal will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in its appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The program will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, one of the best known of any Russian music in this part of the world.

It was the last score of this composer and was completed shortly before his death. The irresistible emotional appeal of its sweeping first movement, and final "adagio lamentoso," which sounds the utmost depths of orchestral speech, made the work immediately a favorite in Russia and in the West.

Another number will be Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy is perhaps best known by this setting in tones of Mallarme's poem, in which the faun (characterized by the flute) tries vainly to retain the dimming and evasive image of his recent experience with a group of nymphs. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any poetry of words could be. Koussevitzky is famous as an interpreter of Debussy. He was the first to make the Frenchman's music known in Russia.

Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" is also a part of the program. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures—crystalizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing. The "Euryanthe" overture, with its high brilliance and its songful and lovely largo, introduced by the strings in a mysterious pianissimo, is in keeping with the domantic story of Euryanthe, and the romantic nature of the composer himself.

The closing number of the program by Liszt, "Les Preludes," probably the most popular of this composer's scores, is of the utmost brilliance and may well be called an imposing spectacle in tones.

The occasion marks one of the high spots of the year in the course given by the Y. M. C. A. and, in fact, the Boston symphony's appearance is always the series' most largely attended event. Each year the Y. M. C. A. has been obliged to turn away hundreds because all tickets have been issued. Free and season subscription tickets may be had while they last at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. The terrace door wil be open at 2 and the front doors at 2.45. The concert will begin at 3.

---

conductor's stand

The P

ce

few

Fiec

who

ducto   eters seem to alt   ning regularity. Mr. Gerick   ved the creation of the Boston Symphony as one of the most perfect orchestral instruments the world has known. He was succeeded by Mr. Nikisch, the renowned prima-donna conductor of his day. Mr. Gericke then came for a second term and again left a marvelously refined means of expression in the hands of Muck. After the war Mr. Monteux brought order out of chaos and rebuilt the famous organization, which had been almost as near destruction as the Rheims Cathedral. Now his place has been taken by Mr. Koussevitzky, who undoubtedly belongs in the Nikisch-Muck dynasty of the virtuoso-interpreter line.

Mr. Koussevitzky has an arresting personality and one that stimulates the popular imagination in a curious way. Before he ever set foot on these shores, there were enough people anxious to hear him, to restore the size of the Boston Symphony audiences to pre-war dimensions. Rumors about him ranged from the opinion that he was the greatest conductor this planet has ever known to the assertion that he could not read an orchestral score. This last piece of sublime nonsense almost ranks with the classic story of a lady who said that a certain other leader, who makes a habit of conducting without a score, "did not use his notes" because he "could not read music." If Mr. Koussevitzky cannot read a score, then he is accomplishing a feat, beside which all the achievements of all the other conductors are nothing.

Of last night's concert I unfortunately heard only the "Music for the Theatre," of Copland, as a result of my somewhat clumsy handling of a first attempt to "cover" two performances. This is not music about which one can form an opinion of much value at a first hearing. Not that it presents any idiom with which we are not more or less familiar, but its artistic purpose and intent seemed to me last night unclear. The thematic material and the way it was handled seemed two totally different things, for the joining of which I could find no particular reason.

---

s

M

V

W   opened the concert, required but a small part of the orchestra being scored for three trumpees, three trombones, kettle and side drums and organ, and when Mr. Koussevitsky joined the small group of players on the stage he was hardly expected, and received but slight welcome. Also the "Trumpet Voluntary," beautifully executed and a program rarity to be appreciated, ended before the audience quite knew what was happening, and the applause was slight.

Then came the number which, even despite the fact that civic pride should have come to the rescue for young Aaron Copland, the composer, is a Brooklynite, fell on ears that refused to accept their own eestimony. The number was Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theatre," given its first performance at the opening concert of the League of Composers this season, with Mr. Koussevitsky, to whom the work is dedicated, conducting.

The applause at the close of this ultramodern work was unimpressive and slightly questioning, and even the appearance of the young composer did not "bring down the house." The second hearing of this work brings out the real charm it hsa, an dshows how finely balanced and well-knit it is. Mr. Koussevitsky reads it with evident sympathy, and it fares extremely well in his hands.

The program ended with Strauss' little known "Alpine" symphony.

C

F

P an

"Fh

last duct   On

Hearin

Mr. G   made his mark as conductor, composer and pianist in England, where he is one of the most distinctive figures of the day. He came to America as director of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in 1923 and he still holds that position. Thursday afternoon he made the first of a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra, of which Walter Damrosch is the regular conductor. While Mr. Goossens included several modern compositions in his New York programmes, he stated that his interest in these is subordinate to that in the classical composers. His aim in all concerts, he says, is to given programmes of general interest to every school.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NEWS

160

JAN 9 - 1926

PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in this city at 12.30 tomorrow afternoon for the program at the Auditorium. They come direct from concerts at Carnegie hall, New York city, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. One hundred musicians comprise the orchestra and a special car is required to haul the baggage.

There are 34 violins, 13 violas, 10 violincellos, 10 basses, three flutes, three oboes, three clarinets and three bassoons. Besides these there are the piccolo, the English horn, the bass horn and the contra-bassoon, eight horns, five trumpets, one tuba, two harps, two timpani, three percussions, the organ, piano and the celesta.

Koussevitsky Conducts

Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor and R. Burgen the concert master. In addition to the musicians there is the manager, W. H. Brennan, and a librarian. This is the 45th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Its appearance here creates a demand for tickets that goes beyond the capacity of the house. The program is as follows:—

Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
I Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II Allegro con grazia.
III Allegro molto vivace.
IV Finale; Adagio lomentoso.
"Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," eclog by S. Mallarme ....DeBussy
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem No 3, Liszt

This great musical organization is perhaps the most popular in the world. On account of the oversubscription of tickets, the number of concerts to be given in Greater Boston this year has been increased to 76 as against 59, five years ago. It is said that this increased demand is largely due to Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the orchestra, who is now beginning his second season in America.

Leads Other Orchestras

In addition to Mr Koussevitsky's work in America with the Boston symphony, he leads a series of concerts every season as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony orchestra, and also appears as conductor of the "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris.

In addition to the general house program that is being printed, the Y. M. C. A. is printing a special program containing the list of patrons. The patron idea is introduced for the first time this year. Persons contributing $5 are given special terrace door patron's tickets. This is done with the idea of trying to more fully meet the expenses in connection with bringing the orchestra to Springfield.

Front door tickets are issued free as usual and the regular season subscription tickets will be recognized at the terrace door. The terrace door opens at 2.00 and the front doors at 2:45 and the concert begins at 3.00. An offering will be taken following the symphony number.

Bo

in

Ja

du

En

Go

pai

Bos

Go   , where he is considered by many as the principal conductor of the day. He is no less renowned as a composer, and his original compositions have been played with success in many parts of the world. First associated with the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London, Goossens later became associate conductor with Sir Thomas Beecham's Orchestra, over which he conducted both concert and operatic performances. He has also been distinctive in conducting ballet in his own country. For three seasons, Mr. Goossens has been musical director of the Eastman School at Rochester. In the week past, he began a series of guest appearances over the New York Symphony Society.

Mr. Goossens will be heard in Providence in the following interesting program: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor; Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and Sibelius' Tone Poem, "Finlandia." As an interlude between the last two numbers, Mr. Goossens will conduct the English score of Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring."

Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Bringing to Brooklyn the same programme played on the immediately preceding evening at Carnegie Hall in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night gave its second concert at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and decorous in the bestowal of its applause. Brooklyn audiences have never been among the first to accept the new, nor the last to reject the old.

The "new" on last night's programme was Aaron Copland's 'Music for the Theatre," conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky a month or so ago at the opening concert by the League of Composers. Mr. Copland is a native son of Brooklyn, and only twenty-six. The work heard last night was composed within the past eight months. "The composer had no play or literary idea in mind when writing 'Music for the Theatre'," Mr. Copland himself has explained. "The title simply implies that, at times, this music has a quality which is suggestive of the theatre." The scoring is for small orchestra, with a goodly share of percussions, (including a "wood block") to enlieven the instrumentation. There are five short movements, denominated Prologue, Dance, Interlude, Burlesque, Epilogue. As to contents, the composition does not quite reach major importance. At a few places there are hints, however, of inspiration. Young Mr. Copland is a modenist in spirit, but his writing is built upon very strong classical foundations. He is on the fence, it would seem. He is testing his idiom. He is on the verge of producing a genuine masterpiece. At the conclusion of his composition last night Mr. Koussevitzky drew the composer to the center of the stage, sharing with him a rather tepid, or at least ultra-polite round of applause.

The "old" on last night's programme was a Trumpet Voluntary, for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ, arranged by Sir Henry Wood, the English conductor, from an old Purcell manuscript. This was the opening number, and since the Boston concerts begin on time, and since at least one Brooklyn music critic was a quarter-hour late, comment is hereby omitted.

But, for the programme's second part, came music that cannot be termed either exclusively old or new, namely, Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, sketched in 1911, completed in 1915, first played in New York at a Philharmonic concert in 1916, presented at a Stadium concert (under Fritz Reiner) in the summer of 1924, and revived by the Boston Orchestra for the present season's repertoire. Last night's was the first Brooklyn performance.

During those years of non-performance, the "Alpine" Symphony, composed high in the Tyrolean Alps, was beginning to acquire for the average concertgoer, particularly the Strauss devotee, an esoteric designation: it absorbed touches of legendry; people raised their eyebrows and lowered their voices when they mentioned the "Alpine".

Nocturnal calm, the stilly hour before the dawn, too strongly reminiscent of a theme in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique"; premonition of melodic sterility that later is more fully revealed in hints of Donizetti's popular sextet, remote touches of Brahms' F major symphony and frank quotations from several of the composer's own tone-poems.

Strauss' score is a description of an Alpine day from just before dawn to just after sunset. Since, with his tonal paints, the Municher is an orchestral illustrator par excellence—using, besides the usual colors, those of the heliphone, organ, wind machine, thunder machine, side drum, triangle, cow-herd bells, triple gongs and an aerophar, besides augmented strings, wind and brass—there is a beautiful sunrise, which for another composer might be termed an achievement. But Strauss, it is recalled, has in an earlier work written a more glorious sunrise. There are (in the "Alpine") interesting musical recitations of the day's thrilling (according to the programme) adventures. There is a detailed and delightful picturization of a shimmering mountain waterfall, a treatment of flowery meadows, arising mists, a dangerous moment on the glacier, "lost in the thicket," and—for the rest let there be merciful "et cetera."

It is giving no secret away to say that last night's audience was interested in the thunderstorm. Just why must remain a matter for critical conjecture, unless it was curiosity to hear the massed drums rolling and the wind-machine blowing. It came in due time. There was considerable noise, and, truth to tell, it outdid many natural storms. But noise alone doesn't make a storm; the shiver that trickles down one's spine is the test of the storm. Besides, any composer who is worth his salt can turn out a pretty good storm. In fact, who hasn't tackled the subject? It will have to be a mighty good composer, however, to surpass the first great storm, that of Beethoven's "Pastoral,' Strauss got off a fair sort of sun shower.

The "Alpine" is not a symphony, but a musical perambulation. Played without pause, it takes fifty minutes. Strauss has disregarded true and noble melody for a style that is at best needlessly sensational. The score has rhythmic vigor and many characteristic Strauss touches of novelty and daring, but the great humanness of an immortal symphony is in it nowhere to be found. It does not represent the composer in a period of inspiration. Rather does it prove that Richard Strauss at times can be the world's greatest uninspired

---

JAN 1 0 1926

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to visit Philadelphia and will be heard for the first time in a public concert here under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. The present season is the second of Koussevitzky in America at the head of the Orchestra of Boston. A full subscription and waiting lists are the rule in each city which this orchestra now visits. In Boston the number of concerts for this season is 76, as against 59 five years ago. This demand is largely due to the genius of Koussevitzky. He was first famous in Europe as a virtuoso of the doublebass. As a young man he toured the continent, surprising everyone by the beauty which he could elicit from this unusual instrument. He assembled an orchestra in his own country which soon became famous in Moscow and Leningrad, where he gave festivals devoted to the music of the older master and likewise championing the young creative genius of the day, both in his own and other nations. With this orchestra he traveled in a special steamer the entire length of the Volga River, giving concerts in many towns, small and large, and thus taking symphony concerts to provinces where such music was hitherto unknown. It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard in other European countries in his capacity of conductor. In Paris he inaugurated his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky," which have come to be an annual institution and which still from that time to this attract as much attention in Paris as any symphony concert. In London every season Koussevitsky is invited to lead a series of concerts as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's London Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Serge Kousscvitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage.

The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitaky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, justify superlatives. There were superlative performances and superlative interpretatives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city. Yesterday afternoon, as with the Strauss "Alpine" symphony on Thursday night, Mr. Koussevitsky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with an imagination and a virtuosos control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitsky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. One of them has very recently appeared here. The Boston Symphony Orchestra sounds today an a aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader.

It is testimony to the quality of the movement was not disguised in its sentimentality, but it was sung wi an adorable simplicity and a flawle luminous quality of tone that wo have glorified a composer of m modest merits than Mendellsohn. On again there was the realization of ho much the quality of a performance a fects the impression of music. W would not care greatly for the Italia symphony less sympathetically handle than it was yesterday afternoon, bu we would be very glad to hear th work again, played under Mr. Kou sevitsky, and are grateful to him f revealing as he did its charm an beauty. To accomplish this in a mo ern day and for a modern audienc may mean more than a spectacula triumph with a novelty by Bartok o Miascovsky.

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso fo string orchestra with piano obligat was heard here for the first time. I is in four movements—a sharply rhythmed Prelude, a Dirge, a Pastorale and a Fugue. The writing displays in a new guise the masterly technic of this composer and calls attention to a fact which may not be generally realized: that Ernest Bloch, with all his modern quality and the dramatic and restless spirit of much of his music, is a profound student of classic masters and has learned his job as a composer from first-hand study of their scores. There is no hesitation and no experimentation in this clear, strong piece of writing. A few modernisms of harmony are only such as to give bite and pungency to the sound; they do not disturb or confuse its style.

At a first hearing we prefer the Dirge and Pastorale to the other movements. The Dirge is simple but eloquent. Emotion is conveyed by very economical means. The Pastorale is unconventional in its form, in spite of dance rhythms and figures which may, as the composer has hinted, have been derived from Swiss dances that Bloch heard

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 1 0 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, presents the following program at Carnegie Hall:

Sonata in G Major..........Galliard
Symphony in A Major, "Italian," Mendelssohn
Concerto Grosso..........Bloch
"Daphnis et Chloe"..........Ravel

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared again under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting a program that consisted of two novelties and two rather familiar works, Mendelssorn's "Italian" Symphony and fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1 0 1926

The first meeting in the New Year of the Attleboro Round Table was held on Tuesday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Frederick Babcock, in South Main street. Mrs. Edgar H. Tregoning was the assistant hostess. Announcement was made of a musicale to be given on March 3 under the auspices of the Pierian and Round Table Clubs, when Paul Shirley of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a trio of artists will present a fine programme of music. Mrs. Catherine Eastwood, a member of the Round Table, gave an interesting talk on her personal experiences in "Gardening in the North End of Boston," and showed snapshots of the "Community Garden" and the boys and girls who are enthusiastic workers in the garden. Mrs. Eastwood also showed a sample of the certificate and a bronze medal given to the most efficient workers. She spoke of visits made to homes of these children, and there found flowers and vegetables growing in window boxes, on porches and roofs. A social hour followed the talk, when refreshments were served by the hostesses.

Mrs. Nellie Baxter of the Charleston

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 5 1926

For the first time in history, the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of 12 winter concerts. The complete orchestra will go on the air from station WEEI on the 23d and every Saturday night thereafter until the end of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 1 1926

Orchestra Gives Musical Treat

Boston Symphony Draws Crowd of 4700 to Auditorium.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

Once a year one is sure of finding the Auditorium packed to capacity for a musical event. That is the day when the Y. M. C. A. brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town. This annual event attracted a record throng yesterday. Every seat in the Auditorium was taken, the Mahogany Room was filled and a hundred or more people stood in the foyer. The audience was estimated at 4700.

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteaux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage.

The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

JAN 1 1 1926

The Boston Orchestra Plays Ernest Bloch

Unpleasant as the process may be, it is imperative that a moral be drawn from the afternoon of music Mr. Serge Koussevitsky and his men presented ~~at Carnegie Hall~~ Saturday. In fact, it is quite within the realm of possibility to suspect Mr. Koussevitsky of arranging his program to point that moral; for he played the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony in A major immediately before revealing for the first time in this city Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with piano obbligato.

The Gershwins and the Coplands and the Taylors should have been present to draw this moral—that the soul of a composer divided against itself must languish and fade into musical futility. In the Mendelssohn work is the echo of dissipated genius, of a Jew who refused to accept himself and his instincts and fled to the divided culture of Teutonic romanticism; the Bloch work is once again evidence of a strong soul who has realized himself in the roots of his own race, who has found in his own and his inherited experience the instinctive goal of his art.

If under the tender ministrations of Mr. Koussevitsky the "Italian" symphony could not flourish it never will, for the Boston orchestra gave the work such brilliant presentation and so glorious an ensemble in the strings that one could almost forget the dead vacuity underneath. Still the allegro remained sound and fury and even the pure, simple tone that was so suavely injected into the andante could not save the theme from its inner sentimentality. This theme alone seemed to proclaim Mendelssohn's defeat, for it is the search of an exile amid the warmth of Italian beauty and his discovery of an ordinary refrain redolent of Yiddish folk-jargon, neither Latin nor German, nor nobly Hebrew.

The Bloch Concerto Grosso proved to be interesting evidence of this composer's development. Bloch is perhaps the most personal of musicians and admittedly writing from that composition of instincts and experience that goes to make up his racial inheritance. And the Concerto Grosso is an eighteenth century form, extremely cerebral and usually abstract. What would this intense, personal musician do with such a form?

Of course, the concerto is modernized, but the process is not an intellectually provoked one. It is simply the disregard of restrictions by one whose musical vitality cannot tolerate conventions. The prelude contains a sharply rhythmed theme in rich, virile chords that seem to proclaim some stern pronouncement of a prophet. The second movement takes the form of a dirge and is patently the high point of the entire work. A simple grave theme is blended into a series of descending chromatic passages for the strings. This theme it is which contrasts in its intense feeling and dolorous sincerity with the too tender, superficially gesturing theme of the Mendelssohn symphony. The anti-polytonality fraternity will find in the dirge some passages to war against, but to the rational the tonal shocks will seem natural, unforced and certainly intrinsic within the subject matter.

The program notes inform us that the rustic dances which make up the third movement were inspired by the composer's mem

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1 0 1926

Eugene Goossens to Appear Here as Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Two Piano Recitals by Gabrilowitsch and Bauer Announced

With a lull in local musical events, following the concert by the Providence Festival Chorus and several special programmes by local clubs, interest of musicians here turned to New York last week, where important events were taking place. Announcements made during the week of future events of importance here included the appearance of Eugene Goossens as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week from Tuesday evening, a concert of two piano music by Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Harold Bauer on the 29th and a recital by Rosa Ponselle on Feb. 7.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 9 - 1926

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet-Voluntary; Aaron Copland, "Music of the Theater"; Richard Strauss, "Ein Alpensinfonie" (all first performances in Brooklyn). At the Academy of Music last evening.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky has always impressed me as a good showman. He has, over and above his talents as a conductor, a lively sense of the theatrical, which he applies unfailingly, so far as a New Yorker can tell, to the brewing of programs for his Boston Symphony concerts. The usual is never to be expected from this leading man of the Hub's orchestral stock company. It may be that he wears false whiskers (I often suspect that he does), but they are certainly becoming and verly cleverly simulate the real article. Even when he chooses a familiar tonal melodrama for his vehicle of personal display he is pretty sure to surround it with a lot of freshly painted scenery.

Having devoted the first of his Brooklyn appearances this season to a renovated set of tried box-office attractions, he realized the advantages of contrast and last evening executed a volte-face of singularly graceful nature. I am not so sure that his audience enjoyed the full effectiveness of this pirouetting, but if they didn't, it was certainly not Mr. Koussewitsky's fault. He chose his program of novelties with a skilled hand, devoting it in disproportionate thirds to Seventeenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Century composers. He offered Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell (that amazing modernist of the Restoration), a suite of "Music for the Theater," by Aaron Copland, a 25-year-old Brooklyn composer, and the "Alpensinfonie" of Richard Strauss. None of this music had ever before been played at the Academy, though the Purcell piece had what was probably its New York premiere Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the Copland suite first played some weeks ago in a Town Hall concert by the League of Composers, and the Strauss tonepoem unveiled by Josef Stransky in Carnegie Hall on October 26, 1916.

* * *

AS THE product of local genius, Mr. Copland's music had the position of honor on the program—it came just before the intermission. The composer himself was in the audience and at the conclusion of his piece Mr. Koussewitsky brought him out on the stage to make a bow to his listeners. Mr. Copland was, I feel, a trifle too adequate to the occasion. His music was coolly received, and if he overheard comments similar to those reaching my ears he probably went home muttering a certain honored Biblical quotation on the relations of prophets to the local government.

It was all a trifle unfair to the young composer. Very little modern music has been prominent on Academy of Music programs, but a proportion of last night's audience was certainly well enough acquainted with creative phenomena of the day to act up to the occasion with beter grace. When Mr. Damrosch put on Honegger's "Pacific 231" at one of his Saturday matinees, the applause was explosive. Large orchestras, I am afraid, exercise too great a fascination over the popular mind. Mr. Copland unwisely (though one cannot blame him for having failed to foresee an Academy of Music performance of his work) scored "Music for the Theater" for a small group of instruments; its eccentricities therefore stood out more brazenly than those of the Honegger piece. The noise-making power of a large band succeeds in stunning by mere weight of sound. The sparer utterance of a chamber orchestra is a little less deceptive.

Mr. Copland's suite is, for those who wish to regard it in the light of its conception, well wrought and individual music. Of the younger young men today Mr. Copland and George Antheil (of whom more later) seem to me the most individual and striking talents. "Music for the Theater" has a style, an idiom of its own—and of its composer's. It is not merely a deft rehash of radical cliches, but quite definitely something personal and above all sincere. Mr. Koussewitsky read it last evening with skill and wit. He,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 2 1926

OUR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contributions Still Needed To Meet the Year's Budget

To the Editor of The Republican:—

The splendid concert given in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, apart from the enjoyment it afforded, must have impressed that great audience with the value of such an organization to a city.

Such a concert was made possible not by the $2500 contributed by the friends of the Y. M. C. A., but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been spent in bringing this orchestra to its present state of perfection. The cost of training a great orchestra will always be greater than its actual earning power as the record of every symphony orchestra in America testifies.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year besides buying every ticket for every concert given the music lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency but its 10,000 individual patrons in Greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 3 1926

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS

Modest Work of Local Organization Compared with Boston's.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: The splendid concert given in the Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, apart from the enjoyment it afforded, must have impressed that great audience with the value of such an organization to a city.

Such a concert was made possible not by the $2500 contributed by the friends of the Y. M. C. A. but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been spent in bringing this orchestra to its present state of perfection. The cost of training a great orchestra will always be greater than its actual earning power, as the records of every symphony orchestra in America testify.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year, besides buying every ticket for every concert given, the music-lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency, but its 10,000 individual patrons in greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the local orchestra the directors need only an additional $1000 to carry through the excellent program planned to conclude the season without a deficit. They hope this will be forthcoming before the next concert in the Auditorium, Tuesday

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 1 5 1926

SYMPHONY TO BROADCAST.

Boston Orchestra to Put Its Twelve Winter Concerts on the Air.

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra will broadcast regular series of twelve Winter co certs, it was announced today. T complete orchestra will go on the a from Station WEEI on Jan. 23 a every Saturday evening thereaft until the end of the season.

The fact that season ticket holde have completely filled Symphony H for the past two seasons, to the excl sion of the general public, was a dete mining factor of the trustees to au thorize the broadcast.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, justify superlatives. There were superlative performances and superlative interpretatives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city. Yesterday afternoon, as with the Strauss "Alpine" symphony on Thursday night, Mr. Koussevitsky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with an imagination and a virtuosos control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitsky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. One of them has very recently appeared here. The Boston Symphony Orchestra sounds today an a aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader.

It is testimony to the quality of the movement was not disguised in its sentimentality, but it was sung with an adorable simplicity and a flawless luminous quality of tone that would have glorified a composer of more modest merits than Mendelssohn. Once again there was the realization of how much the quality of a performance affects the impression of music. We would not care greatly for the Italian symphony less sympathetically handled than it was yesterday afternoon, but we would be very glad to hear this work again, played under Mr. Koussevitsky, and are grateful to him for revealing as he did its charm and beauty. To accomplish this in a modern day and for a modern audience may mean more than a spectacular triumph with a novelty by Bartok or Miascovsky.

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra with piano obligato was heard here for the first time. It is in four movements—a sharply rhythmed Prelude, a Dirge, a Pastorale and a Fugue. The writing displays in a new guise the masterly technic of this composer and calls attention to a fact which may not be generally realized: that Ernest Bloch, with all his modern quality and the dramatic and restless spirit of much of his music, is a profound student of classic masters and has learned his job as a composer from first-hand study of their scores. There is no hesitation and no experimentation in this clear, strong piece of writing. A few modernisms of harmony are only such as to give bite and pungency to the sound; they do not disturb or confuse its style.

At a first hearing we prefer the Dirge and Pastorale to the other movements. The Dirge is simple but eloquent. Emotion is conveyed by very economical means. The Pastorale is unconventional in its form, in spite of dance rhythms and figures which may, as the composer has hinted, have been derived from Swiss dances that Bloch heard him apart from any other

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 1 0 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, presents the following program at Carnegie Hall:

Sonata in G Major................Galliard
Symphony in A Major, "Italian," Mendelssohn
Concerto Grosso..........................Bloch
"Daphnis et Chloe"......................Ravel

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared again under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting a program that consisted of two novelties and two rather familiar works, Mendelssorn's "Italian" Symphony and fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1 0 1926

The first meeting in the New Year of the Attleboro Round Table was held on Tuesday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Frederick Babcock, in South Main street. Mrs. Edgar H. Tregoning was the assistant hostess. Announcement was made of a musicale to be given on March 3 under the auspices of the Pierian and Round Table Clubs, when Paul Shirley of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a trio of artists will present a fine programme of music. Mrs. Catherine Eastwood, a member of the Round Table, gave an interesting talk on her personal experiences in "Gardening in the North End of Boston," and showed snapshots of the "Community Garden" and the boys and girls who are enthusiastic workers in the garden. Mrs. Eastwood also showed a sample of the certificate and a bronze medal given to the most efficient workers. She spoke of visits made to homes of these children, and there found flowers and vegetables growing in window boxes, on porches and roofs. A social hour followed the talk, when refreshments were served by the hostesses.

Mrs. Nellie Baxter of the Charleston

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 5 1926

For the first time in history, the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of 12 winter concerts. The complete orchestra will go in the air from station WEEI on the 23d and every Saturday night thereafter until the end of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 1 1926

Orchestra Gives Musical Treat

Boston Symphony Draws Crowd of 4700 to Auditorium.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

Once a year one is sure of finding the Auditorium packed to capacity for a musical event. That is the day when the Y. M. C. A. brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to town. This annual event attracted a record throng yesterday. Every seat in the Auditorium was taken, the Mahogany Room was filled and a hundred or more people stood in the foyer. The audience was estimated at 4700.

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteaux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage.

The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

JAN 1 1 1926

The Boston Orchestra Plays Ernest Bloch

Unpleasant as the process may be, it is imperative that a moral be drawn from the afternoon of music Mr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men presented at Carnegie Hall Saturday. In fact, it is quite within the realm of possibility to suspect Mr. Koussevitsky of arranging his program to point that moral; for he played the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony in A major immediately before revealing for the first time in this city Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with piano obbligato.

The Gershwins and the Coplands and the Taylors should have been present to draw this moral—that the soul of a composer divided against itself must languish and fade into musical futility. In the Mendelssohn work is the echo of dissipated genius, of a Jew who refused to accept himself and his instincts and fled to the divided culture of Teutonic romanticism; the Bloch work is once again evidence of a strong soul who has realized himself in the roots of his own race, who has found in his own and his inherited experience the instinctive goal of his art.

If under the tender ministrations of Mr. Koussevitsky the "Italian" symphony could not flourish it never will, for the Boston orchestra gave the work such brilliant presentation and so glorious an ensemble in the strings that one could almost forget the dead vacuity underneath. Still the allegro remained sound and fury and even the pure, simple tone that was so suavely injected into the andante could not save the theme from its inner sentimentality. This theme alone seemed to proclaim Mendelssohn's defeat, for it is the search of an exile amid the warmth of Italian beauty and his discovery of an ordinary refrain redolent of Yiddish folk-jargon, neither Latin nor German, nor nobly Hebrew.

The Bloch Concerto Grosso proved to be interesting evidence of this composer's development. Bloch is perhaps the most personal of musicians and admittedly writing from that composition of instincts and experience that goes to make up his racial inheritance. And the Concerto Grosso is an eighteenth century form, extremely cerebral and usually abstract. What would this intense, personal musician do with such a form?

Of course, the concerto is modernized, but the process is not an intellectually provoked one. It is simply the disregard of restrictions by one whose musical vitality cannot tolerate conventions. The prelude contains a sharply rhythmed theme in rich, virile chords that seem to proclaim some stern pronouncement of a prophet. The second movement takes the form of a dirge and is patently the high point of the entire work. A simple grave theme is blended into a series of descending chromatic passages for the strings. This theme it is which contrasts in its intense feeling and dolorous sincerity with the too tender, superficially gesturing theme of the Mendelssohn symphony. The anti-polytonality fraternity will find in the dirge some passages to war against, but to the rational the tonal shocks will seem natural, unforced and certainly intrinsic within the subject matter.

The program notes inform us that the rustic dances which make up the third movement were inspired by the composer's mem[illegible] of his boyhood

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1 0 1926

Eugene Goossens to Appear Here as Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Two Piano Recitals by Gabrilowitsch and Bauer Announced

With a lull in local musical events, following the concert by the Providence Festival Chorus and several special programmes by local clubs, interest of musicians here turned to New York last week, where important events were taking place. Announcements made during the week of future events of importance here included the appearance of Eugene Goossens as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week from Tuesday evening, a concert of two piano music by Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Harold Bauer on the 29th and a recital by Rosa Ponselle on Feb. 7.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 9 - 1926

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet-Voluntary; Aaron Copland, "Music of the Theater"; Richard Strauss, "Ein Alpensinfonie" (all first performances in Brooklyn). At the Academy of Music last evening.

* *

Mr. Koussewitzky has always impressed me as a good showman. He has, over and above his talents as a conductor, a lively sense of the theatrical, which he applies unfailingly, so far as a New Yorker can tell, to the brewing of programs for his Boston Symphony concerts. The usual is never to be expected from this leading man of the Hub's orchestral stock company. It may be that he wears false whiskers (I often suspect that he does), but they are certainly becoming and verly cleverly simulate the real article. Even when he chooses a familiar tonal melodrama for his vehicle of personal display he is pretty sure to surround it with a lot of freshly painted scenery.

Having devoted the first of his Brooklyn appearances this season to a renovated set of tried box-office attractions, he realized the advantages of contrast and last evening executed a volte-face of singularly graceful nature. I am not so sure that his audience enjoyed the full effectiveness of this pirouetting, but if they didn't, it was certainly not Mr. Koussewitsky's fault. He chose his program of novelties with a skilled hand, devoting it in disproportionate thirds to Seventeenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Century composers. He offered Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell (that amazing modernist of the Restoration), a suite of "Music for the Theater," by Aaron Copland, a 25-year-old Brooklyn composer, and the "Alpensinfonie" of Richard Strauss. None of this music had ever before been played at the Academy, though the Purcell piece had what was probably its New York premiere Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the Copland suite first played some weeks ago in a Town Hall concert by the League of Composers, and the Strauss tonepoem unveiled by Josef Stransky in Carnegie Hall on October 26, 1916.

* * *

AS THE product of local genius, Mr. Copland's music had the position of honor on the program—it came just before the intermission. The composer himself was in the audience and at the conclusion of his piece Mr. Koussewitzky brought him out on the stage to make a bow to his listeners. Mr. Copland was, I feel, a trifle too adequate to the occasion. His music was coolly received, and if he overheard comments similar to those reaching my ears he probably went home muttering a certain honored Biblical quotation on the relations of prophets to the local government.

It was all a trifle unfair to the young composer. Very little modern music has been prominent on Academy of Music programs, but a proportion of last night's audience was certainly well enough acquainted with creative phenomena of the day to act up to the occasion with beter grace. When Mr. Damrosch put on Honegger's "Pacific 231" at one of his Saturday matinees, the applause was explosive. Large orchestras, I am afraid, exercise too great a fascination over the popular mind. Mr. Copland unwisely (though one cannot blame him for having failed to foresee an Academy of Music performance of his work) scored "Music for the Theater" for a small group of instruments; its eccentricities therefore stood out more brazenly than those of the Honegger piece. The noise-making power of a large band succeeds in stunning by mere weight of sound. The sparer utterance of a chamber orchestra is a little less deceptive.

Mr. Copland's suite is, for those who wish to regard it in the light of its conception, well wrought and individual music. Of the younger young men today Mr. Copland and George Antheil (of whom more later) seem to me the most individual and striking talents. "Music for the Theater" has a style, an idiom of its own—and of its composer's. It is not merely a deft rehash of radical cliches, but quite definitely something personal and above all sincere. Mr. Koussewitsky read it last evening with skill and wit. He,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 2 1926

OUR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contributions Still Needed To Meet the Year's Budget

To the Editor of The Republican:—

The splendid concert given in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, apart from the enjoyment it afforded, must have impressed that great audience with the value of such an organization to a city.

Such a concert was made possible not by the $2500 contributed by the friends of the Y. M. C. A., but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been spent in bringing this orchestra to its present state of perfection. The cost of training a great orchestra will always be greater than its actual earning power as the record of every symphony orchestra in America testifies.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year besides buying every ticket for every concert given the music lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency but its 10,000 individual patrons in Greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 3 1926

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS

Modest Work of Local Organization Compared with Boston's.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: The splendid concert given in the Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, apart from the enjoyment it afforded, must have impressed that great audience with the value of such an organization to a city.

Such a concert was made possible not by the $2500 contributed by the friends of the Y. M. C. A. but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been spent in bringing this orchestra to its present state of perfection. The cost of training a great orchestra will always be greater than its actual earning power, as the records of every symphony orchestra in America testify.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year, besides buying every ticket for every concert given, the music-lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency, but its 10,000 individual patrons in greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the local orchestra the directors need only an additional $1000 to carry through the excellent program planned to conclude the season without a deficit. They hope this will be forthcoming before the next concert in the Auditorium, Tuesday

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 1 5 1926

SYMPHONY TO BROADCAST.

Boston Orchestra to Put Its Twelve Winter Concerts on the Air.

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra will broadcast its regular series of twelve Winter concerts, it was announced today. The complete orchestra will go on the air from Station WEEI on Jan. 23 and every Saturday evening thereafter until the end of the season.

The fact that season ticket holders have completely filled Symphony Hall for the past two seasons, to the exclusion of the general public, was a determining factor of the trustees to authorize the broadcast.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, justify superlatives. There were superlative performances and superlative interpretatives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city. Yesterday afternoon, as with the Strauss "Alpine" symphony on Thursday night, Mr. Koussevitsky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with an imagination and a virtuosos control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitsky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. One of them has very recently appeared here. The Boston Symphony Orchestra sounds today an a aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader.

It is testimony to the quality of the concert that while it opened with the electrical interpretation Mr. Koussevitsky gives of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture and yet offered as its high-water mark the exquisitely finished performance of Mendellsohn's "Italian" symphony. We have never listened to this symphony and thought so much of it, and the reason lay in its treatment. The orchestral sonority was another sonority than that which Mr. Koussevitsky would have summoned from the players for Strauss or Stravinsky. The song of the slow movement was not disguised in its sentimentality, but it was sung wi an adorable simplicity and a flawle luminous quality of tone that wo have glorified a composer of m modest merits than Mendellsohn. On again there was the realization of ho much the quality of a performance a fects the impression of music. W would not care greatly for the Italia symphony less sympathetically handle than it was yesterday afternoon, bu we would be very glad to hear th work again, played under Mr. Kou sevitsky, and are grateful to him f revealing as he did its charm a beauty. To accomplish this in a modern day and for a modern audienc may mean more than a spectacula triumph with a novelty by Bartok o Miascovsky.

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso fo string orchestra with piano obligat was heard here for the first time. I is in four movements—a sharply rhythmed Prelude, a Dirge, a Pastorale and a Fugue. The writing displays in a new guise the masterly technic of this composer and calls attention to a fact which may not be generally realized: that Ernest Bloch, with all his modern quality and the dramatic and restless spirit of much of his music, is a profound student of classic masters and has learned his job as a composer from first-hand study of their scores. There is no hesitation and no experimentation in this clear, strong piece of writing. A few modernisms of harmony are only such as to give bite and pungency to the sound; they do not disturb or confuse its style.

At a first hearing we prefer the Dirge and Pastorale to the other movements. The Dirge is simple but cloquent. Emotion is conveyed by very economical means. The Pastorale is unconventional in its form, in spite of dance rhythms and figures which may, as the composer has hinted, have been derived from Swiss dances that Bloch heard in his childhood. It has an undertone of melancholy. There is virility, sanity, a healthy grip in the Fugue, but this movement, and also the opening, are for us the conscious observance of a style. It is well done, very well done, and is interesting music. But these pages do not go as deep as the others, and we prefer to any of the Concerto heard yesterday the Bloch of the Jewish music. The Concerto Grosso is a work that would do credit to any modern composer, but the Hebraic intensity and wildness of Bloch's more racial expressions se him apart from any other

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

JAN 1 1 1926

The Boston Orchestra Plays Ernest Bloch

Unpleasant as the process may be, it is imperative that a moral be drawn from the afternoon of music Mr. Serge Koussevitsky and his men presented ~~at Carnegie Hall~~ Saturday. In fact, it is quite within the realm of possibility to suspect Mr. Koussevitsky of arranging his program to point that moral; for he played the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony in A major immediately before revealing for the first time in this city Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with piano obbligato.

The Gershwins and the Coplands and the Taylors should have been present to draw this moral—that the soul of a composer divided against itself must languish and fade into musical futility. In the Mendelssohn work is the echo of dissipated genius, of a Jew who refused to accept himself and his instincts and fled to the divided culture of Teutonic romanticism; the Bloch work is once again evidence of a strong soul who has realized himself in the roots of his own race, who has found in his own and his inherited experience the instinctive goal of his art.

If under the tender ministrations of Mr. Koussevitsky the "Italian" symphony could not flourish it never will, for the Boston orchestra gave the work such brilliant presentation and so glorious an ensemble in the strings that one could almost forget the dead vacuity underneath. Still the allegro remained sound and fury and even the pure, simple tone that was so suavely injected into the andante could not save the theme from its inner sentimentality. This theme alone seemed to proclaim Mendelssohn's defeat, for it is the search of an exile amid the warmth of Italian beauty and his discovery of an ordinary refrain redolent of Yiddish folk-jargon, neither Latin nor German, nor nobly Hebrew.

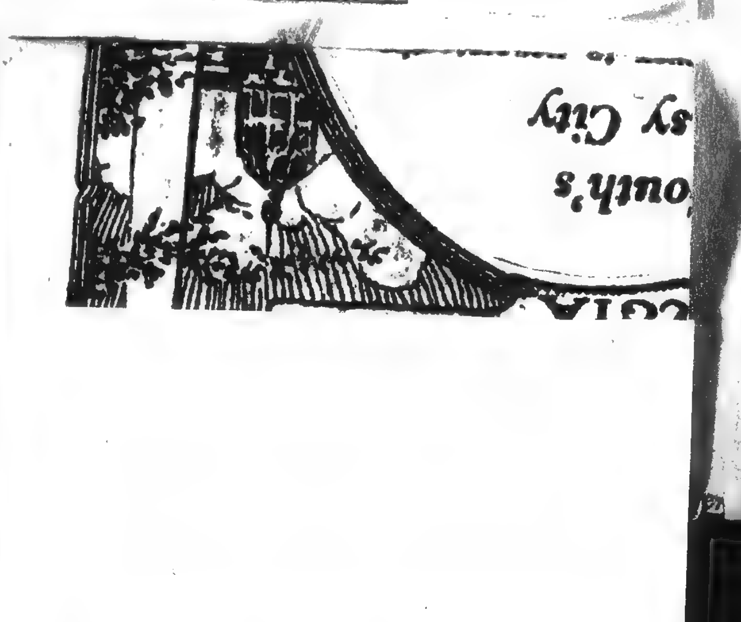
The Bloch Concerto Grosso proved to be interesting evidence of this composer's development. Bloch is perhaps the most personal of musicians and admittedly writing from that composition of instincts and experience that goes to make up his racial inheritance. And the Concerto Grosso is an eighteenth century form, extremely cerebral and usually abstract. What would this intense, personal musician do with such a form?

Of course, the concerto is modernized, but the process is not an intellectually provoked one. It is simply the disregard of restrictions by one whose musical vitality cannot tolerate conventions. The prelude contains a sharply rhythmed theme in rich, virile chords that seem to proclaim some stern pronouncement of a prophet. The second movement takes the form of a dirge and is patently the high point of the entire work. A simple grave theme is blended into a series of descending chromatic passages for the strings. This theme it is which contrasts in its intense feeling and dolorous sincerity with the too tender, superficially gesturing theme of the Mendelssohn symphony. The anti-polytonality fraternity will find in the dirge some passages to war against, but to the rational the tonal shocks will seem natural, unforced and certainly intrinsic within the subject matter.

The program notes inform us that the rustic dances which make up the third movement were inspired by the composer's memory of folk dances of his boyhood days in Switzerland. The dance rhythms however, seem alien to the rest of the work and rather ungainly as dances. It was not difficult to imagine Swiss peasants backsliding on the Alps in their terpsichorean efforts.

The final movement is a brilliant fugue which gave Mr. Koussevitsky's band an opportunity to display such perfect and brilliant playing as was surpassed not even by the Philadelphia Orchestra when they played the dazzling Balakirew "Islamey" dances early in this season.

Then, just for the devilment of it, the conductor closed the program with the wild ecstasy of Dionysian frenzy contained in the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" dances. Here as the Boston men soared to a brilliant virtuosity of a type rarely heard anywhere in the world, Mr. Arturo Toscanini, who was listening absorbedly in a box, leaned forward, stirred and excited; and when it was over found it difficult to restrain his enthusiastic applause.



THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 9 - 1926

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet-Voluntary; Aaron Copland, "Music of the Theater"; Richard Strauss, "Ein Alpensinfonie" (all first performances in Brooklyn). At the Academy of Music last evening.

Mr. Koussewitsky has always impressed me as a good showman. He has, over and above his talents as a conductor, a lively sense of the theatrical, which he applies unfailingly, so far as a New Yorker can tell, to the brewing of programs for his Boston Symphony concerts. The usual is never to be expected from this leading man of tho Hub's orchestral stock company. It may be that he wears false whiskers (I often suspect that he does), but they are certainly becoming and verly cleverly simulate the real article. Even when he chooses a familiar tonal melodrama for his vehicle of personal display he is pretty sure to surround it with a lot of freshly painted scenery.

Having devoted the first of his Brooklyn appearances this season to a renovated set of tried box-office attractions, he realized the advantages of contrast and last evening executed a volte-face of singularly graceful nature. I am not so sure that his audience enjoyed the full effectiveness of this pirouetting, but if they didn't, it was certainly not Mr. Koussewitsky's fault. He chose his program of novelties with a skilled hand, devoting it in disproportionate thirds to Seventeenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Century composers. He offered Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell (that amazing modernist of the Restoration), a suite of "Music for the Theater," by Aaron Copland, a 25-year-old Brooklyn composer, and the "Alpensinfonie" of Richard Strauss. None of this music had ever before been played at the Academy though the Purcell piece had what was probably its New York premiere Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the Copland suite first played some weeks ago in a Town Hall concert by the League of Composers, and the Strauss tonepoem unveiled by Josef Stransky in Carnegie Hall on October 26, 1916.

* * *

AS THE product of local genius, Mr. Copland's music had the position of honor on the program—it came just before the intermission. The composer himself was in the audience and at the conclusion of his piece Mr. Koussewitsky brought him out on the stage to make a bow to his listeners. Mr. Copland was, I feel, a trifle too adequate to the occasion. His music was coolly received, and if he overheard comments similar to those reaching my ears he probably went home muttering a certain honored Biblical quotation on the relations of prophets to the local government.

It was all a trifle unfair to the young composer. Very little modern music has been prominent on Academy of Music programs, but a proportion of last night's audience was certainly well enough acquainted with creative phenomena of the day to act up to the occasion with beter grace. When Mr. Damrosch put on Honegger's "Pacific 231" at one of his Saturday matinees, the applause was explosive. Large orchestras, I am afraid, exercise too great a fascination over the popular mind. Mr. Copland unwisely (though one cannot blame him for having failed to foresee an Academy of Music performance of his work) scored "Music for the Theater" for a small group of instruments; its eccentricities therefore stood out more brazenly than those of the Honegger piece. The noise-making power of a large band succeeds in stunning by mere weight of sound. The sparer utterance of a chamber orchestra is a little less deceptive.

Mr. Copland's suite is, for those who wish to regard it in the light of its conception, well wrought and individual music. Of the younger young men today Mr. Copland and George Antheil (of whom more later) seem to me the most individual and striking talents. "Music for the Theater" has a style, an idiom of its own—and of its composer's. It is not merely a deft rehash of radical cliches, but quite definitely something personal and above all sincere. Mr. Koussewitsky read it last evening with skill and wit. He,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS. 161

JAN 1 2 1926

OUR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contributions Still Needed To Meet the Year's Budget

To the Editor of The Republican:—

The splendid concert given in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, apart from the enjoyment it afforded, must have impressed that great audience with the value of such an organization to a city.

Such a concert was made possible not by the $2500 contributed by the friends of the Y. M. C. A., but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been spent in bringing this orchestra to its present state of perfection. The cost of training a great orchestra will always be greater than its actual earning power as the record of every symphony orchestra in America testifies.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year besides buying every ticket for every concert given the music lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency but its 10,000 individual patrons in Greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the local orchestra the directors need only an additional $1000 to carry through the excellent program planned and conclude the season without a deficit. They hope this will be forthcoming before the next concert in the Auditorium Tuesday evening, the 19th, when the brilliant Russian pianist Leff Pouishnoff will appear as soloist with the orchestra.

EDWARD H. MARSH, Secretary.
Springfield, January 11, 1926.

its actual earning ... records of every symphony orchestra in America testify.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year, besides buying every ticket for every concert given, the music-lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency, but its 10,000 individual patrons in greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the local orchestra the directors need only an additional $1000 to carry through the excellent program planned to conclude the season without a deficit. They hope this will be forthcoming before the next concert in the Auditorium, Tuesday evening, Jan. 19, when the brilliant Russian pianist, Leff Pouishnoff, will appear as soloist with the orchestra.

EDWARD H. MARSH,
Secretary Springfield Symphony Orchestra.
Springfield, Jan. 12, 1926.

Symphony in A major,
Concerto Grosso..........Bloch
"Daphnis et Chloe"..........Ravel

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared again under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting a program that consisted of two novelties and two rather familiar works, Mendelssorn's "Italian" Symphony and fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

One of the novelties, a Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with Piano Obbligato, by Bloch, was a work of some proportions. But that does not mean it had imagination or spirit; it was dull. The piece was singularly monotonous, a quality accentuated by a rather precise and militaristic reading on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky. There were moments of beauty, when it seemed as though the piece might any moment develop into something, but they were quickly lost in a depressing return to a mood quite in the ordinary.

---

certificate and a bronze medal given to the most efficient workers. She spoke of visits made to homes of these children, and there found flowers and vegetables growing in window boxes, on porches and roofs. A social hour followed the talk, when refreshments were served by the hostesses.

Mrs. Nellie Baxter of the Charleston

---

yesterday. Every seat in the Auditorium was taken, the Mahogany Room was filled and a hundred or more people stood in the foyer. The audience was estimated at 4700.

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteaux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage. The brilliance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orche

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 5 1926

For the first time in history, the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of 12 winter concerts. The complete orchestra will go in the air from station WEEI on the 23d and every Saturday night thereafter until the end of the season.

---

certs, it was announced complete orchestra will go on the from Station WEEI on Jan. 23 a every Saturday evening thereaf until the end of the season.

The fact that season ticket hold have completely filled Symphony H for the past two seasons, to the excl sion of the general public, was a dete mining factor of the trustees to au thorize the broadcast.

---

chestra is to heard for ncert here tor, Serge will take on Mone present sevitsky in chestra of and wait-ity which oston the season is go. This genius of famous in oublebass.
continent,
ty which al instru-ic in his e famous where he music of champion-of the day,
ons. With a special the Volga
y towns.

UNE

1926 decade and is a far e listens le, to such

ON MASS.

1926 es

Treat

Draws
00 to n.
CLARK.

ire of finding to capacity hat is the day brings the Bosto town. This record throng in the Audithe Mahogany a hundred or he foyer. The
at 4700.
made his second orchestra in en a warm welgnetism, an ele-ut this conduct-to him. He had mbered from last ones it seemed.
s in a masterly
st gesture means ined marvelous ra which knows last year.
little in the way
verture to "Eury-Tschaikowsky's
ony No. 6; Debus-
Afternoon of a Preludes" of Liszt ere on various seem to be the estras to play to write of the Symphony Or-
Monteux it re-brilliance and
Mr. Koussevitz-brilliance.
symphony was ment. At the ement there was rst of applause the conductor silent between was at all times ance seldom atgreatest orcheslightness where ired, whispering ty crescendos, in wildering display inal movement of h its underlying a magnificent dis-was reminded of cital of the Clavi-er new beauties in Faun." Its mys-
chness of chords
at every hearing.
strings and wood
ch lovely passage.
the opening overin the sparkle of h closed the pro-section achieved
al feats and there
s of performance
one away.
s the tremendous ays hears this an-wonders if it might ng other orchestras course the concert
"Y" is free but it to suppose that a he 4700 people in the rday would be will-

161

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, justify superlatives. There were superlative performances and superlative interpretatives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city. Yesterday afternoon, as with the Strauss "Alpine" symphony on Thursday night, Mr. Koussevitsky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with an imagination and a virtuosos control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable orchestral performances which have been given thus far in New York.

The concert left no doubt of the remarkable development the orchestra has undergone under Mr. Koussevitsky. The brilliancy of the tone was matched by its lustre and fineness of texture. There are other orchestras which achieve a certain hard precision or a brass band quality of effectiveness. One of them has very recently appeared here. The Boston Symphony Orchestra sounds today an a aggregation of artists, most of them virtuosos, all of them men capable of instant and adequate response to the wishes of a magnetic leader.

It is testimony to the quality of the concert that while it opened with the electrical interpretation Mr. Koussevitsky gives of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture and yet offered as its high-water mark the exquisitely finished performance of Mendellsohn's "Italian" symphony. We have never listened to this symphony and thought so much of it, and the reason lay in its treatment. The orchestral sonority was another sonority than that which Mr. Koussevitsky would have summoned from the players for Strauss or Stravinsky. The song of the slow movement was not disguised in its sentimentality, but it was sung with an adorable simplicity and a flawless luminous quality of tone that would have glorified a composer of more modest merits than Mendellsohn. Once again there was the realization of how much the quality of a performance affects the impression of music. We would not care greatly for the Italian symphony less sympathetically handled than it was yesterday afternoon, but we would be very glad to hear this work again, played under Mr. Koussevitsky, and are grateful to him for revealing as he did its charm and beauty. To accomplish this in a modern day and for a modern audience may mean more than a spectacular triumph with a novelty by Bartok or Miascovsky.

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra with piano obligato was heard here for the first time. It is in four movements—a sharply rhythmed Prelude, a Dirge, a Pastorale and a Fugue. The writing displays in a new guise the masterly technic of this composer and calls attention to a fact which may not be generally realized: that Ernest Bloch, with all his modern quality and the dramatic and restless spirit of much of his music, is a profound student of classic masters and has learned his job as a composer from first-hand study of their scores. There is no hesitation and no experimentation in this clear, strong piece of writing. A few modernisms of harmony are only such as to give bite and pungency to the sound; they do not disturb or confuse its style.

At a first hearing we prefer the Dirge and Pastorale to the other movements. The Dirge is simple but eloquent. Emotion is conveyed by very economical means. The Pastorale is unconventional in its form, in spite of dance rhythms and figures which may, as the composer has hinted, have been derived from Swiss dances that Bloch heard in his childhood. It has an undertone of melancholy. There is virility, sanity, a healthy grip in the Fugue, but this movement, and also the opening, are for us the conscious observance of a style. It is well done, very well done, and is interesting music. But these pages do not go as deep as the others, and we prefer to any of the Concerto heard yesterday the Bloch of the Jewish music. The Concerto Grosso is a work that would do credit to any modern composer, but the Hebraic intensity and wildness of Bloch's more racial expressions se

---

Symphony in A Major, "Italian" ......
Concerto Grosso.................Bloch
"Daphnis et Chloe"..............Ravel

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared again under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting a program that consisted of two novelties and two rather familiar works, Mendelssorn's "Italian" Symphony and fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

One of the novelties, a Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with Piano Obbligato, by Bloch, was a work of some proportions. But that does not mean it had imagination or spirit; it was dull. The piece was singularly monotonous, a quality accentuated by a rather precise and militaristic reading on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky. There were moments of beauty, when it seemed as though the piece might any moment develop into something, but they were quickly lost in a depressing return to a mood quite in the ordinary.

---

certificate and a bronze medal given to the most efficient workers. She spoke of visits made to homes of these children, and there found flowers and vegetables growing in window boxes, on porches and roofs. A social hour followed the talk, when refreshments were served by the hostesses.

Mrs. Nellie Baxter of the Charleston

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 1 5 1926

For the first time in history, the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of 12 winter concerts. The complete orchestra will go in the air from station WEEI on the 23d and every Saturday night thereafter until the end of the season.

---

yesterday. Every seat in the Auditorium was taken, the Mahogany Room was filled and a hundred or more people stood in the foyer. The audience was estimated at 4700.

Serge Koussevitzky made his second appearance with the orchestra in Springfield and was given a warm welcome. There is a magnetism, an elegance and virility about this conductor that draws people to him. He had all the gestures remembered from last year and a few added ones it seemed. He handles his hands in a masterly manner. The slightest gesture means something and he obtained marvelous effects from an orchestra which knows him better than it did last year.

The program offered little in the way of novelties. The overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes" of Liszt have all been heard here on various occasions. It does not seem to be the policy for visiting orchestras to play novelties when on tour.

There is little new to write of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under Mr. Monteaux it returned to its pre-war brilliance and perfection and under Mr. Koussevitzky it has gained added brilliance.

His reading of the symphony was a magnificent achievement. At the close of the third movement there was a spontaneous outburst of applause although previously the conductor had held the audience silent between movements. There was at all times a perfection of balance seldom attained except by the greatest orchestras. There was lightness where lightness was required, whispering pianissimos and mighty crescendos, in fact there was a bewildering display of tonal color.

Especially in the final movement of the symphony with its underlying sadness was there a magnificent display of color. One was reminded of the recent color recital of the Clavilux. There are ever new beauties in the "Afternoon of a Faun." Its mysteriousness, its richness of chords brings new delights at every hearing. The beauty of the strings and wood winds enhanced each lovely passage.

The brillance of the opening overture was echoed in the sparkle of the preludes which closed the program. The string section achieved tremendous technical feats and there was a smoothness of performance that fairly swept one away.

When one notes the tremendous audience that always hears this annual concert one wonders if it might not be well to bring other orchestras to the city. Of course the concert sponsored by the "Y" is free but it seems reasonable to suppose that a greater part of the 4700 people in the Auditorium yesterday would be willing to pay to hear other large orchestras. However music lovers in Springfield owe a debt to the Y. M. C. A. for this annual concert, for were it not for the "Y," Springfield would be signally void of visiting orchestras.

---

him apart from any other

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK POST

JAN 1 1 1926

The Boston Orchestra Plays Ernest Bloch

Unpleasant as the process may be, it is imperative that a moral be drawn from the afternoon of music Mr. Serge Koussevitsky and his men presented at Carnegie Hall Saturday. In fact, it is quite within the realm of possibility to suspect Mr. Koussevitsky of arranging his program to point that moral; for he played the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony in A major immediately before revealing for the first time in this city Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with piano obbligato.

The Gershwins and the Coplands and the Taylors should have been present to draw this moral—that the soul of a composer divided against itself must languish and fade into musical futility. In the Mendelssohn work is the echo of dissipated genius, of a Jew who refused to accept himself and his instincts and fled to the divided culture of Teutonic romanticism; the Bloch work is once again evidence of a strong soul who has realized himself in the roots of his own race, who has found in his own and his inherited experience the instinctive goal of his art.

If under the tender ministrations of Mr. Koussevitsky the "Italian" symphony could not flourish it never will, for the Boston orchestra gave the work such brilliant presentation and so glorious an ensemble in the strings that one could almost forget the dead vacuity underneath. Still the allegro remained sound and fury and even the pure, simple tone that was so suavely injected into the andante could not save the theme from its inner sentimentality. This theme alone seemed to proclaim Mendelssohn's defeat, for it is the search of an exile amid the warmth of Italian beauty and his discovery of an ordinary refrain redolent of Yiddish folk-jargon, neither Latin nor German, nor nobly Hebrew.

The Bloch Concerto Grosso proved to be interesting evidence of this composer's development. Bloch is perhaps the most personal of musicians and admittedly writing from that composition of instincts and experience that goes to make up his racial inheritance. And the Concerto Grosso is an eighteenth century form, extremely cerebral and usually abstract. What would this intense, personal musician do with such a form?

Of course, the concerto is modernized, but the process is not an intellectually provoked one. It is simply the disregard of restrictions by one whose musical vitality cannot tolerate conventions. The prelude contains a sharply rhythmed theme in rich, virile chords that seem to proclaim some stern pronouncement of a prophet. The second movement takes the form of a dirge and is patently the high point of the entire work. A simple grave theme is blended into a series of descending chromatic passages for the strings. This theme it is which contrasts in its intense feeling and dolorous sincerity with the too tender, superficially gesturing theme of the Mendelssohn symphony. The anti-polytonality fraternity will find in the dirge some passages to war against, but to the rational the tonal shocks will seem natural, unforced and certainly intrinsic within the subject matter.

The program notes inform us that the rustic dances which make up the third movement were inspired by the composer's memory of folk dances of his boyhood days in Switzerland. The dance rhythms however, seem alien to the rest of the work and rather ungainly as dances. It was not difficult to imagine Swiss peasants backsliding on the Alps in their terpsichorean efforts.

The final movement is a brilliant fugue which gave Mr. Koussevitsky's band an opportunity to display such perfect and brilliant playing as was surpassed not even by the Philadelphia Orchestra when they played the dazzling Balakirew "Islamey" dances early in this season.

Then, just for the devilment of it, the conductor closed the program with the wild ecstasy of Dionysian frenzy contained in the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" dances. Here as the Boston men soared to a brilliant virtuosity of a type rarely heard anywhere in the world, Mr. Arturo Toscanini, who was listening absorbedly in a box, leaned forward, stirred and excited; and when it was over found it difficult to restrain his enthusiastic applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 9 - 1926

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Purcell-Wood, Trumpet-Voluntary; Aaron Copland, "Music of the Theater"; Richard Strauss, "Ein Alpensinfonie" (all first performances in Brooklyn). At the Academy of Music last evening.

Mr. Koussewitsky has always impressed me as a good showman. He has, over and above his talents as a conductor, a lively sense of the theatrical, which he applies unfailingly, so far as a New Yorker can tell, to the brewing of programs for his Boston Symphony concerts. The usual is never to be expected from this leading man of the Hub's orchestral stock company. It may be that he wears false whiskers (I often suspect that he does), but they are certainly becoming and verly cleverly simulate the real article. Even when he chooses a familiar tonal melodrama for his vehicle of personal display he is pretty sure to surround it with a lot of freshly painted scenery.

Having devoted the first of his Brooklyn appearances this season to a renovated set of tried box-office attractions, he realized the advantages of contrast and last evening executed a volte-face of singularly graceful nature. I am not so sure that his audience enjoyed the full effectiveness of this pirouetting, but if they didn't, it was certainly not Mr. Koussewitsky's fault. He chose his program of novelties with a skilled hand, devoting it in disproportionate thirds to Seventeenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Century composers. He offered Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell (that amazing modernist of the Restoration), a suite of "Music for the Theater," by Aaron Copland, a 25-year-old Brooklyn composer, and the "Alpensinfonie" of Richard Strauss. None of this music had ever before been played at the Academy, though the Purcell piece had what was probably its New York premiere Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the Copland suite first played some weeks ago in a Town Hall concert by the League of Composers, and the Strauss tonepoem unveiled by Josef Stransky in Carnegie Hall on October 26, 1916.

* * *

AS THE product of local genius, Mr. Copland's music had the position of honor on the program—it came just before the intermission. The composer himself was in the audience and at the conclusion of his piece Mr. Koussewitsky brought him out on the stage to make a bow to his listeners. Mr. Copland was, I feel, a trifle too adequate to the occasion. His music was coolly received, and if he overheard comments similar to those reaching my ears he probably went home muttering a certain honored Biblical quotation on the relations of prophets to the local government.

It was all a trifle unfair to the young composer. Very little modern music has been prominent on Academy of Music programs, but a proportion of last night's audience was certainly well enough acquainted with creative phenomena of the day to act up to the occasion with beter grace. When Mr. Damrosch put on Honegger's "Pacific 231" at one of his Saturday matinees, the applause was explosive. Large orchestras, I am afraid, exercise too great a fascination over the popular mind. Mr. Copland unwisely (though one cannot blame him for having failed to foresee an Academy of Music performance of his work) scored "Music for the Theater" for a small group of instruments; its eccentricities therefore stood out more brazenly than those of the Honegger piece. The noise-making power of a large band succeeds in stunning by mere weight of sound. The sparer utterance of a chamber orchestra is a little less deceptive.

Mr. Copland's suite is, for those who wish to regard it in the light of its conception, well wrought and individual music. Of the younger young men today Mr. Copland and George Antheil (of whom more later) seem to me the most individual and striking talents. "Music for the Theater" has a style, an idiom of its own—and of its composer's. It is not merely a deft rehash of radical cliches, but quite definitely something personal and above all sincere. Mr. Koussewitsky read it last evening with skill and wit. He,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 2 1926

OUR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contributions Still Needed To Meet the Year's Budget

To the Editor of The Republican:—

The splendid concert given in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, apart from the enjoyment it afforded, must have impressed that great audience with the value of such an organization to a city.

Such a concert was made possible not by the $2500 contributed by the friends of the Y. M. C. A., but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been spent in bringing this orchestra to its present state of perfection. The cost of training a great orchestra will always be greater than its actual earning power as the record of every symphony orchestra in America testifies.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year besides buying every ticket for every concert given the music lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency but its 10,000 individual patrons in Greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the local orchestra the directors need only an additional $1000 to carry through the excellent program planned and conclude the season without a deficit. They hope this will be forthcoming before the next concert in the Auditorium Tuesday evening, the 19th, when the brilliant Russian pianist Leff Pouishnoff will appear as soloist with the orchestra.

EDWARD H. MARSH, Secretary.
Springfield, January 11, 1926.

---

its actual earning ... records of every symphony orchestra in America testify.

Boston not only appreciates the wonderful concerts given by its own orchestra but its civic value to the community. Last year, besides buying every ticket for every concert given, the music-lovers of Boston voluntarily contributed $74,000 to meet the season's deficit.

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra is trying to do for Springfield in a very modest way what the Boston organization is doing for its city. It has taken the Boston orchestra 45 years to reach its present degree of proficiency, but its 10,000 individual patrons in greater Boston believe that the money spent has been well invested.

In view of the sum Boston pays to support its orchestra the local budget of $9000 for the season seems quite modest. With the encouraging increase in the supporting patronage of the local orchestra the directors need only an additional $1000 to carry through the excellent program planned to conclude the season without a deficit. They hope this will be forthcoming before the next concert in the Auditorium, Tuesday evening, Jan. 19, when the brilliant Russian pianist, Leff Pouishnoff, will appear as soloist with the orchestra.

EDWARD H. MARSH,
Secretary Springfield Symphony Orchestra.
Springfield, Jan. 12, 1926.

---

certs, it was announced today ... complete orchestra will go on the ... from Station WEEI on Jan. 23 and every Saturday evening thereafter until the end of the season.

The fact that season ticket holders have completely filled Symphony Hall for the past two seasons, to the exclusion of the general public, was a determining factor of the trustees to authorize the broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

162

JAN 1 4 1926

GOOSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Celebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

Eugene Goossens, celebrated English virtuoso and conductor, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening. The presence of a guest conductor will mark a new departure at these concerts and will afford a chance for comparison of Mr. Goossen's work with that of conductors heretofore heard here.

At present, Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman School of Music in that city. During the past two weeks, he has been serving as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society. He will also conduct the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 1 3 1926

Michael Press will be the guest conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. The program will open with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Jacques Thibaud, the eminent French violinist, who has been heard in Lowell, will be the soloist in the Concerto in D major

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 1 7 1926

Koussevitzky Here Feb. 1

Serge Koussevitzky will give his first public performance in Philadelphia when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new leader, gives a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS
CLEVELAND, O.

JAN 1 5 1926

ERNEST BLOCH, the composer who "worried along" in Cleveland at the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

ebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

ugene Goossens, celebrated English uoso and conductor, will be the guest nductor of the Boston Symphony Orestra at its third concert of the sea's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesy evening. The presence of a guest conor will mark a new departure at these ncerts and will afford a chance for com

rison of Mr. Goossen's work with tha conductors heretofore heard here.

present, Mr. Goossens is conducto the Philharmonic Orchestra of Roches , N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman hool of Music in that city. During the st two weeks, he has been serving as est conductor of the New York Symony Society. He will also conduct the ncerts to be given by the Boston Symony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Bos to-morrow afternoon and Saturday ing. The programme arranged by Mr. sens for his Providence debut fol-ber's overture to "Der Freischutz" s's Symphony in E minor, Wagrelude and Love Death from "Tris Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's onic poem, "Finlandia."

New Bloch Concerto Melodious

Composition Is Admirably Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday disclosed to local music lovers a new composition of Ernest Bloch, a concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, the latter performed by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it had its first public performance in the famous Hollywood Bowl on August 15, the compo been given by the Chicago and well as the Boston.

So much for statistics. It is by no means discouraging to find contemporaneous musicians experimenting with old forms. The concerto grosso as used by Bach and Handel is so elastic that the utmost freedom is enjoyed by the composer. Mr. Block has said that Swiss folk dances of his boyhood days gave him the inspiration for the work. It is in four movement; a prelude, dirge, pastoral and rustic dances, and the almost inevitable fugue.

The concerto is good music. Mr. Bloch has the habit of writing that kind. In the dirge one may note the musician's leaning toward Hebraic art, but the results are characteristic. The entire work is melodious, rich in instrumental treatment and warm in feeling. The piano is made to play an important role, but without obscuring the value of the strings. The concerto was admirably performed and apparently well liked by the large audience.

The other numbers on the list were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 5 1926

A SEDGWICK CONCERT

The advantages of three vacations a year will be indicated here when the great Italian tenor, Giovanni Martinelli of the Metropolitan Opera company sings at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, January 24, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The healthy and vigorous body, the superb voice, the assured carriage of this vacations are spent in—work. Not everybody can manage that.

Martinelli takes his vacations because he has to. So insistent are the calls for him as a concert singer that his managers, the Metropolitan Musical bureau, have, in the last few years, induced the Metropolitan Opera company to give Martinelli a month's leave of absence toward the end of each operatic season. In this month Martinelli travels to the lucky cities which have managed to get him to come. That is the first vacation. On his return Martinelli resumes his work with the Metropolitan and is usually much in evidence. Last year he was scheduled three times and sang a fourth, owing to the illness of another singer, in ten days. Promptly at the end of the season, when the rest of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 0 1926

Notable Concert in Auditorium Today

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Make Its 32d Appearance in Springfield.

An event of much importance at the Auditorium today will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. This is the orchestra's 32d concert in Springfield, an occasion always eagerly awaited during the year. The concert begins at 3 o'clock. Free and season tickets may be

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GO ON THE AIR

Weekly Concerts to Be Heard by Millions All Over the Country

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, Boston, on 11 consecutive Saturday nights, beginning a week from tomorrow. Negotiations are in progress between the management and radio stations in other cities, including those of New England, for rebroadcasting the programs, and doubtless many millions of listeners will hear this, one of the most famous of the world's symphony orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra have refused hitherto to permit the broadcasting of its music in its entirety, because of the large expense which would be entailed. This difficulty has been overcome by the gift of $12,000 for the purpose by Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast, and prominent in civic betterment as well as business enterprises of New England

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in 12 Broadcasts.

radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL BE BROADCAST

Series of 12 Made Possible by Boston Merchant's Gift of $12,000.

Beginning a week from tomorrow and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from the radio station WEEI of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have heretofore refused to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety.

such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert sseason.

A Boston business man has agreed to contribute $12,000 to help defray the cost of broadcasting the orchestra music, the station will contribute the remainder of the necessary amount. The broadcasting of the Boston symphony orchestra will be, from the viewpoint of the radio industry and the "fans," an enterprise of the greatest importance, and that the evening of January 23 will not only mark a red letter event in radio history but also a victory in the art of broadcasting.

It was the desire to perform a public service rather than any business reason, that prompted the contribution. Special plans to have everything as nearly perfect as possible have been made.

It was only recently that the symphony trustees decided that broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST 12 CONCERTS

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP)—For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of twelve winter concerts, it was announced today. The complete orchestra will go on the air

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS ON RADIO

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—For the first time

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

JAN 2 3 1926

Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for its first public concert in Philadelphia under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Another notable number will be the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," the program also including a sonata of the eighteenth century composer, Galliard, and Liadov's symphonic tableau, "Fragment From the Apocalypse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.

Herald

ISSUE OF

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY "SEASON TICKET" FOR EVERY RADIAN

[By UNITED PRESS.]

BOSTON,

THIS CLIPPING FROM

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

JAN 1 7 1926

* * *

The public of Philadelphia will first hear Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when this organization visits Philadelphia to give a concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. This season is the second of Koussevitzky in America and at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is now generally regarded as one of the most potent forces and striking personalities in the music of America. Before coming to America he made his mark as an orchestral leader in his own country, and in more recent seasons became the most prominent leader of London and Paris. Last summer he returned to continue his series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.

JAN 1 7 1926

Wealth of Modern Music For Orchestra Programs.

There is any amount of modern music to be employed upon orchestral programs, and it would build the Pittsburgh program up immeasurably if something of this sort were introduced. Pittsburgh has today three of the finest orchestras in the country, and a fourth that is advancing in splendid fashion to play its programs. By these orchestras we mean the Boston, New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia, with Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati group as a less expensive and thoroughly satisfying organization. More concerts by the Cincinnati unit would be a good thing for the series. Reiner is an intelligent conductor, his programs have given as much of novelty as any heard here, and his players are well-trained, admirable musicians. If there is any awarding of more than the usual pair of concerts yearly, by all means let the selection go to this group.

The next season is to have a more extensive orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.

Herald

ISSUE OF

JAN 2 3 1926

Tonight we will hear the first of the Boston Symphony concerts to be presented through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of Boston and WEEI. It is the first time that this organization has consented to broadcast, and now it has only been made possible by the financial support of the Boston man. The New England Telephone Co. also is bending every effort to assure good reception by perfecting its part of the broadcasting equipment. It will be interesting to compare not only the music of the Boston Symphony with that of the New York, heard so often, but also the mechanical results obtained by WEEI as compared to those of the New York stations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

1 7 1926

GOOSSENS GIVES LAST OF NEW YORK CONCERTS TO-DAY

Will Proceed Immediately to Boston for Concerts with Boston Symphony.

This afternoon Eugene Goossens conducts his last concert of his series of six as guest conductor this season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The concert is in Mecca Auditorium and Walter Gieseking, pianist, is the soloist.

To-morrow morning Mr. Goossens will be in Boston ready to begin rehearsals with the Boston Symphony for the concerts which he will conduct with that orchestra in Boston and in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

JA

The Boston Symphony.

One of the most important orchestral concerts of the year will take place Wednesday of next week at the Lyric when the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.

JAN 2 4 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Feb. 3

THE only Baltimore appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on Wednesday, February 3. Serge Koussevitzky, now in his second year as conductor of the famous organization, will, of course, wield the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky has been adding to his laurels wherever the orchestra has appeared this season and it is expected that a capacity audience will be on hand at the Lyric for the local concert.

The complete program is as follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Mamimilian Steinberg).

Debussy—"Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (prelude to the afternoon of a faun) Ecologue by S. Mallarme.

Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice—after a ballad by Goethe.)

Rimsky - Koraskov — Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and One Night."

1—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
2—The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3—The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

162

1 4 1926

GOOSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Celebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

Eugene Goossens, celebrated English virtuoso and conductor, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening. The presence of a guest conductor will mark a new departure at these concerts and will afford a chance for comparison of Mr. Goossen's work with that of conductors heretofore heard here.

At present, Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman School of Music in that city. During the past two weeks, he has been serving as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society. He will also conduct the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 1 3 1926

Michael Press will be the guest conductor at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. The program will open with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Jacques Thibaud, the eminent French violinist, who has been heard in Lowell, will be the soloist in the Concerto in D major

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

Koussevitzky Here Feb. 1

Serge Koussevitzky will give his first public performance in Philadelphia when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new leader, gives a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS
CLEVELAND, O.

JAN 1 5 1926

ERNEST BLOCH, the composer who "worried along" in Cleveland at the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

ebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

ugene Goossens, celebrated English uoso and conductor, will be the guest nductor of the Boston Symphony Orestra at its third concert of the sea's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesy evening. The presence of a guest conter will mark a new departure at these ncerts and will afford a chance for com-

rison of Mr. Goossen's work with tha conductors heretofore heard here.

present, Mr. Goossens is conducto the Philharmonic Orchestra of Roches, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman hool of Music in that city. During the st two weeks, he has been serving as uest conductor of the New York Symony Society. He will also conduct the ncerts to be given by the Boston Symony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Bos to-morrow afternoon and Saturday ing. The programme arranged by Mr. sens for his Providence debut fol-ber's overture to "Der Freischutz" s's Symphony in E minor, Wagrelude and Love Death from "Trisl Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's onic poem, "Finlandia."

New Bloch Concerto Melodious

Composition Is Admirably Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday disclosed to local music lovers a new composition of Ernest Bloch, a concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, the latter performed by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it had its first public performance in the famous Hollywood Bowl on August 15, the compo been given by the Chicago and well as the Boston.

So much for statistics. It is by no means discouraging to find contemporaneous musicians experimenting with old forms. The concerto grosso as used by Bach and Handel is so elastic that the utmost freedom is enjoyed by the composer. Mr. Block has said that Swiss folk dances of his boyhood days gave him the inspiration for the work. It is in four movement; a prelude, dirge, pastoral and rustic dances, and the almost inevitable fugue.

The concerto is good music. Mr. Bloch has the habit of writing that kind. In the dirge one may note the musician's leaning toward Hebraic art, but the results are characteristic. The entire work is melodious, rich in instrumental treatment and warm in feeling. The piano is made to play an important role, but without obscuring the value of the strings. The concerto was admirably performed and apparently well liked by the large audience.

The other numbers on the list were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 0 1926

Notable Concert in Auditorium Today

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Make Its 32d Appearance in Springfield.

An event of much importance at the Auditorium today will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. This is the orchestra's 32d concert in Springfield, an occasion always eagerly awaited during the year. The concert begins at 3 o'clock. Free and season tickets may be

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BROADCAST 12 CONCERTS

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP)—For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of twelve winter concerts, it was announced today. The complete orchestra will go on the air

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS ON RADIO

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—For the first time

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

JAN 2 3 1926

Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for its first public concert in Philadelphia under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Another notable number will be the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," the program also including a sonata of the eighteenth century composer, Galliard, and Liadov's symphonic tableau, "Fragment From the Apocalypse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 5 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL BE BROADCAST

Series of 12 Made Possible by Boston Merchant's Gift of $12,000.

Beginning a week from tomorrow and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from the radio station WEEI of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have heretofore refused to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert sseason.

A Boston business man has agreed to contribute $12,000 to help defray the cost of broadcasting, the orchestra music, the station will contribute the remainder of the necessary amount. The broadcasting of the Boston symphony orchestra will be, from the viewpoint of the radio industry and the "fans," an enterprise of the greatest importance, and that the evening of January 23 will not only mark a red letter event in radio history but also a victory in the art of broadcasting.

It was the desire to perform a public service rather than any business reason, that prompted the contribution. Special plans to have everything as nearly perfect as possible have been made.

It was only recently that the symphony trustees decided that broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in."

A SEDGWICK CONCERT

The advantages of three vacations a year will be indicated here when the great Italian tenor, Giovanni Martinelli of the Metropolitan Opera company sings at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, January 24, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The healthy and vigorous body, the superb voice, the assured carriage of this vacations are spent in—work. Not everybody can manage that.

Martinelli takes his vacations because he has to. So insistent are the calls for him as a concert singer that his managers, the Metropolitan Musical bureau, have, in the last few years, induced the Metropolitan Opera company to give Martinelli a month's leave of absence toward the end of each operatic season. In this month Martinelli travels to the lucky cities which have managed to get him to come. That is the first vacation. On his return Martinelli resumes his work with the Metropolitan and is usually much in evidence. Last year he was scheduled three times and sang a fourth, owing to the illness of another singer, in ten days. Promptly at the end of the season, when the rest of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

JAN 1 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GO ON THE AIR

Weekly Concerts to Be Heard by Millions All Over the Country

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, Boston, on 11 consecutive Saturday nights, beginning a week from tomorrow. Negotiations are in progress between the management and radio stations in other cities, including those of New England, for rebroadcasting the programs, and doubtless many millions of listeners will hear this, one of the most famous of the world's symphony orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra have refused hitherto to permit the broadcasting of its music in its entirety, because of the large expense which would be entailed. This difficulty has been overcome by the gift of $12,000 for the purpose by Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast, and prominent in civic betterment as well as business enterprises of New England.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.

ISSUE OF

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY "SEASON TICKET" FOR EVERY RADIAN

[By UNITED PRESS.]

BOSTON,

THIS CLIPPING FROM

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

JAN 1 7 1926

* * *

The public of Philadelphia will first hear Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when this organization visits Philadelphia to give a concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. This season is the second of Koussevitzky in America and at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is now generally regarded as one of the most potent forces and striking personalities in the music of America. Before coming to America he made his mark as an orchestral leader in his own country, and in more recent seasons became the most prominent leader of London and Paris. Last summer he returned to continue his series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in 12 Broadcasts.

Radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.

JAN 1 7 1926

Wealth of Modern Music For Orchestra Programs.

There is any amount of modern music to be employed upon orchestral programs, and it would build the Pittsburgh program up immeasurably if something of this sort were introduced. Pittsburgh has today three of the finest orchestras in the country, and a fourth that is advancing in splendid fashion to play its programs. By these orchestras we mean the Boston, New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia, with Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati group as a less expensive and thoroughly satisfying organization. More concerts by the Cincinnati unit would be a good thing for the series. Reiner is an intelligent conductor, his programs have given as much of novelty as any heard here, and his players are well-trained, admirable musicians. If there is any awarding of more than the usual pair of concerts yearly, by all means let the selection go to this group.

The next season is to have a more extensive orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.

ISSUE OF

Tonight we will hear the first of the Boston Symphony concerts to be presented ~~through~~ the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of Boston and WEEI. It is the first time that this organization has consented to broadcast, and now it has only been made possible by the financial support of the Boston man. The New England Telephone Co. also is bending every effort to assure good reception by perfecting its part of the broadcasting equipment. It will be interesting to compare not only the music of the Boston Symphony with that of the New York, heard so often, but also the mechanical results obtained by WEEI as compared to those of the New York stations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DEMOCRAT
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

1926

GOOSSENS GIVES LAST OF NEW YORK CONCERTS TO-DAY

Will Proceed Immediately to Boston for Concerts with Boston Symphony.

This afternoon Eugene Goossens conducts his last concert of his series of six as guest conductor this season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The concert is in Mecca Auditorium and Walter Gieseking, pianist, is the soloist.

To-morrow morning Mr. Goossens will be in Boston ready to begin rehearsals with the Boston Symphony for the concerts which he will conduct with that orchestra in Boston and in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

The Boston Symphony.

One of the most important orchestral concerts of the year will take place Wednesday of next week at the Lyric when the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.

JAN 2 4 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Feb. 3

THE only Baltimore appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on Wednesday, February 3. Serge Koussevitzky, now in his second year as conductor of the famous organization, will, of course, wield the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky has been adding to his laurels wherever the orchestra has appeared this season and it is expected that a capacity audience will be on hand at the Lyric for the local concert.

The complete program is as follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Mamimilian Steinberg).

Debussy—"Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (prelude to the afternoon of a faun) Ecologue by S. Mallarme.

Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice—after a ballad by Goethe.)

Rimsky-Koraskov — Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and One Night."

1—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
2—The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3—The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

162

JAN 1 4 1926

GOOSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Celebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

Eugene Goossens, celebrated English virtuoso and conductor, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening. The presence of a guest conductor will mark a new departure at these concerts and will afford a chance for comparison of Mr. Goossen's work with that of conductors heretofore heard here.

At present, Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman School of Music in that city. During the past two weeks, he has been serving as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society. He will also conduct the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme arranged by Mr. Goossens for his Providence debut follows:

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" Brahms's Symphony in E minor, Wagner's prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

New Bloch Concerto Melodious

Composition Is Admirably Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday disclosed to local music lovers a new composition of Ernest Bloch, a concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, the latter performed by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it had its first public performance in the famous Hollywood Bowl on August 15, the compo been given by the Chicago and well as the Boston.

So much for statistics. It is by no means discouraging to find contemporaneous musicians experimenting with old forms. The concerto grosso as used by Bach and Handel is so elastic that the utmost freedom is enjoyed by the composer. Mr. Block has said that Swiss folk dances of his boyhood days gave him the inspiration for the work. It is in four movement; a prelude, dirge, pastoral and rustic dances, and the almost inevitable fugue.

The concerto is good music. Mr. Bloch has the habit of writing that kind. In the dirge one may note the musician's leaning toward Hebraic art, but the results are characteristic. The entire work is melodious, rich in instrumental treatment and warm in feeling. The piano is made to play an important role, but without obscuring the value of the strings. The concerto was admirably performed and apparently well liked by the large audience.

The other numbers on the list were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and fragments of Ravel's "Daphnis and Cloe." The Berlioz piece was done at a great pace and with extraordinary brilliancy. Mendelssohn's Italy is rather vague in these days when composers know so much about tone painting, but it is still a pleasing work, gracious in moods and graceful in expression. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it delightfully.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL BE BROADCAST

Series of 12 Made Possible by Boston Merchant's Gift of $12,000.

Beginning a week from tomorrow and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from the radio station WEEI of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have heretofore refused to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert sseason.

A Boston business man has agreed to contribute $12,000 to help defray the cost of broadcasting the orchestra music, the station will contribute the remainder of the necessary amount. The broadcasting of the Boston symphony orchestra will be, from the viewpoint of the radio industry and the "fans," an enterprise of the greatest importance, and that the evening of January 23 will not only mark a red letter event in radio history but also a victory in the art of broadcasting.

It was the desire to perform a public service rather than any business reason, that prompted the contribution. Special plans to have everything as nearly perfect as possible have been made.

It was only recently that the symphony trustees decided that broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 5 1926

A SEDGWICK CONCERT

The advantages of three vacations a year will be indicated here when the great Italian tenor, Giovanni Martinelli of the Metropolitan Opera company sings at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, January 24, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The healthy and vigorous body, the superb voice, the assured carriage of this popular singer, can all be traced back to his little system of getting three vacations a year. At least, so he says. The catch in it is that most of his vacations are spent in—work. Not everybody can manage that.

Martinelli takes his vacations because he has to. So insistent are the calls for him as a concert singer that his managers, the Metropolitan Musical bureau, have, in the last few years, induced the Metropolitan Opera company to give Martinelli a month's leave of absence toward the end of each operatic season. In this month Martinelli travels to the lucky cities which have managed to get him to come. That is the first vacation. On his return Martinelli resumes his work with the Metropolitan and is usually much in evidence. Last year he was scheduled three times and sang a fourth, owing to the illness of another singer, in ten days. Promptly at the end of the season, when the rest of the Metropolitan went off to Atlanta, Ga., Martinelli set sail for Buenos Aires.

Mr. Sedgwick will also present the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of that distinguished Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GO ON THE AIR

Weekly Concerts to Be Heard by Millions All Over the Country

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, Boston, on 11 consecutive Saturday nights, beginning a week from tomorrow. Negotiations are in progress between the management and radio stations in other cities, including those of New England, for rebroadcasting the programs, and doubtless many millions of listeners will hear this, one of the most famous of the world's symphony orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra have refused hitherto to permit the broadcasting of its music in its entirety, because of the large expense which would be entailed. This difficulty has been overcome by the gift of $12,000 for the purpose by Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast, and prominent in civic betterment as well as business enterprises of New England.

The Boston Symphony concerts have hitherto been restricted to a limited few people, for most of the seats are occupied by season ticket holders and their guests. Occasionally the orchestra has played in Worcester, and, of course, music lovers here are familiar with it. But the public at large has never had the privilege which will be offered on the air through the long series of weeks.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in 12 Broadcasts.

radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

For the last two years the public has had little opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony concerts, seats being occupied by the season ticket holders and their guests. The trustees have long agreed with the management of WEEI that the broadcasting of the concert would bring great pleasure to a very large number of persons who have often wished to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra but pointed out to the expense of

---

with Boston Symphony.

This afternoon Eugene Goossens conducts his last concert of his series of six as guest conductor this season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The concert is in Mecca Auditorium and Walter Gieseking, pianist, is the soloist.

To-morrow morning Mr. Goossens will be in Boston ready to begin rehearsals with the Boston Symphony for the concerts which he will conduct with that orchestra in Boston and in Providence. Immediately on completion of his duties with the Boston Symphony Mr. Goossens will return to Rochester to resume his conducting of the Rochester Philharmonic. His first concert with our orchestra after his return will be an evening performance, a concert in Series C of the Eastman Theater Thursday evening concerts. The series of matinee concerts will then be resumed under his conducting.

---

been heard in Lowell, will be soloist in the Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, by Brahms. The program will be rounded out with the Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, of Sibelius, the Finnish composer in whose music there has been increased interest of late.

Michael Press is a Russian teacher of the violin in Philadelphia, who is said to have conducted orchestras in Sweden and elsewhere, as well as the Philharmonic orchestra, Philadelphia.

---

cert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. This is the orchestra's 32d concert in Springfield, an occasion always eagerly awaited during the year. The concert begins at 3 o'clock. Free and season tickets may be obtained from the Y. M. C. A., or from any of the music stores. The program is as follows:

Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
1. Adagio; Allegro Non Troppo.
2. Allegro Con Grazia.
3. Allegro Molto Vivace.
4. Finale; Adagio Lamentoso.
Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Liszt, "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine).

There will be an intermission of 10 minutes after the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

ebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

ugene Goossens, celebrated English uoso and conductor, will be the guest ductor of the Boston Symphony Orestra at its third concert of the sea's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesy evening. The presence of a guest conr will mark a new departure at these ncerts and will afford a chance for com

rison of Mr. Goossen's work with tha conductors heretofore heard here.

present, Mr. Goossens is conducto the Philharmonic Orchestra of Roches, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman hool of Music in that city. During the st two weeks, he has been serving as est conductor of the New York Symony Society. He will also conduct the ncerts to be given by the Boston Symony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Bos to-morrow afternoon and Saturday ing. The programme arranged by Mr. sens for his Providence debut fol-ber's overture to "Der Freischutz" s's Symphony in E minor, Wagrelude and Love Death from "Trisd Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's onic poem, "Finlandia."

JAN 1 6 1926

The public of Philadelphia will first hear Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when this organization visits Philadelphia in a concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Mr. Koussevitzky will include in his program examples of music frim his own country.

Pablo Casals, cellist, will appear in With-

FOR EVERY RADIAN

[By UNITED PRESS.]

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Radio fans probably will receive the equivalent to a season ticket to Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this year.

For if negotiations between the trustees of the famous musical organization and the Edison Electric company are carried out, the orchestra will go on the air on Jan. 23 for the first time in history.

The remaining 12 Saturday Symphony concerts, according to present plans, wil be broadcast from Station WEEI.

---

orchestras we mean the Boston, New York Philharmonic and ~~the~~ Philadelphia, with Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati group as a less expensive and thoroughly satisfying organization. More concerts by the Cincinnati unit would be a good thing for the series. Reiner is an intelligent conductor, his programs have given as much of novelty as any heard here, and his players are well-trained, admirable musicians. If there is any awarding of more than the usual pair of concerts yearly, by all means let the selection go to this group.

The next season is to have a more extensive orchestr program, according to announcement. The extension should apply also to the music to be played. The only time local music lovers get an opportunity to hear compositions of the day is when visiting in other cities. With a series of 12 or 14 orchestral concerts in a season, there is no reason why more interesting, less tedious and greater variety of programs should not be forthcoming.

---

but also the mechanical results obtained by WEEI as compared to those of the New York stations.

JAN 2 4 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Feb. 3

THE only Baltimore appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on Wednesday, February 3. Serge Koussevitzky, now in his second year as conductor of the famous organization, will, of course, wield the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky has been adding to his laurels wherever the orchestra has appeared this season and it is expected that a capacity audience will be on hand at the Lyric for the local concert.

The complete program is as follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Mamimilian Steinberg).
Debussy—"Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (prelude to the afternoon of a faun) Ecologue by S. Mallarme.
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice—after a ballad by Goethe.)
Rimsky-Koraskov — Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and One Night."
1—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
2—The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3—The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for its first public concert in Philadelphia under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Another notable number will be the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," the program also including a sonata of the eighteenth century composer, Galliard, and Liadov's symphonic tableau, "Fragment From the Apocalypse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

162

JAN 1 4 1926

GOOSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Celebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

Eugene Goossens, celebrated English virtuoso and conductor, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening. The presence of a guest conductor will mark a new departure at these concerts and will afford a chance for comparison of Mr. Goossen's work with that of conductors heretofore heard here.

At present, Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman School of Music in that city. During the past two weeks, he has been serving as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society. He will also conduct the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme arranged by Mr. Goossens for his Providence debut follows:

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" Brahms's Symphony in E minor, Wagner's prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

New Bloch Concerto Melodious

Composition Is Admirably Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday disclosed to local music lovers a new composition of Ernest Bloch, a concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, the latter performed by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it had its first public performance in the famous Hollywood Bowl on August 15, the compo[illegible] been given by the Chicago and well as the Boston.

So much for statistics. It is by no means discouraging to find contemporaneous musicians experimenting with old forms. The concerto grosso as used by Bach and Handel is so elastic that the utmost freedom is enjoyed by the composer. Mr. Block has said that Swiss folk dances of his boyhood days gave him the inspiration for the work. It is in four movement; a prelude, dirge, pastoral and rustic dances, and the almost inevitable fugue.

The concerto is good music. Mr. Bloch has the habit of writing that kind. In the dirge one may note the musician's leaning toward Hebraic art, but the results are characteristic. The entire work is melodious, rich in instrumental treatment and warm in feeling. The piano is made to play an important role, but without obscuring the value of the strings. The concerto was admirably performed and apparently well liked by the large audience.

The other numbers on the list were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and fragments of Ravel's "Daphnis and Cloe." The Berlioz piece was done at a great pace and with extraordinary brilliancy. Mendelssohn's Italy is rather vague in these days when composers know so much about tone painting, but it is still a pleasing work, gracious in moods and graceful in expression. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it delightfully.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 5 1926

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL BE BROADCAST

Series of 12 Made Possible by Boston Merchant's Gift of $12,000.

Beginning a week from tomorrow and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from the radio station WEEI of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have heretofore refused to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety [illegible] such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert sseason.

A Boston business man has agreed to contribute $12,000 to help defray the cost of broadcasting the orchestra music, the station will contribute the remainder of the necessary amount. The broadcasting of the Boston symphony orchestra will be, from the viewpoint of the radio industry and the "fans," an enterprise of the greatest importance, and that the evening of January 23 will not only mark a red letter event in radio history but also a victory in the art of broadcasting.

It was the desire to perform a public service rather than any business reason, that prompted the contribution. Special plans to have everything as nearly perfect as possible have been made.

It was only recently that the symphony trustees decided that broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season: but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in."

A SEDGWICK CONCERT

The advantages of three vacations a year will be indicated here when the great Italian tenor, Giovanni Martinelli of the Metropolitan Opera company sings at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, January 24, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The healthy and vigorous body, the superb voice, the assured carriage of this popular singer, can all be traced back to his little system of getting three vacations a year. At least, so he says. The catch in it is that most of his vacations are spent in—work. Not everybody can manage that.

Martinelli takes his vacations because he has to. So insistent are the calls for him as a concert singer that his managers, the Metropolitan Musical bureau, have, in the last few years, induced the Metropolitan Opera company to give Martinelli a month's leave of absence toward the end of each operatic season. In this month Martinelli travels to the lucky cities which have managed to get him to come. That is the first vacation. On his return Martinelli resumes his work with the Metropolitan and is usually much in evidence. Last year he was scheduled three times and sang a fourth, owing to the illness of another singer, in ten days. Promptly at the end of the season, when the rest of the Metropolitan went off to Atlanta, Ga., Martinelli set sail for Buenos Aires been heard in Lowell, will [illegible] soloist in the Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, by Brahms. The program will be rounded out with the Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, of Sibelius, the Finnish composer in whose music there has been increased interest of late.

Mr. Sedgwick will also present the famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of that distinguished Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The seats for both concerts are now on sale at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

---

Michael Press is a Russian teacher of the violin in Philadelphia, who is said to have conducted orchestras in Sweden and elsewhere, as well as the Philharmonic orchestra, Philadelphia.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GO ON THE AIR

Weekly Concerts to Be Heard by Millions All Over the Country

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, Boston, on 11 consecutive Saturday nights, beginning a week from tomorrow. Negotiations are in progress between the management and radio stations in other cities, including those of New England, for rebroadcasting the programs, and doubtless many millions of listeners will hear this, one of the most famous of the world's symphony orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra have refused hitherto to permit the broadcasting of its music in its entirety, because of the large expense which would be entailed. This difficulty has been overcome by the gift of $12,000 for the purpose by Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast, and prominent in civic betterment as well as business enterprises of New England.

The Boston Symphony concerts have hitherto been restricted to a limited few people, for most of the seats are occupied by season ticket holders and their guests. Occasionally the orchestra has played in Worcester, and, of course, music lovers here are familiar with it. But the public at large has never had the privilege which will be offered on the air through the long series of weeks.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in 12 Broadcasts.

Radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

For the last two years the public has had little opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony concerts, seats being occupied by the season ticket holders and their guests. The trustees have long agreed with the management of WEEI that the broadcasting of the concert would bring great pleasure to a very large number of persons who have often wished to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra but pointed out to the expense of

---

With Boston Symphony.

This afternoon Eugene Goossens conducts his last concert of his series of six as guest conductor this season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The concert is in Mecca Auditorium and Walter Gieseking, pianist, is the soloist.

To-morrow morning Mr. Goossens will be in Boston ready to begin rehearsals with the Boston Symphony for the concerts which he will conduct with that orchestra in Boston and in Providence. Immediately on completion of his duties with the Boston Symphony Mr. Goossens will return to Rochester to resume his conducting of the Rochester Philharmonic. His first concert with our orchestra after his return will be an evening performance, a concert in Series C of the Eastman Theater Thursday evening concerts. The series of matinee concerts will then be resumed under his conducting.

---

cert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. This is the orchestra's 32d concert in Springfield, an occasion always eagerly awaited during the year. The concert begins at 3 o'clock. Free and season tickets may be obtained from the Y. M. C. A., or from any of the music stores. The program is as follows:

Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 71.
1. Adagio; Allegro Non Troppo.
2. Allegro Con Grazia.
3. Allegro Molto Vivace.
4. Finale; Adagio Lamentoso.
Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Liszt, "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine).

There will be an intermission of 10 minutes after the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

ebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

ugene Goossens, celebrated English uoso and conductor, will be the guest ductor of the Boston Symphony Orestra at its third concert of the sea's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesy evening. The presence of a guest conctor will mark a new departure at these ncerts and will afford a chance for com

rison of Mr. Goossen's work with tha conductors heretofore heard here.

present, Mr. Goossens is conducto the Philharmonic Orchestra of Roches r, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman hool of Music in that city. During the st two weeks, he has been serving as uest conductor of the New York Symony Society. He will also conduct the ncerts to be given by the Boston Symony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Bos to-morrow afternoon and Saturday ing. The programme arranged by Mr. sens for his Providence debut fol ber's overture to "Der Freischutz" s's Symphony in E minor, Wagprelude and Love Death from "Trisd Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's onic poem, "Finlandia."

JAN 1 6 1926

The public of Philadelphia will first hear Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when this organization visits Philadelphia in a concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Mr. Koussevitzky will include in his program examples of music frim his own country.

Pablo Casals, cellist, will appear in With-

Se[illegible] the Divine Poem," will be a feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for its first public concert in Philadelphia under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Another notable number will be the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," the program also including a sonata of the eighteenth century composer, Galliard, and Liadov's symphonic tableau, "Fragment From the Apocalypse."

OR EVERY RADIAN

[By UNITED PRESS.]

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Radio fans probably will receive the equivalent to a season ticket to Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this year.

For if negotiations between the trustees of the famous musical organization and the Edison Electric company are carried out, the orchestra will go on the air on Jan. 23 for the first time in history.

The remaining 12 Saturday Symphony concerts, according to present plans, will be broadcast from Station WEEI.

---

orchestras we mean the Boston, New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia, with Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati group as a less expensive and thoroughly satisfying organization. More concerts by the Cincinnati unit would be a good thing for the series. Reiner is an intelligent conductor, his programs have given as much of novelty as any heard here, and his players are well-trained, admirable musicians. If there is any awarding of more than the usual pair of concerts yearly, by all means let the selection go to this group.

The next season is to have a more extensive orchestr program, according to announcement. The extension should apply also to the music to be played. The only time local music lovers get an opportunity to hear compositions of the day is when visiting in other cities. With a series of 12 or 14 orchestral concerts in a season, there is no reason why more interesting, less tedious and greater variety of programs should not be forthcoming.

---

so often, but also the mechanical results obtained by WEEI as compared to those of the New York stations.

JAN 2 4 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Feb. 3

THE only Baltimore appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on Wednesday, February 3. Serge Koussevitzky, now in his second year as conductor of the famous organization, will, of course, wield the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky has been adding to his laurels wherever the orchestra has appeared this season and it is expected that a capacity audience will be on hand at the Lyric for the local concert.

The complete program is as follows:

Galliard—Sonata in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg).
Debussy—"Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (prelude to the afternoon of a faun) Ecologue by S. Mallarme.
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice—after a ballad by Goethe.)
Rimsky - Koraskov — Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and One Night."
1—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
2—The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3—The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

162

JAN 1 4 1928

GOOSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Celebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

Eugene Goossens, celebrated English virtuoso and conductor, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening. The presence of a guest conductor will mark a new departure at these concerts and will afford a chance for comparison of Mr. Goosson's work with that of conductors heretofore heard here.

At present, Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman School of Music in that city. During the past two weeks, he has been serving as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society. He will also conduct the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme arranged by Mr. Goossens for his Providence debut follows:

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" Brahms's Symphony in E minor, Wagner's prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

New Bloch Concerto Melodious

Composition Is Admirably Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday disclosed to local music lovers a new composition of Ernest Bloch, a concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, the latter performed by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it had its first public performance in the famous Hollywood Bowl on August 15, the compo been given by the Chicago and well as the Boston.

So much for statistics. It is by no means discouraging to find contemporaneous musicians experimenting with old forms. The concerto grosso an important role, but without obscuring the value of the strings. The concerto was admirably performed and apparently well liked by the large audience.

The other numbers on the list were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and fragments of Ravel's "Daphnis and Cloe." The Berlioz piece was done at a great pace and with extraordinary brilliancy. Mendelssohn's Italy is rather vague in these days when composers know so much about tone painting, but it is still a pleasing work, gracious in moods and graceful in expression. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it delightfully.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 5 1928

Plan to Raise $45,000 Here for Storrs Church

State Campaign to Provide New Church Building an

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL BE BROADCAST

Series of 12 Made Possible by Boston Merchant's Gift of $12,000.

Beginning a week from tomorrow and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from the radio station WEEI of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have heretofore refused to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety. Hundreds of thousands of music-loving such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert sseason.

A Boston business man has agreed to contribute $12,000 to help defray the cost of broadcasting the orchestra music, the station will contribute the remainder of the necessary amount. The broadcasting of the Boston symphor orchestra will be, from the viewpoint of the radio industry and the "fans," an enterprise of the greatest importance, and that the evening of January 23 will not only mark a red letter event in radio history but also a victory in the art of broadcasting.

It was the desire to perform a public service rather than any business reason, that prompted the contribution. Special plans to have everything as nearly perfect as possible have been made.

It was only recently that the symphony trustees decided that broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in 12 Broadcasts.

Radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

For the last two years the public has had little opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony concerts, seats being occupied by the season ticket holders and their guests. The trustees have long agreed with the management of WEEI that the broadcasting of the concert would bring great pleasure to a very large number of persons who have often wished to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra but pointed out to the expense of

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GO ON THE AIR

Weekly Concerts to Be Heard by Millions All Over the Country

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, Boston, on 11 consecutive Saturday nights, beginning a week from tomorrow. Negotiations are in progress between the management and radio stations in other cities, including those of New England, for rebroadcasting the programs, and doubtless many millions of listeners will hear this, one of the most famous of the world's symphony orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra have refused hitherto to permit the broadcasting of its music in its entirety, because of the large expense which would be entailed. This difficulty has been overcome by the gift of $12,000 for the purpose by Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast, and prominent in civic betterment as well as business enterprises of New England.

The Boston Symphony concerts have hitherto been restricted to a limited few people, for most of the seats are occupied by season ticket holders and their guests. Occasionally the orchestra has played in Worcester, and, of course, music lovers here are familiar with it. But the public at large has never had the privilege which will be offered on the air through the long series of weeks.

---

with Boston Symphony.

This afternoon Eugene Goossens conducts his last concert of his series of six as guest conductor this season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The concert is in Mecca Auditorium and Walter Gieseking, pianist, is the soloist.

To-morrow morning Mr. Goossens will be in Boston ready to begin rehearsals with the Boston Symphony for the concerts which he will conduct with that orchestra in Boston and in

---

been heard in Lowell, will be soloist in the Concerto in D major

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 1 7 1928

Koussevitzky Here Feb. 1

Serge Koussevitzky will give his first public performance in Philadelphia when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new leader gives a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
CLEVELAND, O.

JAN 1 5 1928

ERNEST BLOCH, the composer who "worried along" in Cleveland at the Institute of Music, for several years, frequently smiting his breast and moaning that he was obliged to live here just to earn the salary that he received, has had a new work performed in New York by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie hall.

It was his concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, which later was played by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it received its first hearing at the Hollywood bowl. It has been played since that time in Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia.

Needless to add that it has not been heard in Cleveland.

* * *

---

cert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. This is the orchestra's 32d concert in Springfield, an occasion always eagerly awaited during the year. The concert begins at 3 o'clock. Free and season tickets may be obtained from the Y. M. C. A., or from any of the music stores. The program is as follows:

Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
1. Adagio; Allegro Non Troppo.
2. Allegro Con Grazia.
3. Allegro Molto Vivace.
4. Finale; Adagio Lamentoso.
Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Liszt, "Les Preludes." Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine).

There will be an intermission of 10 minutes after the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

The Boston Symphony.

One of the most important orchestral concerts of the year will take place Wednesday of next week at the Lyric when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only Baltimore appearance of the year. Director Serge Koussevitsky has arranged a striking program that will include neither soloist nor symphony. The big number will be the symphonic suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a number that exacts playing of the highest from every instrument in the orchestra.

---

orchestras we mean the Boston, New York Philharmonic and ~~the~~ Philadelphia, with Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati group as a less expensive and thoroughly satisfying organization. More concerts by the Cincinnati unit would be a good thing ~~for~~ the series. Reiner is an intelligent conductor, his programs have given as much of novelty as any heard here. and his players are well-trained, admirable musicians. If there is any awarding of more than the usual pair of concerts yearly, by all means let the selection go to this group.

The next season is to have a more extensive orchestr program, according to announcement. The extension should apply also to the music to be played. The only time local music lovers get an opportunity to hear compositions of the day is when visiting in other cities. With a series of 12 or 14 orchestral concerts in a season, there is no reason why more interesting, less tedious and greater variety of programs should not be forthcoming.

FOR EVERY RADIAN

[By UNITED PRESS.]

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Radio fans probably will receive the equivalent to a season ticket to Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this year.

For if negotiations between the trustees of the famous musical organization and the Edison Electric company are carried out, the orchestra will go on the air on Jan. 23 for the first time in history.

The remaining 12 Saturday Symphony concerts, according to present plans, wil be broadcast from Station WEEI.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 5 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS ON RADIO

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—For the first time in history, the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast its regular series of 12 winter concerts, it was announced today. The complete orchestra will go in the air from station WEEI on the 23d and every Saturday night thereafter until the end of the season.

---

ber's overture to "Der Freischutz" ms's Symphony in E minor, Wagprelude and Love Death from "Trisd Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's onic poem, "Finlandia."

---

but also the mechanical results obtained by WEEI as compared to those of the New York stations.

---

in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg).

Debussy—"Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (prelude to the afternoon of a faun) Ecologue by S. Mallarme.

Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice—after a ballad by Goethe.)

Rimsky-Koraskov — Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and One Night."
1—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
2—The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3—The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

162

JAN 1 4 1926

GOOSSENS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY

Celebrated English Virtuoso to Be Guest Conductor for Third Concert.

Eugene Goossens, celebrated English virtuoso and conductor, will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season's series, in Infantry Hall, next Tuesday evening. The presence of a guest conductor will mark a new departure at these concerts and will afford a chance for comparison of Mr. Goossen's work with that of conductors heretofore heard here.

At present, Mr. Goossens is conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester, N. Y., an adjunct of the Eastman School of Music in that city. During the past two weeks, he has been serving as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society. He will also conduct the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme arranged by Mr. Goossens for his Providence debut follows:

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" Brahms's Symphony in E minor, Wagner's prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

New Bloch Concerto Melodious

Composition Is Admirably Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday disclosed to local music lovers a new composition of Ernest Bloch, a concerto grosso for strings with piano obbligato, the latter performed by Jesus Sanroma. Mr. Bloch finished the work last spring and it had its first public performance in the famous Hollywood Bowl on August 15, the compo been given by the Chicago and well as the Boston.

So much for statistics. It is by no means discouraging to find contemporaneous musicians experimenting with old forms. The concerto grosso as u elast joyed has boyh tion men rusti ble

Th Bloc kind mus art, The instr feeli an important role, but without obscuring the value of the strings. The concerto was admirably performed and apparently well liked by the large audience.

The other numbers on the list were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, symphony

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 5 1926

Plan to Raise $45,000 Here for Storrs Church

State Campaign to Provide New Church Building an

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL BE BROADCAST

Series of 12 Made Possible by Boston Merchant's Gift of $12,000.

Beginning a week from tomorrow and continuing for 11 successive Saturday evenings, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from the radio station WEEI of Boston.

This series will be the first in the history of the Boston symphony orchestra. The trustees of the organization have heretofore refused to permit the broadcasting of the music of this orchestra in its entirety. Hundreds of thousands of music-loving

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor Who Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in 12 Broadcasts.

radio fans in New England will enjoy practically the same privileges as the fortunate season-ticket holders to the symphony concerts.

For the last two years the public has had little opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony concerts, seats being occupied by the season ticket holders and their guests. The trustees have long agreed with the management of WEEI that the broadcasting of the concert would bring great pleasure to a very large number of persons who have often wished to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra but pointed out to the expense of such an enterprise and to the deficit at the end of each concert sseason.

A Boston business man has agreed to contribute $12,000 to help defray the cost of broadcasting the orchestra music, the station will contribute the remainder of the necessary amount. The broadcasting of the Boston symphor orchestra will be, from the viewpoint of the radio industry and the "fans," an enterprise of the greatest inportance, and that the evening of January 23 will not only mark a red letter event in radio history but also a victory in the art of broadcasting.

It was the desire to perform a public service rather than any business reason, that prompted the contribution. Special plans to have everything as nearly perfect as possible have been made.

It was only recently that the symphony trustees decided that broadcasting of the Saturday evening concerts would be a good way in which to meet the annual deficit of the concert season; but they had long wished that they could afford to give the general public an opportunity to "listen in."

---

been heard in Lowell, will soloist in the Concerto in D major

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

1926

Koussevitzky Here Feb. 1

Serge Koussevitzky will give his first public performance in Philadelphia when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new leader, gives a concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. A year ago last autumn, Serge Koussevitzky was known to our public only by hearsay. Now, in his second season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he holds the attention of America as a rare force and a striking personality in music. Mr. Koussevitzky will include upon his Philadelphia programme notable examples of the great and increasingly important literature of music from his own country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 0 1926

Notable Concert in Auditorium Today

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Make Its 32d Appearance in Springfield.

An event of much importance at the Auditorium today will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. This is the orchestra's 32d concert in Springfield, an occasion always eagerly awaited during the year. The concert begins at 3 o'clock. Free and season tickets may be obtained from the Y. M. C. A., or from any of the music stores. The program is as follows:

Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
1. Adagio; Allegro Non Troppo.
2. Allegro Con Grazia.
3. Allegro Molto Vivace.
4. Finale; Adagio Lamentoso.

Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"). Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Liszt, "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine).

There will be an intermission of 10 minutes after the symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GO ON THE AIR

Weekly Concerts to Be Heard by Millions All Over the Country

Concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast from radio station WEEI, Boston, on 11 consecutive Saturday nights, beginning a week from tomorrow. Negotiations are in progress between the management and radio stations in other cities, including those of New England, for rebroadcasting the programs, and doubtless many millions of listeners will hear this, one of the most famous of the world's symphony orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra have refused hitherto to permit the broadcasting of its music in its entirety, because of the large expense which would be entailed. This difficulty has been overcome by the gift of $12,000 for the purpose by Winfield S. Quinby of Brookline, music enthusiast, and prominent in civic betterment as well as business enterprises of New England.

The Boston Symphony concerts have hitherto been restricted to a limited few people, for most of the seats are occupied by season ticket holders and their guests. Occasionally the orchestra has played in Worcester, and, of course, music lovers here are familiar with it. But the public at large has never had the privilege which will be offered on the air through the long series of weeks.

With Boston Symphony.

This afternoon Eugene Goossens conducts his last concert of his series of six as guest conductor this season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The concert is in Mecca Auditorium and Walter Gieseking, pianist, is the soloist.

To-morrow morning Mr. Goossens will be in Boston ready to begin rehearsals with the Boston Symphony for the concerts which he will conduct with that orchestra in Boston and in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

The Boston Symphony.

One of the most important orchestral concerts of the year will take place Wednesday of next week at the Lyric when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only Baltimore appearance of the year. Director Serge Koussevitzky has arranged a striking program that will include neither soloist nor symphony. The big number will be the symphonic suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a number that exacts playing of the highest from every instrument in the orchestra.

---

orchestras we mean the Boston, New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia, with Fritz Reiner and his Cincinnati group as a less expensive and thoroughly satisfying organization. More concerts by the Cincinnati unit would be a good thing for the series. Reiner is an intelligent conductor, his programs have given as much of novelty as any heard here, and his players are well-trained, admirable musicians. If there is any awarding of more than the usual pair of concerts yearly, by all means let the selection go to this group.

The next season is to have a more extensive orchestr program, according to announcement. The extension should apply also to the music to be played. The only time local music lovers get an opportunity to hear compositions of the day is when visiting in other cities. With a series of 12 or 14 orchestral concerts in a season, there is no reason why more interesting, less tedious and greater variety of programs should not be forthcoming.

FOR EVERY RADIAN

[By UNITED PRESS.]

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Radio fans probably will receive the equivalent to a season ticket to Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this year.

For if negotiations between the trustees of the famous musical organization and the Edison Electric carried out, the orchestra air on Jan. 23 for

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 5 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS ON RADIO

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—For the first time phony regula

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.

JAN 2 3 1926

Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," will be a feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for its first public concert in Philadelphia under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 1. Another notable number will be the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," the program also including a sonata of the eighteenth century composer, Galliard, and Liadov's symphonic tableau, "Fragment From the Apocalypse."

---

hear sian Orchestra, Philadelphia Academy of February 1. The second of Koussevitzky in at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is now generally regarded as one of the most potent forces and striking personalities in the music of America. Before coming to America he made his mark as an orchestral leader in his own country, and in more recent seasons became the most prominent leader of London and Paris. Last summer he returned to continue his series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris.

---

but also the mechanical results obtained by WEEI as compared to those of the New York stations.

---

lo

Ga in G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by Mamimilian Steinberg).
Debussy—"Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (prelude to the afternoon of a faun) Ecologue by S. Mallarme.
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice—after a ballad by Goethe.)
Rimsky-Koraskov — Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and One Night."
1—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
2—The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3—The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

---

er's overture to "Der Freischutz" s's Symphony in E minor, Wag relude and Love Death from "Tris Isolde," Delius's "On Hearing the Cuckoo in Spring," and Sibelius's onic poem, "Finlandia."

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM CHARMS BIG CROWD

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Famous Orchestra in Superb Manner — 4800 Hear Popular Classics

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, made its annual visit to this city yesterday for a concert in the Auditorium for the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon course of which its appearances have for a number of years been the great feature. The hall was, of course, filled, and not all could get in, but in issuing free tickets, some care was taken not to exceed too greatly the room available, so that the umber of those disappointed should be as small as possible. Since these annual orchestral concerts began, the cost has more than doubled, so that their support has become a problem which this year was met in part by an appeal for subscriptions in blocks of five tickets, which reduced somewhat the amount necessary to be taken up at the collection in order that too heavy a burden should not be put upon the other entertainments in the course.

At present this is the only important event by a visiting orchestra in the city's musical season, but at least it is assured of a large audience. Un[illegible]ditions, the need is prob[illegible] program [illegible]day. audience as a whole than one too full of novelties would have been. Some of the previous conductors have at times tended to give such programs as suit very well a Boston audience which attends every week, but are not so well adapted for hearers who have to make one concert last a long time. It is well that the main part of the music given should be old and familiar, yet even so, a place might be found for one work to show what winds are now blowing in the world of music.

Conductor at Best

There could be no question, however, that the program suited the style and temperament of Mr Koussevitzky, a conductor with whose remarkable gifts Springfield made acquaintance last year. Since then he has had more time to shape the orchestra to his taste, and the changes are considerable, though not revolutionary. One noticed, even before the music began, the rearrangement of forces, putting all the violins together on the conductor's left, while the front of the right half of the stage, formerly held by the second violins, is assigned to the violas, with the 'cellos behind them and widely separated from the basses which are aligned along the left and rear walls.

A standardized arrangement seems more remote than ever, and nowadays most conductors have their hobbies—in the New England Philharmonic society of late the traditional place of the second violins has been given to the 'cellos. That the arrangement matters greatly to the audience is unlikely but no doubt it makes a great difference to the musicians. And in some passages yesterday the violins seemed to gain by being put in one solid mass, while the violas certainly were more effective than is sometimes the case.

Orchestra Plays Well

That the quality of the orchestra, brought back to something like its old standard before Mr Monteux completed his term of service, has not deteriorated, was shown in the opening number, the lovely "Euryanthe" overture, which to many was the most beautiful part of a fine concert. Even in this classical music, which leans but a little way toward the romantic, the fiery, yet well controled temperament of the conductor was shown; if conductor must nowadays play the ole of a conjuror, Mr Koussevitzky, hose histrionic talent rivals his usical gifts, plays it very well.

It was in the "Pathetic" symphony, owever, that his great mastery of limax was revealed, and the performnce was thrilling without being exggerated. He took it easily, with his sual poised alertness, even putting own the baton when a steady march hythm conducted itself, and saving his energy for the crucial moments. The symphony has had several notable productions in this city, but none surpassing the interpretation given yesterday. It is a symphony that should be saved for occasions when it can be greatly played; the greater the emotional strain of a work the more rest it needs if it is not to be worn out.

Popular Numbers Given

Something of the same sort might be said of the other big number of the afternoon, Liszt's "Les Preludes," the one orchestral work by this composer which has attained universal popularity, and one which many people who like it well do not care to hear too often. Perhaps as a matter of abstract program making it would have been better not to have them both on one program, but both are of the kind in which Mr Koussevitzky is at his best and both were tremendously popular. Between them, for relief and contrast came Debussy's idyllic "Afternoon of a Faun," the exquisite impressionism of which still charms, even though present-day musicians seem to be turning aside from the enchanted portal which Debussy opened—perhaps there was not so very much behind it after all, not more than he needed for his own uses. On the whole the program was richer in color th[illegible]nt, de[illegible]iving

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

JAN 2 0 1926

SYMPHONY PLEASED CRITICAL AUDIENCE

Boston Orchestra, Directed by Eugene Goossens, Gave Fine Programme.

Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the centre of attraction last evening at Infantry Hall. The applause which greeted him on his first appearance was seemingly perfunctory, but after the rendition of Wagner's overture, under his leadership, the applause was the result of the audience's ability to recognize a musician of merit.

In Brahms' Symphony in E-minor the leader found a pleasing vehicle in which to display his talents. The symphony played last evening may not be the greatest effort of Brahm, but it is an engrossing musical creation that offered ample possibilities for the conductor to show his understanding and imagination, and the guest conductor was masterful in his interpretation of the difficult masterpiece.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ...Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, op. 98. — Bral
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionat
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wag
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 2 1926

GOOSSENS TO GO ON AIR

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Goossens tomorrow night, will be broadcast by a low power Boston radio transmitter, it was announced today. Rochester radio fans owning powerful sets stand a good chance of bringing in this concert providing weather conditions are favorable.

Eugene Goossens appears in a double role in this event—he will conduct the concert and his own "Sinfonietta" is included in the program.

Members of the Boston orchestra are interested in the result of this broadcast as upon it will depend much of the policy relative to future radio concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

JAN 2 2 1926

THE one annual visit which the Boston Symphony Orchestra pays to Baltimore will take place on February 3, when the big organization will give a concert under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, now in his second year as conductor of this famous organization and adding to his reputation for unusual attainment, both with respect to the selection of the works given and also by the striking manner of their presentation.

The concert will be out of the ordinary in that the program includes no soloist, and further, because of the absence of a symphony which has been considered by music lovers almost indispensible. Instead the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsahoff, will be given. There are in this work four movements taken from "The Thousand and One Night" tales, and the score is one of the most brilliant in symphonic literature, its essentially Russian character being, of course, emphasized in the interpretation by a Russian conductor.

Besides the opus mentioned, the program will include the Galliard Sonata in G major, freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; Debussy's prelude to "An Afternoon With a Faun," an ecologue by S. Mallarme, and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe, surely a sufficiently colorful offering to make a strong appeal.

GOOSSENS TO LEAD SYMPHONY TUESDAY

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday evening, with an innovation in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugene Goossens, Guest Conductor for Tuesday Concert, Win Praise in New York.—Many Clubs Meet This Week

The feature of the week's music events here is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Both Mr. Goossens and the Boston orchestra come here fresh from triumphs in New York, the English conductor having completed a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky's musicians having won high praise for performances which they gave in the metropolis under their own conductor recently.

It so happened that Mr. Goossens made his first appearance with the New York orchestra on the same evening that Mr. Koussevitzky led the Hub players in their first concert of the latest New York series, a week ago Thursday evening. Mr. Googgens was termed a conductor of "rare sympathy and commanding power" by Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune, who stated that his performance of the difficult "Le Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky was "electrifying in its rythmical power, its unflagging intensity." And the same critic, writing of the rendition of Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony" by Mr. Koussevitzky, and his orchestra states: "Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a reading of unforgettable breadth and fervor and the orchestra . . . played it superbly."

For his programme here Tuesday evening Mr. Goossens, who has been a conspicuous figure in the musical life of London since the war, offers works by Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Sibelius and Delius, which are considered in Warren Storey Smith's article on this page.

A tribute to the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky was contained in a review of one of the New York concerts in the Times, written by Olin Downes, who stated that the performance justified superlatives. "There were superlative performances and superlative interpratives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city," wrote the critic.

"Mr. Koussevitzky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of the composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with a virtuoso's control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable or[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 2 2 1926

Programme Announced for Boston Orchestra Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its third visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 5, with Serge Prokofieff as the soloist of the evening.

A feature of the programme will be the first performance hereabouts by the great Russian conductor of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." His performance of this score in Boston earlier in the season was regarded as one of the most remarkable of his many interpretative achievements.

Serge Prokofieff, considered the most talented of the younger Russian composers, and likewise one of the finest pianists that country has produced, will be heard in his double capacity when he takes the pianoforte part in his Third Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a Sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 1 7 1926

EUGENE GOOSENS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JAN 2 0 1926

-:- MUSIC -:-

A Guest Conductor

Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor, took Serge Koussevitzky's place as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of the season here last evening. Mr. Goossens is now conductor of the Rochester orchestra; before coming to this country he enjoyed an enviable reputation in London.

His reception last night was very enthusiastic as, considering all the circumstances, it deserved to be. He had chosen an admirably interesting program and he displayed musicianship of a high order. The program follows:

Overture to "Der Freichutz" ..Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98.. .... Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 ..... Sibelius

It seemed to us that Mr. Goossens played the second movement of the symphony and Delius's charming tone-poem better than anything else. One realized that in temperament Mr. Goossens and Mr. Koussevitzky are poles apart, while equally intelligent and scholarly. To use a very old distinction, however, Mr. Goossens was inclined to be classical and severe where Mr. Koussevitzky would have shown the adventurous spirit that goes with a romantic and highly imaginative nature.

This distinction between the two conductors is well sensed by the Boston players, but, very naturally, it has the effect of sometimes leaving them a little bewildered. Probably Mr. Goossens did not have the advantage of rehearsing very often with them before last night's performance and he frequently had difficulty in getting what he wanted. This was noteworthy both in the "Freischutz" overture and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan," Indeed in the latter Mr. Goossens and his players seemed never to have a perfect understanding, and the result was a hesitant performance, never quite sure of itself. Similarly the sonorous barbarity of the "Finlandia" was lost in a desire for emphasizing its tuneful melodies. But in the quiet and pastoral-like Delius poem conductor and players were charmingly of one mind.

We hope to hear Mr. Goossens again with [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES

JAN 2 4 1926

Serge Prokofieff will play his third piano concerto in the Boston Symphony's "all-Russian" programs here on Feb. 4 and 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

JAN 1 9 1926

CAPITULATING CRITICS

WRITING presumably with a knowledge of the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus, Rudolf Kastner, in the Vossiche Zeitung, subscribes to the opinion that the Philadelphia Orchestra "stands alone in superb tone, virtuosity and unity." He also asserts that "in Philadelphia the highest point has been reached in American musical life."

Such a libation of praise imposes somewhat trying obligations of modesty and self-examination on the community thus exalted. In the sturdiest art production there are elements of fragility that may be disconcertingly fed by superflattery. The worst thing that could happen to the art impulses of this community is envelopment in an atmosphere of contentment and self-satisfaction. The corrosive consequences of smug estheticism are well known and are such as eventually to lead to hollow convention, uninspired routine and dry rot.

It is fitting, of course, to accept Herr Kastner's encomiums on our own musical accomplishments and modes of musical education with courtesy and gratitude. The laudation does not differ much in degree from that which has become a habit in New York whenever Mr. Stokowski takes his players there.

But it is well to keep Sancho Panza's' injunction in mind. "There are no birds in last year's nests." Philadelphia is musically eminent in some departments, but it cannot afford to rest on its laurels. It was to some extent the competitive pressure of the Boston Symphony—before the climactic shocks of the end of the Muck regime—which spurred the aspiring Philadelphia organization, then a comparative newcomer, to eager endeavor and brilliant achievement. Toscannini and Mengelberg may be reckoned today as similarly tonic forces, less submissive to local pride but perhaps more stimulating to our authentic musical progress than all the utterly capitulating choruses of homage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 2 5 1926

MRS. WILSON-GREENE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance of the 1925-26 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the third concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course of afternoon musical events. The orchestra will be composed of 108 musicians this year, with Koussevitky personally conducting.

It is probable that Koussevitzky's musical genius has found its highest expression with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for never before have seat reservations for the famous orvanization's concerts been in greater demand. Each series in Boston and New York this season was entirely subscribed last May.

Koussevitzky has repeated in America this winter the triumphs he achieved in Paris and London last summer, where his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in the French capital and his appearances as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra were outstanding continental music events.

There will be two more concerts in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course in addition to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 2 5 1926

COPYRIGHT LAW INTERRUPTS SYMPHONY RADIO CONCERT

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24 (A. P.).- The Boston Symphony orchest went on the air last night for the first time, but the broadcasting was interrupted by the copyright law. While the orchestra played the Sinfonietta of Eugene Goosens, this week's guest conductor, the radio fans heard nothing.

It appeared that the rights to the composition are held by J. and W. Chester of London, and the American rights by G. Ricordi & Co. of New York. The latter firm refused to permit the broadcasting and even a request from Mr. Goosens was declined.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM CHARMS BIG CROWD

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Famous Orchestra in Superb Manner — 4800 Hear Popular Classics

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, made its annual visit to this city yesterday for a concert in the Auditorium for the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon course of which its appearances have for a number of years been the great feature. The hall was, of course, filled, and not all could get in, but in issuing free tickets, some care was taken not to exceed too greatly the room available, so that the umber of those disappointed should be a[illegible] small as possible. Since these annual orchestral concerts began, the cost has more than doubled, so that their support has become a problem which this year was met in part by an appeal for subscriptions in blocks of five tickets, which reduced somewhat the amount necessary to be taken up at the collection in order that too heavy a burden should not be put upon the other entertainments in the course.

At present this is the only important event by a visiting orchestra in the city's musical season, but at least it is assured of a large audience. Un- ...ditions, the need is prob- ... program ...day.

audience as a whole than one too full of novelties would have been. Some of the previous conductors have at times tended to give such programs as suit very well a Boston audience which attends every week, but are not so well adapted for hearers who have to make one concert last a long time. It is well that the main part of the music given should be old and familiar, yet even so, a place might be found for one work to show what winds are now blowing in the world of music.

Conductor at Best

There could be no question, however, that the program suited the style and temperament of Mr Koussevitzky, a conductor with whose remarkable gifts Springfield made acquaintance last year. Since then he has had more time to shape the orchestra to his taste, and the changes are considerable, though not revolutionary. One noticed, even before the music began, the rearrangement of forces, putting all the violins together on the conductor's left, while the front of the right half of the stage, formerly held by the second violins, is assigned to the violas, with the 'cellos behind them and widely separated from the basses which are aligned along the left and rear walls.

A standardized arrangement seems more remote than ever, and nowadays most conductors have their hobbies—in the New England Philharmonic society of late the traditional place of the second violins has been given to the 'cellos. That the arrangement matters greatly to the audience is unlikely but no doubt it makes a great difference to the musicians. And in some passages yesterday the violins seemed to gain by being put in one solid mass, while the violas certainly were more effective than is sometimes the case.

Orchestra Plays Well

That the quality of the orchestra, brought back to something like its old standard before Mr Monteux completed his term of service, has not deteriorated, was shown in the opening number, the lovely "Euryanthe" overture, which to many was the most beautiful part of a fine concert. Even in this classical music, which leans but a little way toward the romantic, the fiery, yet well controled temperament of the conductor was shown; if conductor must nowadays play the role of a conjuror, Mr Koussevitzky, whose histrionic talent rivals his musical gifts, plays it very well.

It was in the "Pathetic" symphony, however, that his great mastery of climax was revealed, and the performance was thrilling without being exaggerated. He took it easily, with his usual poised alertness, even putting down the baton when a steady march rhythm conducted itself, and saving his energy for the crucial moments. The symphony has had several notable productions in this city, but none surpassing the interpretation given yesterday. It is a symphony that should be saved for occasions when it can be greatly played; the greater the emotional strain of a work the more rest it needs if it is not to be worn out.

Popular Numbers Given

Something of the same sort might be said of the other big number of the afternoon, Liszt's "Les Preludes," the one orchestral work by this composer which has attained universal popularity, and one which many people who like it well do not care to hear too often. Perhaps as a matter of abstract program making it would have been better not to have them both on one program, but both are of the kind in which Mr Koussevitzky is at his best and both were tremendously popular. Between them, for relief and contrast came Debussy's idyllic "Afternoon of a Faun," the exquisite impressionism of which still charms, even though present-day musicians seem to be turning aside from the enchanted portal which Debussy opened—perhaps there was not so very much behind it after all, not more than he needed for his own uses. On the whole the program was richer in color th...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET

JAN 20 1926

SYMPHONY PLEASED CRITICAL AUDIENCE

Boston Orchestra, Directed by Eugene Goossens, Gave Fine Programme.

Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the centre of attraction last evening at Infantry Hall. The applause which greeted him on his first appearance was seemingly perfunctory, but after the rendition of Wagner's overture, under his leadership, the applause was the result of the audience's ability to recognize a musician of merit.

In Brahms' Symphony in E-minor the leader found a pleasing vehicle in which to display his talents. The symphony played last evening may not be the greatest effort of Brahm, but it is an engrossing musical creation that offered ample possibilities for the conductor to show his understanding and imagination, and the guest conductor was masterful in his interpretation of the difficult masterpiece.

The programme was played in the following order:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ...Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, op. 98. Brah
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagn
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 22 1926

GOOSSENS TO GO ON AIR

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Goossens tomorrow night, will be broadcast by a low power Boston radio transmitter, it was announced today. Rochester radio fans owning powerful sets stand a good chance of bringing in this concert providing weather conditions are favorable.

Eugene Goossens appears in a double role in this event—he will conduct the concert and his own "Sinfonietta" is included in the program.

Members of the Boston orchestra are interested in the result of this broadcast as upon it will depend much of the policy relative to future radio concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN

JAN 22 1926

THE one annual visit which the Boston Symphony Orchestra pays to Baltimore will take place on February 3, when the big organization will give a concert under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, now in his second year as conductor of this famous organization and adding to his reputation for unusual attainment, both with respect to the selection of the works given and also by the striking manner of their presentation.

The concert will be out of the ordinary in that the program includes no soloist, and further, because of the absence of a symphony which has been considered by music lovers almost indispensible. Instead the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsahoff, will be given. There are in this work four movements taken from "The Thousand and One Night" tales, and the score is one of the most brilliant in symphonic literature, its essentially Russian character being, of course, emphasized in the interpretation by a Russian conductor.

Besides the opus mentioned, the program will include the Galliard Sonata in G major, freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; Debussy's prelude to "An Afternoon With a Faun," an ecologue by S. Mallarme, and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe, surely a sufficiently colorful offering to make a strong appeal.

GOOSSENS TO LEAD SYMPHONY TUESDAY

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday evening, with an innovation in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugene Goossens, Guest Conductor for Tuesday Concert, Win Praise in New York.—Many Clubs Meet This Week

The feature of the week's music events here is the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens, guest conductor, in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Both Mr. Goossens and the Boston orchestra come here fresh from triumphs in New York, the English conductor having completed a series of six appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky's musicians having won high praise for performances which they gave in the metropolis under their own conductor recently.

It so happened that Mr. Goossens made his first appearance with the New York orchestra on the same evening that Mr. Koussevitzky led the Hub players in their first concert of the latest New York series, a week ago Thursday evening. Mr. Googgens was termed a conductor of "rare sympathy and commanding power" by Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune, who stated that his performance of the difficult "Le Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky was "electrifying in its rythmical power, its unflagging intensity." And the same critic, writing of the rendition of Strauss's "An Alpine Symphony" by Mr. Koussevitzky, and his orchestra states: "Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a reading of unforgettable breadth and fervor and the orchestra . . . played it superbly."

For his programme here Tuesday evening Mr. Goossens, who has been a conspicuous figure in the musical life of London since the war, offers works by Weber, Wagner, Brahms, Sibelius and Delius, which are considered in Warren Storey Smith's article on this page.

A tribute to the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky was contained in a review of one of the New York concerts in the Times, written by Olin Downes, who stated that the performance justified superlatives. "There were superlative performances and superlative interpratives by the most incalculable personality among the great conductors who appear in this city," wrote the critic.

"Mr. Koussevitzky placed his splendid band and his extraordinary gifts wholly at the services of the composers. He differentiated with self-effacement and a fine objectivity between each one of them—Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Bloch, Ravel. At the same time he infused everything he did with a virtuoso's control of his instrument that gave the concert a foremost rank among the many notable or-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 23 1926

Programme Announced for Boston Orchestra Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its third visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 5, with Serge Prokofieff as the soloist of the evening.

A feature of the programme will be the first performance hereabouts by the great Russian conductor of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." His performance of this score in Boston earlier in the season was regarded as one of the most remarkable of his many interpretative achievements.

Serge Prokofieff, considered the most talented of the younger Russian composers, and likewise one of the finest pianists that country has produced, will be heard in his double capacity when he takes the pianoforte part in his Third Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce the concert by a Sonata of Galliard, the Eighteenth Century composer, which has been scored for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1926

EUGENE GOOSENS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JAN 20 1926

-:- MUSIC -:-

A Guest Conductor

Eugene Goossens, as guest conductor, took Serge Koussevitzky's place as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of the season here last evening. Mr. Goossens is now conductor of the Rochester orchestra; before coming to this country he enjoyed an enviable reputation in London.

His reception last night was very enthusiastic as, considering all the circumstances, it deserved to be. He had chosen an admirably interesting program and he displayed musicianship of a high order. The program follows:

Overture to "Der Freichutz" ..Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98.. .... Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico e passionato.
Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" .... Delius
"Finlandia": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 ..... Sibelius

It seemed to us that Mr. Goossens played the second movement of the symphony and Delius's charming tone-poem better than anything else. One realized that in temperament Mr. Goossens and Mr. Koussevitzky are poles apart, while equally intelligent and scholarly. To use a very old distinction, however, Mr. Goossens was inclined to be classical and severe where Mr. Koussevitzky would have shown the adventurous spirit that goes with a romantic and highly imaginative nature.

This distinction between the two conductors is well sensed by the Boston players, but, very naturally, it has the effect of sometimes leaving them a little bewildered. Probably Mr. Goossens did not have the advantage of rehearsing very often with them before last night's performance and he frequently had difficulty in getting what he wanted. This was noteworthy both in the "Freischutz" overture and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan," Indeed in the latter Mr. Goossens and his players seemed never to have a perfect understanding, and the result was a hesitant performance, never quite sure of itself. Similarly the sonorous barbarity of the "Finlandia" was lost in a desire for emphasizing its tuneful melodies. But in the quiet and pastoral-like Delius poem conductor and players were charmingly of one mind.

We hope to hear Mr. Goossens again with a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES

JAN 24 1926

Serge Prokofieff will play his third piano concerto in the Boston Symphony's "all-Russian" programs here on Feb. 4 and 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Public Ledger

JAN 19 1926

CAPITULATING CRITICS

WRITING presumably with a knowledge of the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus, Rudolf Kastner, in the Vossiche Zeitung, subscribes to the opinion that the Philadelphia Orchestra "stands alone in superb tone, virtuosity and unity." He also asserts that "in Philadelphia the highest point has been reached in American musical life."

Such a libation of praise imposes somewhat trying obligations of modesty and self-examination on the community thus exalted. In the sturdiest art production there are elements of fragility that may be disconcertingly fed by superflattery. The worst thing that could happen to the art impulses of this community is envelopment in an atmosphere of contentment and self-satisfaction. The corrosive consequences of smug estheticism are well known and are such as eventually to lead to hollow convention, uninspired routine and dry rot.

